qualities of "Mutiny on the Bounty," but its movement and pace makes it the most entertaining sea story of the year. Besides, it brings into prominence a brand new screen personality who is destined for a niche among the Gables and the Coopers of Hollywood. He is Errol Flynn, a handsome young Irishman who makes his screen debut in the title role. This would have been a good picture without Flynn—with him it becomes the sort of picture that makes reviewers send out for more adjectives. Exiled from England and sold into slavery in one of the colonies, the young doctor takes advantage of an attack on the island, mans the attackers' ship and puts out to sea to become the most feared pirate in the trade. Next to Flynn's outstanding performance there are excellent portrayals by Olivia de Havilland, Ross Alexander, Guy Kibbee, Basil Rathbone and Forrester Harvey.

Errol Flynn has never been a pirate. But he's been practically everything else. Soldier of fortune, a master of trading vessels in the South Seas, a hunter of head-hunters, an adventurer in all the far corners of the globe. From Broadway he was brought to Hollywood for this first picture . . . Olivia de Havilland is good news herself. Eighteen years old, she's getting to first base in less than a year in the industry . . . Seven ships were built for this little epic. Shipbuilding may be industry's most highly specialized job, but a call for seven ships is all in the day's work to studio technicians. Of the seven, two were as complete as any ship that sails the seas, except for lighter construction and little durability. Of regulation size, length, height and beam, each deck is equipped with a full array of cannon . . . You can't surprise the studio gun-makers, either. The head of the studio arsenal received this order: fifty cannons, 400 cap and ball pistols, 450 flintlock muskets, 350 cutlasses, 750 powder horns, 50 powder barrels, 200 cane knives and 300 daggers. The weapons were copied from a few choice arsenal treasures dating back to 1650 . . . Costume research took over six months. One of Miss de Havilland's snappy outfits consisted of a white taffeta petticoat, composed of eight yards of material and forty yards of ruffles. Fifteen yards were wound around her for a velvet skirt and a nine-yard satin pannier covered this. Her bonnet weighed seventeen pounds. Those leather boots which lend such a dashing air to the actors, felt anything but that. Each boot weighed 23 pounds. Considering some fifty pounds of swords, leather jackets, and iron hats, the cast was made up mostly of "heavies."

★★★ The Magnificent Obsession (Universal)

This is a typical John M. Stahl production, which is to say that it is ponderous and painstaking and probably will make its producers a lot of money. Mr. Stahl is the type of story teller who spares no details—a habit which sometimes proves annoying—but it can never be said of him that he's not convincing. For, in this instance, he has taken an obvious tear-jerker, as creaky a tale as the screen has offered in months, and made it into a film which is bound to obtain a wide audience appeal, especially among the ladies. Briefly, it has to do with Irene Dunne and Robert Taylor. Taylor, a playboy who has inadvertently caused the death of Miss Dunne's husband, brings more tragedy to her life when, because of him, she is involved in an automobile accident which costs her her sight. His honest effort to make amends constitutes the picture. Evidence that the story is faulty is contained in the fact that six years after the accident Mr. Taylor has acquired a medical school diploma and the Nobel Prize for his work in surgery. From a critical standpoint it's not a first-rate picture, but audiences who enjoy a good cry will admire it considerably. As for the cast, both Miss Dunne and Mr. Taylor are handsome and capable, and supporting roles are ably handled by Charlie Butterworth, Ralph Morgan and Betty Furness.

Sixteen weeks of intensive filming were needed for this one. At least Director John M. Stahl thought so. Most movie megaphoners concentrate on "key" scenes, but Director S. considers every scene the most important in the picture. Over 467,000 feet of negative film rolled through the cameras and was cut to the 10,000 feet you are allowed to enjoy. Editing and cutting of an important flicker takes twice as long as actual production. Over 330 reels decorated the cutting-room floors, after Stahl had personally butchered the film down to the 10 reels for release. Twice the total footage you see was used, since photographic action is recorded on one film and sound on another, with the two later combined in a so-called movietone print. The "sound track" is a narrow strip running along the side of the photographed scene . . . Over 4,300 extras were engaged on this picture and a total of 42 sets were constructed. Sets ranged from a huge dock and reproduction of a section of the "Normandie," to elaborate hotel interiors, the Montmartre hills, a group of residences taking up a couple of city blocks, and two large, completely equipped hospitals, not to mention a few more. All this fancy business ran into the million mark. Thirty-eight complete costume changes added to the Dunne glamor, while Betty Furness fell heir to twenty-seven outfits. Guaranteeing a magnificent obsession of your very own, sisters. Vera West did the designing . . . Charles Butterworth has discovered it's smart to be dumb. After passing the Indiana bar, Mr. Butterworth decided he was through with brain strain. So he became a newspaper reporter. This, too, he discovered required occasional thought, so he decided on an acting career. . . . Robert Taylor claims he's just a young man trying to get along. But how this twenty-four-year-old young man gets along! Graduating as a full-fledged psychiatrist from Pomona College, Bob was immediately snatched by movie moguls; had his choice of signing several dotted lines, and is now a star. He's a native Nebraskan and to date hasn't gone Hollywood. The rumor hounds would have us believe that he's really interested in Janet Gaynor, his newest co-star.

★★ The Lady Consents

(RKO-Radio)

For those who enjoy seeing Ann Harding play her favorite role—the sacrificing wife—there is possibly a full measure of entertainment here. For those who are just a bit tired of watching the gallant Miss Harding in the process of being "regular" to the point of boredom, let this be fair warning. As in most Harding pictures, the eyes of her screen husband soon fall on this comely lass or that one, and you know what happens. Poor Ann is left holding the sack—bravely, of course— while her erstwhile mate is out having himself a time. To a critical observer it seems that Miss Harding's movie mates start looking around almost before the picture has begun. Perhaps, having seen previous Harding films, they know what is required of them. In this case Herbert Marshall is the husband and Margaret Lindsay, following the familiar formula, lures him from home and fireside. After a year or two with her he returns to Miss Harding, who is waiting. Miss Harding is always waiting. Walter Abel does what he can in the thankless role of Miss Harding's persistent suitor, and Edward Ellis is excellent as Mr. Marshall's father.

Though an RKO major production, on which neither time nor expense was to be spared, Director Stephen Roberts was accused of bringing in a "quickie" with this one. He finished the picture ten days ahead of schedule, an unheard of event in movie annals. At least when it does happen, the news seldom leaks out, so great a piece of scandal it is. For the longer a picture is in production, the more the studio pays and pays, and the actors and director get and get. Experienced crew, cast and director were blamed in this case . . . Ann Harding is making her first trip to Europe any of these days. Besides being a firm believer in "See America First," Miss Harding hasn't had a minute to call her own since starting her acting career some ten years ago. Between careers and domestic crises, Miss H. has had her hands full. Everyone but Ann says she'll soon be marrying a Honolulu army man. Bernard Newman designed all those swanky clothes jobs which are sported by the three leading women. Newman is looked upon with awe among stylists of Southern California. They say he's the first to sense a trend in style in this country. Whether that's true or not, the gals go awfully well with Mr. Newman's ideas.

★★ Three Live Ghosts

(M-G-M)

Much ado about three soldiers, listed in the war records as officially dead, who return to London and find difficulty proving themselves mortal. After all, if the government says you're dead, what can you do? One of them (Richard Arlen) is hiding out from a jail term which he believes awaits him in America, another (Charles McNaughton) wants very much to be regarded as alive, but his mother (Beryl Mercer) insists he's not because she has already collected his insurance, and the third (Claude Allister) is actually not sure whether he's alive or not. Things are further complicated by the fact that the Messrs. Arlen and McNaughton have two young ladies (Cecilia Parker and Nydia Westman) in love with them, and Mr. Allister is troubled with kleptomania. The climax arrives when the latter returns home one evening attired in top hat and tails and bearing jewels and a gurgling infant. All three items turn out to be his own, and with the establishing of his identity comes happiness and all that sort of thing for everyone concerned. "Three Live Ghosts" is a mild little comedy brightened by the performances of Allister, McNaughton, Beryl Mercer and Nydia Westman.

This was a "quickie" for M-G-M. The entire picture took seventeen days, in spite of the fact that practically the entire cast was changed on the second day of shooting. The first three leading men selected looked too ghost-like to be alive. Arlen, Allister and McNaughton, the next selections, were found to look too much alive. But by that time Director Humberstone decided a quickie director couldn't be too choosy. He's known as "Lucky" Humberstone on the studio lot since a few years back when he escaped unhurt from an auto wreck killing eight people. Humberstone is lucky for M-G-M, too, for seventeen-day picture producers, and good ones, are few and far between in Hollywood . . . The fanciest set used on this one was for the battle scene. This necessitated clearing rubbish off a corner of the back studio lot, spading up a couple of trenches and shell holes, stringing up a few yards of barbed wire and calling it a day. Besides a snap for the prop department, this film provided a break for Richard Arlen. He was completely happy for the first time in reel life, due to the disreputable wardrobe allotted him for the role. Dick has a clothes complex. His favorite costume is an ancient sweater, corduroys bought a few years earlier and a gangster's check cap. The Arlens (Dick, Dick, Jr., and Jobyna Ralston) have just returned from England, where the head of the family did some pictures for a London film factory . . . Cecilia Parker deserves a hand for being the local girl who made good. But it wasn't as easy as all that. After graduating from Hollywood High School, Cecilia with her sister, Linda, set about haunting the studio gates. Not so much as a peek inside did they get for over a year. The Parker shoe leather was just about giving out when they both landed "extra" bits. That was two years ago. Linda's still doing bits, but Cecilia was given a chance in "Ah, Wilderness." She delivered the goods with such a punch that you'll be seeing the youngest Parker often from now on. At least you'll want to.

★ Man Hunt

(Warners)

This is the old cops-and-robber stuff, supposedly enlivened by the presence of "Mel Purdue" and his trusty G-men, but it turns out to be one of this month's decidedly minor items. To give you an idea of the sort of hokum it is, here are a few salient truths it offers the audience: 1. That the rural constabulary is composed entirely of comic strip characters who do nothing but get in the way of the G-men. 2. That ace reporters from big-town newspapers accept every assignment as a lark, never remove their hats, spend all of their time drinking and get their greatest pleasure practicing practical jokes on small-town reporters. 3. That a normal girl, in full possession of her faculties, will hide a notorious murderer from the police because he tells her he has a mother. Anyway, Ricardo Cortez is the murderer, and the report that he is hiding in the vicinity of a certain village brings G-men and reporters in swarms from the big city, but it's good old Bill Gargan of the local weekly, with assistance from Marguerite Churchill, a rural schoolmarm, and Chic Sale, a doddering citizen of the community, who triumph for justice and, fortunately bring the story to a close.

Preview Postscripts

This is Marguerite Churchill's first appearance in celluloid for over a year. She's Mrs. George O'Brien in what private life her husband's popularity allows. The O'Brien heiress caused Marguerite's temporary screen retirement . . . That fancy figger which Bill Gargan is sporting nowadays isn't due to dietetic eccentricities, though. It's just due to plain dieting. Bill claims he's consumed the country's surplus in grapefruit this year—and nothing else. Leslie Howard and Gar-gan are Hollywood's most inseparable pals. They met in "Animal Kingdom" when that play was on Broadway, and were later reunited in the screen version . . . This is Director William Clemens' first picture under the new title. Formerly an ace cutter, Clemens was upped to his present illustrious position a short time ago . . . What trouble insects have caused the farmer is nothing compared to what the pests can do to production schedules. While on location in the San Fernando Valley, a swarm of gnats swooped down on the company, attracted by the bright lights. The scene was intended as one evening's work, but the first night was spent by the entire cast and crew fanning the air with whatever was at hand. In between times they swatted. Three evenings passed thusly, until a carload of flit guns (advt.) arrived. Considering that production expenses ran two thousand per night, the picture made a neat dent in the studio budget.

Anita Louise and Ross Alexander in "Brides Are Like That," a pleasant little comedy.

★★★★ The Ghost Goes West

(London Films)

Here is the best British film to reach these shores since Charles Laughton and "The Private Life of Henry VIII." Perhaps it can't be termed strictly British, since its author and two of its featured players are American and its director is French. At any rate, this international alliance has emerged with a picture marked with wit, charm and intelligence. Its star is Robert Donat, who, as Murdock Glourie, died a coward and is forced to haunt the Glourie Castle until he can avenge the family name. All this is rather disconcerting for Donald (also played by Mr. Donat), the last of the Glouries, who feels that his attempts to sell the castle are somewhat impeded by the nightly appearances of his ancestor. The castle is finally sold to a wealthy American, Eugene Pallette, who moves it, stone by stone, to his estate in Florida. The ghost of Murdock Glourie goes west with it, and romantic complications ensue, with the phantom and Donald both in amorous pursuit of Pallette's daughter, Jean Parker. The film is full of excellent satire and gentle ribbing of American wealth, with the delicate touch of the brilliant French director, Rene Clair, felt throughout. Robert Donat is superb in his dual role, and Eugene Pallette and Jean Parker both score heavily in their roles.

★★ Exclusive Story

(M-G-M)

Another newspaper film, and this time it has to do with a crusading reporter's exposé of what is known as "the numbers racket." Numbers, in case you don't know, is a daily lottery most popular in New York's Harlem, and there are reports that the executives in the business have underworld connections. These gentlemen force the small store owners in the region to become their agents, and it's their misfortune, in the end, that one of them is J. Farrell MacDonald. For it is J. Farrell's daughter, Madge Evans, who convinces Stuart Erwin, the reporter, that the racket should be wiped out. The crusade is aided by the newspaper's attorney, Franchot Tone, and since Mr. Erwin is already happily married it will probably come as no surprise to announce that Mr. Tone gives up his fiancée, Louise Henry, for Miss Evans. The film has several fairly exciting interludes, but it is our suspicion that the whole thing would have been completely dull had it not been for the excellent work of Joseph Calleia, who makes the racketeer the picture's most interesting personality. With the exception of this characterization, the picture is routine stuff.

The prop department developed a new trick for that kitchen scene. They showed Madge Evans how to fry eggs without eggs. It's very simple. She just dropped a little dry ice into the frying pan, swished it around, and that cloud of genuine fried smoke is the result . . . The prop men had their hands full for every scene on this picture. Tom Keene, Eleanore Whitney and Elizabeth Patterson in "Timothy's Quest."

this one does, there's a need for many sets. So besides the newspaper office, which required plenty of thought in assembling, six apartment sets were needed, several sections of Harlem and downtown New York were reproduced, besides courtrooms, waterfronts and several street scenes. The ballroom set was the most elaborate and costly. 150 "dress extras"—who rate top pay of $7.50 per day—had five days' work on this scene. And five days of dancing to one of the best orchestras in Southern California . . . Michael Fessier did the adaptation work on this script. He and Stu Erwin buried the hatchet for the first time in years while working together on the set. Seems that Stu was brought up in Squaw Valley, near Fresno. Fessier was brought up in Fresno. They both played baseball for the local high school teams, and loathed one another for years just on general principles. Besides playing baseball and writing scripts, Fessier can also act upon occasion and fly on any occasion. He makes the parachute jump for Franchot Tone in this picture . . . Joan Tone spent part of each day on the set. Madge Evans is one of her closest friends, so it wasn't just to keep an eye on Franchot . . . Joseph Calleia is fast building himself a reputation among the studio moguls. He is so much in demand that roles are lined up for him months in advance. Calleia doesn't believe in faking any of his acting. His insistence on realism no doubt lends that note of sincerity to his acting, but it proves hard on his fellow actors. If it's a beer bottle that Joseph is to break over someone's head, he insists on the real thing. And that knock-down-drag-'em-out rumpus between Franchot and Mr. C. is the genuine article. So were the black eyes which Mr. Tone wore for the next week.

★★ Brides Are Like That
(Warners)

A pleasant little comedy of domestic affairs which should afford most of its audiences satisfactory entertainment. Based on a play called "Applesauce," the picture uses that commodity as its theme, for Ross Alexander, our hero, employs it at every opportunity. It's his theory that people are happier when you take the trouble to tell them they're swell. Another of his theories is that a smart young man like himself shouldn't have to bother much about hard work. All of this is against the principles of his wealthy uncle, Joe Cawthorn, and almost upsets his married life with Anita Louise. Anita really loves him, of course, but her parents, Gene and Katherine Lockhart, continually point out that she might have done better by marrying Richard Purcell, a conscientious young doctor to whom she was once engaged. But our hero comes through with an invention which is rather vaguely explained as a contraption to keep apples from spoiling. Since the world is full of people who want to keep apples from spoiling, the domestic difficulties of young Mr. Alexander and his lovely bride immediately disappear. Ingratiating performances by the entire cast keep this one from becoming a bore.

Anita Louise thinks she may have fifty years ahead of her in pictures. Or she may have five. At any rate Anita is one girl who will be prepared. When this picture was completed she made her debut as a harpist at the Institute of Fine Arts. Prior to this she has exhibited water-colors and etchings there. And to top her talents, Anita can cook. Having to burn those biscuits in the picture was the hardest moment in her screen career . . . Ross Alexander has never looked for a job in his life. Work has always come looking for him and he's found it practically impossible to avoid. Most actors, f'rinstance, get a chance after months spent in directors' anterooms—if they're lucky. But Ross was presented with a role in "Enter, Madame," for a graduation gift from dramatic school. He never uses make-up or grease paint for a screen role, and prefers drama to comedy. Says the easy roles are the hardest to take . . . Joe Cawthorn is celebrating his 64th year of entertaining the public. He started in 1872 in a pickaninny chorus in Robinson's Hall in New York City. Since that time he's never earned a dime except in the acting profession . . . Dick Purcell has a theory on the best way to get to Hollywood. He claims the idea is to get as far away as possible and stay just as long as you can. At least, that's how he got his first chance in this town. A couple of years ago, Dick came on his own to Hollywood, looking for a role in talkies. He was so sure that Purcell had the stuff that he starved for almost a year waiting for someone to give him a little attention. Discouraged and slightly anemic, he bummed his weary way back to Broadway. There a role in "Paths of Glory" fell to his lot. A Warner sleuth spotted him in a performance the first week and frantically signed him on the dotted line, before any of the other studio spies should spot him.

gin story seems vastly improved. Although the names of the cast are not imposing, it is doubtful if a more successful group could have been assembled for the characters. Elizabeth Patterson is excellent in the role of a cold-hearted spinster who loathes anything resembling a child or a man. Dickie Moore will surprise you with the intelligent manner in which he goes about being Timothy. Virginia Weidler does well in her part, and you'll like small Sally Martin, who is a child actress to watch. Eleanore Whitney, in her first straight dramatic role, shows that her ability isn't limited to her feet by any means, and Tom Keene, whom you haven't seen for some time, is pleasing as the romantic lead opposite her. The play is entertaining enough for adults, too, in spite of being a story aimed especially at the children.

Preview Postscripts

Four-year-old Sally Martin is known as the "Baby Bernhardt." Some publicity agent had a good brain-wave on that one, but there is no doubt that Miss Martin has great possibilities . . . Tom Keene isn't as unfamiliar as you may think, for he was on the screen frequently in days gone by. But his name was George Duryea in those days. When the slump came in his work, he consulted a numerologist who bequeathed him with the present name. The next day came a call from the studio, and George Tom has been at work ever since . . . Eleanore Whitney is Paramount's White Hope. She's the fastest tap dancer in existence, for one thing. For another, she shows dramatic ability. For another, the Whitney is reported to have a really blue-sy blues voice. Guess that will hold you, M-G-M, with your Eleanor Powell . . . Elizabeth Patterson is well known as a Shakespearean actress both in this country and England. She has been in just a few pictures, but is gradually becoming so much the vogue with casting directors that she may never return to her first love.

"Muss 'Em Up," with Preston Foster, Florine McKinney and John Carroll.

★★ Rose of the Rancho
(Paramount)

So, after all the ringing of bells and general fanfare, the Swarthout picture has been released. And the truth is out. The picture is simply not what it was cracked up to be. The star herself is not at fault. Neither her beauty nor her superb voice has suffered by the screening and canning process. But the treatment of the story has made the characters appear flat and uninteresting. Miss Swarthout is the daughter of a California hidalgo, who turns leader of a band of vigilantes to protect their homes from the desperadoes. The desperadoes, however, turn out to be a bunch of grand guys with operatic tendencies. The vigilantes have their musical moments, too, while John Boles and Gladys Swarthout break into song at the least provocation and in the most dangerous situations. Charles Bickford, who plays the leader of the outlaws, seems a bit undecided what to do since he has no voice to speak of. Willie Howard and Herb Williams provide as many laughs as they can squeeze in between arias. In short, the picture is a disappointing debut for one of Miss Swarthout's undeniable ability. Let's hope it is just beginner's bad luck.

Except for two interior scenes taken on the lot, this picture was filmed on the Paramount ranch at Lake Malibu. There a walled city was built in exact replica of the California towns of 1850. It was modeled particularly after Monterey, the first capital of the state where sunshine originated. Authorities on California history did research on the sets for over six months, prior to construction. Attics, museums and libraries were ransacked for material and the result was as authentic a reproduction as the corps at Paramount has ever accomplished. Besides the old town, another city was built up to accommodate the 150 members of cast and crew who spent over two months on the ranch. Over fifty houses of canvas and wood were built for the crew, while special cottages were erected for the principals. One mess hall was used by the entire outfit, and evenings were gala occasions, with Gladys Swarthout and John Boles handing out a few thousand dollars worth of grand opera. The barnyard scenes look most picturesque and pleasant as you see and hear them. But they provided more trouble than all the rest of the scenery put together. Some fifty cows, chickens, pigs, etc., had been rounded up as part of the local color. All would go well until some impassioned love scene was well under way. Then would come the low, sad mooing of a cow, or a few loud disgruntled grunts from a porker. Production experts figured the live stock cost the studio approximately three thousand cash in lost time . . . It was William LeBaron's idea to do another "Rio Rita" with this one. For in that old-timer he had introduced a brand new comedy team, the Messrs. Wheeler and Woolsey. So this time he introduced another team, Willie Howard and Herb Williams, with the same high hopes. This is their first crack at the movies, though both are well known in show business . . . The debut of opera stars in films has been made much of. The remarkable thing about these songbirds isn't that they have forsaken patrician opera for plebeian movies, but that they have forsaken many of the operatic standbys—chiefly, professional jealousy. Miss Swarthout, on arriving in Hollywood, leased Grace Moore's home. For "inspiration" she said. And to introduce Lily Pons, a potential rival in movies, Miss S. gave the swankiest party that even Hollywood has seen to date.

★ The Lone Wolf Returns

(Columbia)

Although the title seemed to promise something really exciting—like adventures with the pack in the Frozen North—what do we get? A pack of jewel thieves, that's what. And to make it far, far worse, sophisticated jewel thieves. Oh, very. Melvyn Douglas, smartly clipped as to accent and mustachio, is the Lone Wolf, champion gem snatcher. A rival in the profession and the L. W. are both concentrating on the Stewart sparklers, than which no collection in the world can outshine. But when Gail Patrick turns out to be Miss Stewart, you can imagine Melvyn's embarrassment. Love blooms, though Gail gets pretty peeved when she finds out who Melvyn is. However, he proves his true nature by saving her jewels from the rival meanie, thereby winning Miss Stewart and the collection for himself. You can draw your own conclusions, but we should add that Miss Patrick is very pleasant to look upon, and Tala Birell, who plays a lady thief, is both attractive and talented.

This is the first time the Lone Wolf has been at large since the days of Bert Lytell. Melvyn Douglas' real name is Hesselberg, his father being the well-known Russian composer, Edouard Hesselberg. He's married to Helen Gahagan, Broadway actress and lately of the screen. They have a written contract that neither will interfere with the other's careers or temperaments . . . Douglas Dumbrille is an onion farmer from Canada. What's more, he intends going back to Canada when he's made enough money to raise only pedigreed onions. Claims he's the only actor alive today who's been broke in every city in the United States . . . Tala Birell got her first break by understudying Marlene Dietrich in Berlin. They were both working under the supervision of Max Reinhardt at the time. Since then, Tala has played in most of the European capitals and in English and French pictures. But she thinks Hollywood is swell and tops any other city in the world . . . Those apartment exterior shots provided plenty of trouble and expense. It should be a simple and economical matter to photograph buildings for exterior scenes, but as in this case it usually develops that the cheaper way is to construct the building right on the lot and be done with it. Around Los Angeles' exclusive Wilshire district there are many apartments. One was selected for a scene on this, but by the time the cameras were up, some fifteen minutes, a crowd of five hundred was jamming the streets, endangering the cast, crew and cameras . . . Visitors were strictly banned from a set on this picture. It was the one where Mr. Douglas takes a bath. But at noon a couple of ladies were allowed to go on, since the cast was at lunch. Imagine their horror to see Melvyn still sitting in the tub, calmly munching a sandwich.

get them straightened out you might enjoy yourself. Certainly you won't find many of the characters dull. Preston Foster gives a good performance as a policeman with a love of duty, while Guinn Williams plays another copper with one love—for a good fight. And Alan Mowbray is still nonchalant, but this time he has definite ulterior motives. His idea is to frame his ward's (Florine McKinney) kidnapping, and get some ransom money from Margaret Callahan for his trouble. Here's where Preston Foster gets busy. First, of course, he falls in love with Margaret Callahan. Several reels of good old rough stuff follow before justice and true love crash through to victory. Some people prefer an evening of solitaire, or even bridge, to this sort of thing.

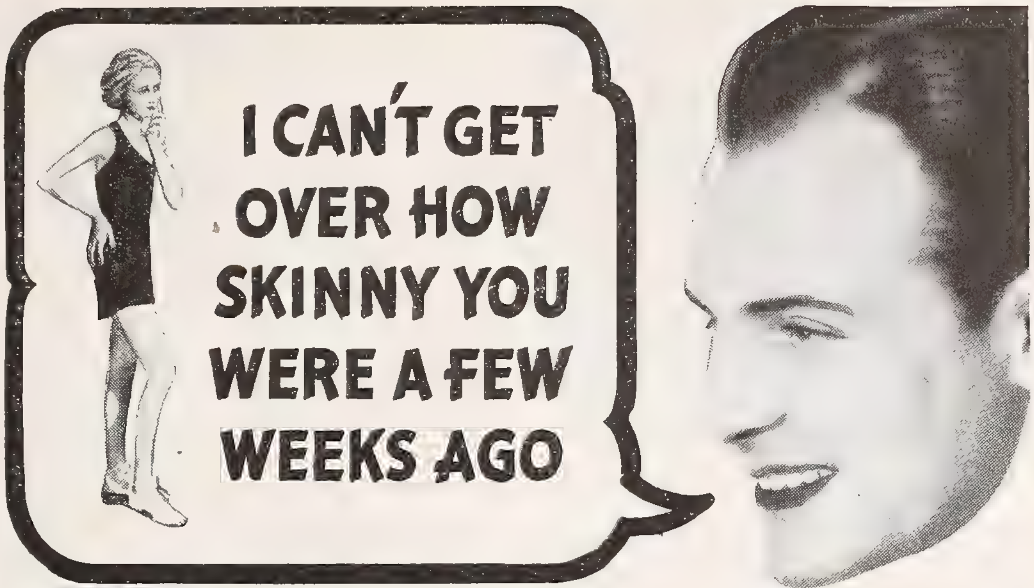
Charles Vidor, director of this one and many another in the past three years since he arrived in Hollywood, is the town's foremost linguist. On the set, Vidor speaks to his actors and workmen in their native tongues—whether English, Italian, Hungarian, Russian, French or German. He used to be a director on German pictures, though a native Hungarian. Then came Hollywood, where he met and married Karen Morley. They have one son, who can't even speak English . . . Preston Foster has not only played about as many different types on the screen as is possible for a young man less than thirty, but he's had just as varied a career in real life. He's been a newsboy, lifeguard, shipping clerk, service station server, salesman, opera singer and actor before coming to the screen. Foster is another of these he-men who refuse doubles. Maxie Rosenbloom, yep, the Maxie, plays one of the gangsters in this picture. It's up to Foster to knock him out in one scene. And Preston laid Maxie out flatter'n flat . . . Margaret Callahan hadn't a desire in the world to go on the stage. But after a part in the school play at graduation time, she became so enamored of the stage that nothing stopped her till she landed a job . . . Clarence Muse and his son appear in this one. Clarence is as popular a man as you'll find any place among stage folk. And Clarence, Jr., is a chip off the old block.



I CAN'T GET OVER HOW SKINNY YOU WERE A FEW WEEKS AGO

Pat's Pal, "Banksy"

her birthday by signing a long term contract. At fourteen years of age, she had set out to become a star.

The thing that happens to so many young actresses, happened to Patricia. Because of her matured appearance, people were under the impression that she was much older than her given age. At heart, Patricia was merely a child. For her screen roles she had to wear sophisticated clothes and act in a grown-up manner. At fifteen she was trying to portray women, who had lived, loved and lost. People were inclined to expect too much, judge too harshly and condemn too easily. Patricia wasn't ready yet to accept the many responsibilities that are all part of a screen career. Life became a series of misunderstandings with the ever-faithful "Banksy" trying to catch up the loose ends.

WITH Patricia launched on a screen career and away at the studio all day long, her husband actively engaged in the theatre, Mrs. Leftwich turned to the social life she loved so much. Being young and beautiful, her delightful company was sought-after in Hollywood's social whirl.

Patricia would return home after a difficult day at the studio and find the house filled with guests. With an early morning call it was impossible for her to remain up and yet she didn't want to appear rude to her mother's guests. Mr. Leftwich, deep in his plans for the future, concentrated on work. So with three temperamental people pulling in three opposite directions, living under one roof became a problem. No one was to blame. Nothing could be done. Each had his own life to live and at it's best, mixing a theatrical career and domesticity was an impossibility.

Recently, Alexander Leftwich and his wife were divorced. There were no hard-feelings, they parted as friends. Living together under such circumstances eventually would have killed all their respect for each other, they decided to separate. While her step-father went back to his producing world, Patricia and "Banksy" took a top-floor apartment in the exclusive Hollywood district. Her mother since has gone on a trip and will be away for months.

During the dramatic unfolding of family affairs, "Banksy" remained a silent, knowing witness. Never once did she express an opinion unless it was asked of her. Yet from time to time, each member would come to her and confide his problems. It was up to "Banksy" to listen to all, advise each and betray none. Her position was that of maid; but it required all the delicacy of a diplomat never to stand between Patricia and her parents, yet remain loyal and true to the little girl who had grown up to mean so much to her.

"I love Patricia as if she were my very own," says "Banksy." "We've sort of grown up together. At times it's been very difficult. Loving her so much, I've never wanted to see any harm come to her. Ofttimes I've had to bite my tongue while I stood by, watching her make mistakes. I could have saved her from them, but I felt if she learned her lessons early in life, they would be lasting.

"It seems like I've known Patricia all her life. She has never once told a lie to me. And I think it is because she knows I would never tell one to her. Our friendship has always been just that way. Many times she has come to me with problems. When I speak my mind, she sometimes gets out of patience. But the beautiful part about Patricia is that if I am right, she doesn't come to me afterwards and give me a chance to say, 'I told you so.' That would be very embarrassing to me. She just goes ahead and takes my advice and lets me see her doing it.

"Patricia is still so young and, like all young people, inclined to be intolerant and impatient. I believe it is wrong to depend too much on others. To our ownselves we must be true and regardless of what world we live in, we should be our best in that particular world. Life is just like a poker game and sooner or later someone calls your bluff.

"These are some of the things I've tried to teach Patricia. I never try to force them but rather present them to her for what they are worth. She is an individual and has her own life to live. She has to think things out for herself. I am only here to help when I can—in case she ever needs me."

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE—WITHOUT CALOMEL

And You'll Jump out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

THE liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile onto the food you swallow every day. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

A mere movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c at all drug stores. © 1935, C. M. Co.

The House of Morgan

back from his forehead as if there were nothing more important to be done in the world, just as if she wasn't acutely aware that the die of their entire future was about to be cast, and said: "Exactly, Frank. It's my happiness, too. And I can't be happy unless you are. So you see it really is up to you. Fifteen thousand dollars a year! That's a great deal of money, isn't it? But I'm not sure happiness for some people doesn't cost more than that."

Then, her eyes level with his eyes, she asked, "What do you truly want to do?"

All of which is one of the reasons why Frank today says that Alma is responsible for his success. She believed in him. She was willing to string along on a little when she might have had a great deal. And all of which is also why, taking no credit away from Alma Morgan—that I say Frank is the one who should be applauded. It takes the rarest kind of courage, moral courage, for a man to take his wife at her word at such a crucial time.

Not long ago, I lunched with Frank Morgan in his dressing-room. In an adjoining room, where his valet answered the telephone and pressed a pair of striped trousers, there were riding boots sprawled on the floor and a variety of cravats hung over the back of a chair.

OUTSIDE, a studio worker was painting a bright star on Frank's dressing-room door. The splendid characterizations he has contributed to pictures like "Naughty Marietta," "I Live My Life" and "The Perfect Gentleman," and before this "The Affairs of Cellini," have for some time entitled him to one of the handsomest salary checks any stock player receives and now he has stardom itself. He did well to stick to the theatre years ago, you see, discouraged as he must have been when those with whom he worked began outshining him.

"However," he said, and in his eyes there was that same amused tolerance he shows on the screen, "I've always known I must work for everything, that success never will come quickly for me. I'm not one to shoot ahead like a comet, I must make my own way slowly and painstakingly.

"When I first came to Hollywood I had the same experience. In New York I'd had hits. After playing in 'Topaze' I'd become a fair-sized name in the theatre. But out here they said, 'He looks like a banker!' And I was cast as one banker after another. In spite of my record, it never seemed to occur to anyone that I might be good as anything else. And since my agent never had seen me on the stage he hardly was qualified to argue for my versatility."

The slow Morgan smile so familiar to movie-goers washed across his face. You get the feeling that life amuses him always, even when it goes contrary to the way he would have it go. Which in itself shows a kind of wisdom.

"One day," he said, "I remember I got a little provoked. I suggested to my agent that a salesman wouldn't attempt to sell a car without knowing what was under the hood and I tried to point out that this was exactly what he was trying to do with me. But he only smiled, the way agents feel they have to smile at actors, and I kept right on playing bankers for a long time after that. While I tried to content myself with the large sums of money they paid me."

But to get back to the main story of Frank and Alma Morgan, there was another time when Frank was rehearsing for a play which promised to be a turning point in his career. After the dress rehearsal he and Alma went out for supper. They had a little celebration. Sweetbreads. Champagne.

"Frank," she asked over the sparkling rim of her glass, "just what are you trying to get across there in the second act?"

Storm signals went up in his eyes. "What am I trying to get across in the second act?" he demanded. "Good Heavens, it seems to me I make it obvious enough. As a matter of fact, if ever in my life I did a good piece of work, I do it there."

Telling about this row the other day Frank was amused. "You know how furious we always get," he said, "when someone puts his finger on the very thing about which we ourselves are doubtful. I'd worked hard on that second act simply because deep down inside of me I hadn't been any too sure about it. So, of course, when Alma questioned me I blew up.

"However," he continued, "for hours that night I did considerable thinking. I'd disagreed with Alma and I'd acted darn unpleasant, but the things she said had impressed me."

The following evening when the play opened Frank changed his second act performance entirely. The critics raved. And the play did prove an important milestone in his career. Consequently, this is another time when he gives Alma credit. But, again with praise for Alma for keeping her perspective and having the courage to speak her mind, I think Frank deserves a credit line, too. For not being as set and stubborn as many men would have been in his place. For having the good grace to turn around and change his performance. And, when he came out on the stage in response to the applause he received, for making Alma who was in the audience, such a deep and sweeping bow that waves of color flooded her face, and her heart began thumping in a way too few wives' hearts ever thump once their wedding rings have lost their pristine shine.

IT was here fairly recently that there was apprehension on the M-G-M lot about one of Frank's pictures. His producer thought it might be a good idea to junk the film shot and start on something else. Frank, however, really thought the picture was amusing and that he was giving a good performance. And, contrary to the general belief, actors don't always believe this about themselves, especially intelligent actors like Frank Morgan.

"I'll tell you what," Frank said to his producer, "my wife, as you know, isn't an actress. And she doesn't know why a thing isn't good or how it should be changed. But I've reason to trust her instincts. Let me run the film we've shot for her before I decide whether or not I want to call quits."

The producer agreed. That same night Frank and Alma had dinner in the studio commissary. Then they went over to the projection room. "I want the truth," he told her. In over twenty years of marriage she never had given him anything else and he knew it. But this was important. A great deal depended upon this picture.

"I think it's fun," Alma said when the film had been run. "And I think you're splendid. And I may as well tell you I was prepared for the worst. You've taken this part so seriously, I thought you'd probably gotten yourself all tied up in knots and that it showed on the screen. I was ready to admit you seemed strained and to suggest it might be a good idea if you went off on a little tear, loosened up, and then started all over again."

This was all Frank needed. He went to the producer. "Sorry," he said looking anything but sorry, looking downright jubilant, "I've bad news for you. I want to go on with this picture. Alma likes it. So I believe in it."

They finished the picture and it's been a success. Proving once again, according to Frank, that he wouldn't be where he is today if it weren't for Alma. She sounds darn swell, no doubt about that. But I can count on my thumbs the men I know who would admit being influenced by what their wives thought about their affairs. So I certainly think he deserves honorable mention here. Besides few actors or artists or writers ever have sense enough to know that others might have a better perspective on their work than they themselves could have.

So it goes. Frank says he wouldn't be where he is today if it weren't for Alma. And I say Alma wouldn't be where she is today if it weren't for Frank. And as you can see for yourself we're both right. And as you also can see for yourself all of this is why over twenty years of happiness have come to the House of Morgan and why, through thick and thin—which is the only way that counts—Frank's and Alma's marriage has been a success.

She Knows Wives!

any other girl in pictures or out.

"How'd you do it?" I asked Myrna, when I finally caught up with her.

"Do what?" she came back at me innocently.

"How do you know so much about wives? Where'd you get all this dope that enables you to make a girl in one picture one sort of wife and in another another sort. I could name you half a dozen actresses (single), who would have played all those wives alike and another half dozen (married), who would have played themselves every time."

"Well, don't name them," Myrna begged hastily. "I don't want to be a party to your blasphemies against the art of my fellow workers."

"If I leave you out of my blasphemies, will you break down and give out about wives?" I asked cautiously.

"I don't really know very much about wives," she answered, and then, rather hastily, "or about husbands, either. But here's a thought: Years and years ago when I was but a tot, there was a perfectly swell actress on the legitimate stage named Blanche Bates who was playing in a show called 'Nobody's Widow.' Now, Miss Bates had never been a widow. When someone asked her how she played the part so convincingly, she said that when she was cast for the role she made her friends give dinners for her and she saw to it that at every dinner there was at least one widow. She made a study of them. That has always stuck in my mind because I thought, 'There is a woman who knows what she's doing. There's no guess work with her.'

"When I was cast for my first wife—in 'The Animal Kingdom'—I read the script and my first reaction was 'What a perfectly horrible person!'

THEN I began looking around among my married acquaintances to see if there were any who possessed any of the traits of that girl. I finally found, to my surprise, that there was one girl who was not unlike her. What surprised me was that I had never before thought of this girl as being particularly cold or selfish. She just had seemed human with average faults, good qualities, etc.

"So, I thought that probably this girl in 'The Animal Kingdom' wasn't as bad as I had pictured her. She was a girl who had always had plenty of money, she'd gone to finishing school, she had made up her mind to make a good marriage and when she made it I don't believe she was consciously trying to dominate her husband or regulate his life. She was simply trying to work out her marital problems according to her idea of the dictates of good taste. That that might not also have been her husband's, never occurred to her. She simply had no imagination and she was devoid of a sense of humor. That's how I played her. I simply tried to make her human.

"In 'Manhattan Melodrama,' I was the thoughtful, considerate type."

Myrna paused and drew a breath. In her smart blue outfit, with her hair blowing carelessly about, she looked too kiddish to be discussing marriage and wives.

"Where did you find the prototype of that wife?" I inquired.

"Don't use language like that right after lunch," she instructed me severely. "That girl had been through the mill, and I think if it hadn't been for the censors, we might have discovered there was more to her past than met the eye.

"'The Thin Man,' of course, was vastly different. There was the type of wife every girl would like to be—or nearly every one. I suppose there are girls who think a 'sense of duty' is more important and that a man's creature comforts should be looked after before his spiritual welfare.

"Anyhow, the girl in that picture had a swell sense of humor. She and her husband were casual about everything. They wouldn't, for the world, let anyone see how much they really cared for each other."

MYRNA raved on in her enthusiasm over "The Thin Man." Personally, my belief is that, whether she realizes it or not, her enthusiasm for this part is due to the fact that Nora more closely approximated the kind of wife she, herself, would be. She has a cryptic sort of humor and she is, I imagine, the kind of girl who would never let her emotions play too near the surface.

At any rate, that wife was every man's dream of what a wife should be—a swell looking dish, a wisecracker, a pal, a girl who never lost her temper, who didn't jump at conclusions AND who wasn't always fussing over a guy.

"'Evelyn Prentice,'" she was saying, "came right after 'The Thin Man' and it nearly broke Bill's and my hearts. Evelyn was the neglected type of wife. We had just built up this marvelous illusion of marriage as it should be, in the former picture, and then, in the latter, we had to turn right around and tear it down. In this one I was just a patient Griselda who suffered and suffered, in silence, waiting for things to get better. I know you've seen that type of wife. Personally, I've always wanted to strangle them.

"I shouldn't complain, however, and the only reason I mention it is because it was at such variance with the one in 'The Thin man.' Anyhow, it was another and different type in my long career of wives and in the end it turned out to be a rather interesting characterization.

"As I said before, all you can do with any of them is to try to make them human. They don't have to be models of virtue or cleverness if one can just find some way to make them live. And that's what I've tried to do."

"What kind of a wife are you playing next?" I mocked.

"Well, as you know, the picture is called 'Wife versus Secretary.' I'm the wife, Jean Harlow the secretary and Bill Powell is the man in the case. You can see I'll have my work cut out for me.

"You know," she went on, "I'm terrified at playing so many wives. They could so easily become a trial. How to keep playing them and make each one different. I'm afraid I'll get so after awhile all my wives will be alike—just as you've seen players of whom people say, 'Oh, he's always the same.'

"Imagine Mr. Powell's calm resignation if I developed into that type of screen wife and when we were cast in 'Some Sweet Day' he'd ask me, before starting the picture, 'Are you going to be the same type wife in this as you've been in the last four pictures we've played in? Can't you do something to make this one a little different?'

"It would be very humiliating. And, even as it is, I've reached the point where I've discovered that husbands are just as different in real life as the wives are. I find myself looking at this man and that, mentally figuring what kind of a wife would suit this one and what kind would suit that one. I also catch myself speculating on the appalling possibility of marrying this man or that one of my acquaintance, wondering if I should have to change my whole personality in order to become the type of wife I'd decided would best suit him—and if I did do that, if the personality of that wife would fit me!

"You can see," she continued anxiously, "it's not a question that can be opened and closed very casually. It's a matter that requires a great deal of concentration and I really haven't time to go into it.

"Oh, yes!" she burst out ecstatically as I rose to go. "I forgot to tell you, some day not too far distant, I return to my first love. We're going to do the sequel to 'The Thin Man.'"

"It couldn't possibly be," I jeered, "that your enthusiasm for that part is occasioned by the fact that it turned out to be your biggest box-office success?"

"No!" she answered promptly. "I'd have loved her if she hadn't made a dime. She was so matter-of-fact about everything I didn't need to use gestures. We Anglo-Saxons like to think of ourselves as being so casual about everything that we don't need to gesticulate to express ourselves or emphasize our meaning."

"How about your Orientals?" I asked maliciously.

Those early Oriental parts of hers are a sore spot with Myrna, but she acted like a little lady and hid her chagrin. "Quiet, please. Couldn't you tell from my characterizations that I didn't know anything about Orientals?"

"Well, we'll skip the Orientals," I conceded, "but you sure know all about wives."

"We'll skip the wives, too," Myrna decided. "This was just a discussion between us. If I'd go on record about wives, all the wives in the country would be down on me. How can a single girl discuss wives? Anyhow, I think the wives are all swell and it's a miracle to me how they do as good a job as they do, considering what they have to put up with. It's the husbands, not the wives, who are the problems!"

MANY NEVER SUSPECT CAUSE OF BACKACHES

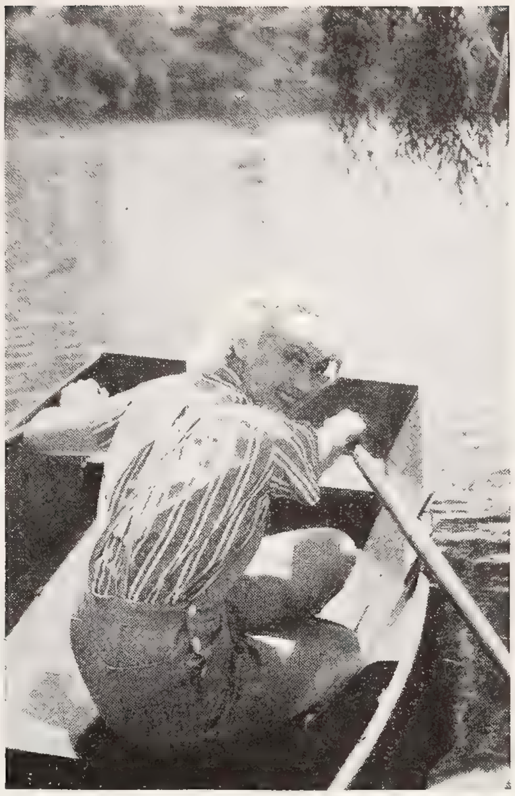
This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief Of Pain

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are one of Nature's chief ways of taking the acids and waste out of the blood. If they don't pass 3 pints a day and so get rid of more than 3 pounds of waste matter, your 15 miles of kidney tubes may need flushing.

If you have trouble with frequent bladder passages with scanty amount which often smart and burn, the 15 miles of kidney tubes may need flushing out. This danger signal may be the beginning of nagging backache, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes and dizziness.

Don't wait for serious trouble. Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills — used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help flush out the 15 miles of kidney tubes. Get Doan's Pills.



There's nothing like rowing to keep one's figure in tip top form, is Joan Blondell's sage advice to the gals.

KATHRYN BARNES, De Soto, Mo.—Alan Baxter played the role of Babe Wilson in "Mary Burns, Fugitive." His next picture will be "Thirteen Hours By Air" and he is under contract to Walter Wanger Productions, 1040 N. Las Palmas, Hollywood, Cal.

HENRY WADSWORTH: Here's another who's gone a long way, since he checked out of Maysville, Ky., where he was born. His father was an attorney and Henry was brought up in a large house and in well-to-do circumstances. Having graduated from the University of Kentucky in Lexington, he later attended the Carnegie Institute of Technology in Pittsburgh. Henry had always wanted to be an actor, had earned his college degree in Drama, and had always been the shining light of school plays. Leaving Carnegie he went to New York with his degree, fifty dollars and high hopes. These hopes were dimmed and he was forced to play in vaudeville until he landed a job in a Pawtucket, R. I., stock company, where he was immediately successful in juvenile roles. Then Broadway offered him the lead in one of its shows, "Tommy." Since then he has worked constantly, going from Broadway to various stock companies all over the country, from New York to Hollywood and the movies and back again. He is 5 feet 10 inches tall, weighs 150 pounds and has brown hair and blue eyes. He is under contract to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal., where he recently completed an important role in "The Voice of Bugle Ann." Another recent release is "Ceiling Zero."

was the son of non-professionals. The family moved to Pitman, N. J., where he completed his education and paid for it by doing odd jobs such as gardening, selling pianos and working in an ice house. Finally he became shipping clerk for the Victor Talking Machine Company at Camden, N. J., where he remained for two years. Possessing a rich baritone voice he began appearing in amateur entertainments, finally gave up his job and began to do concert work, later singing over the radio. Then came an opening in the chorus of the La Scala Opera Company in Philadelphia which gave him an opportunity to work up to secondary, then leading roles in the Pennsylvania Grand Opera Co. Then a brief excursion into vaudeville, followed by dramatic roles in New York stage plays. A Warner Brothers scout signed him to a contract and he has been in Hollywood ever since. Married to a non-professional, he loves the outdoors and his hobby is boating. He keeps in physical condition by punching the bag and the use of a rowing machine. Preston is 6 feet 2 inches tall, weighs 196 pounds, has brown curly hair and blue eyes. His most recent picture is "Muss 'Em Up," and his next, "Love Before Breakfast," with Carole Lombard. Write him at the RKO-Radio Studios, 780 N. Gower St., Hollywood, Cal.

M.S. READER, Baltimore, Md.—You can collect the bet. William Powell is not Dick Powell's father, nor is he any relation to him. Methinks Bill would be anything but flattered!

ELEANOR POWELL: Do you remember seeing this dancing demoness in "George White's Scandals"? Not many do, but that was her first picture. Her full name is Eleanor Torrey Powell and she's nicknamed Ding. Born on November 21, 1913, in Springfield, Mass., Miss Powell attended dancing school as a child and made her first professional appearance at Atlantic City when she was thirteen. For several years she alternated between Springfield and dancing lessons in the winter, and Atlantic City and professional dancing in the summer. In 1929 she started to take tap lessons, then began her New York career in earnest with "Follow Thru," her first show. Then came other Broadway musicals and the title of "World's Greatest Feminine Tap Dancer." She has always loved sports, especially horseback riding and swimming. She names gardenias as her favorite flower, blue as her favorite color and roast beef and ice cream as her pet foods. Miss Powell is unmarried, weighs 122 pounds and is 5 feet 5¼ inches tall. Her hair is chestnut and her eyes blue. After "Broadway Melody of 1936" she returned to New York to appear in a musical show, and her studio is as anxiously awaiting her return to Hollywood for another picture as the rest of us. Write her at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal.

HILMA TAYLOR, Omaha, Nebr.—Henry Fonda, who was so good in "Way Down East," "The Farmer Takes a Wife" and "I Dream Too Much," will be seen next in "The Moon's Our Home." His leading lady will be Margaret Sullavan, to whom he was formerly married.

ROBERT DONAT: Chalk up another hit for this marvelous male. If you haven't seen "The Ghost Goes West" you've really missed a treat, and further proof that Mr. Donat has what it takes. "The Private Life of Henry VIII" was his first picture. "The Count of Monte Cristo"—which really launched him—was his second, and "Thirty-nine Steps" his next to last. Born in Withington, Manchester, England, on March 18, 1905, he gave evidence of acting ability at a tender age. 1921 marked his professional stage debut which was followed by several years spent in stock and repertory theatres touring the English provinces. Mr. Donat's London success was in "Knave and Queen," which was followed by many others. He has brown eyes and auburn hair, stands 6 feet tall and weighs 165 pounds. He is modest, soft-spoken and has a grand sense of humor, getting a great kick out of the way Americans pronounce his name—Doan-at is correct. Roast beef and American ham and eggs are his favorite foods. He and his wife have two very young children, John and Joanna. Right now there are two pictures for him in the offing. They are "Knight Without Armor" with Merle Oberon, and "Hamlet."

"Chawmed, I'm Sure!"

Pitts. Their eyes met, they smiled. They stopped, shook hands and began talking about which drug store was best in their neighborhood.

It is difficult, Claudette says, to know whether she has actually been introduced or has just seen the person on the screen. All stars are movie fans themselves and the faces of their co-workers are all familiar. Once in New York, Claudette was in the ladies' room of a smart hotel. Irene Rich came in. And Claudette couldn't, for the life of her, remember whether someone had once introduced her to Irene or whether it was just because the face was so familiar, the mannerisms and gestures so well-known that it seemed as if they were old friends. They looked at each other, hesitated a moment and then spoke formally. Each was embarrassed.

AND then there was the time when Claudette Colbert and Constance Bennett, who had never seen each other off the screen before, sat in the same small doctor's anteroom waiting for appointments. Furtively, from behind copies of magazines, they looked at each other. When their eyes met, each pretended a tremendous interest in her own particular periodical. And each fervently prayed that the doctor would arrive soon. But he didn't. Finally Claudette dropped her magazine and said, "Listen, my name's Colbert and I work in the movies."

Connie feigned seriousness. "My name's Bennett. You might have heard of my father. He was on the stage." And then they both laughed and were chatting so intimately when they were called for their appointments that they kept the doctor waiting.

But perhaps one of the most amusing of Claudette's first meetings was one with Shirley Temple. It happened the night that Claudette won the Motion Picture Academy award for her performance in "It Happened One Night." She had, as you know, not expected to win and was called at her home just as she was about to leave for the station to catch the train for New York. They told her to appear immediately, so she arrived at the swanky dinner in a plain brown traveling suit—the rest of the stars were dressed up to the eye-brows.

Just as she was rushing in, she was stopped at the door by a dozen photographers, one of whom deposited Shirley Temple in her arms. The idea was that pictures were to be taken of Shirley handing Claudette the trophy. And, naturally, no one thought to say, "Miss Colbert, Miss Temple."

The cameramen took a long time arranging their lights. Shirley was standing on a table beside Claudette holding the heavy silver trophy. Finally the child began to cry. "I know, darling," Claudette said. "You must be tired and I'm sure you've worked hard all day. But never mind, they'll be through in a minute and you can rest."

Shirley sniffled. "Oh, no, it isn't that," she said. "I'm not tired at all. But I hate being out here. I want to be in there at the banquet. I'm afraid I'm missing something."

ONE of the few people that Claudette met formally was Norma Shearer. It happened at a party, the hostess introduced them and left them alone. Each is a great admirer of the other's work. Each wanted to tell the other so, but it seemed like flattery. They started, at last, to talk about pictures they had recently seen and Claudette told Norma she thought she was swell. And Norma told Claudette she was grand. And that was that.

For a long time Irene Dunne had admired Edna May Oliver as an actress. And if she missed a single one of Edna's screen sniffs she felt cheated. Often she asked the studio to run Miss Oliver's films over and over again for her. They worked on the same lot, but had never met.

One day Irene, her maid in tow, was hurrying from the set on which she was working to her dressing-room. Coming toward them were Edna May and her maid. The two maids spoke but the actresses hesitated. The maids then, seeing their mistresses hesitating, introduced them to each other. And that was the beginning of a mutual admiration society!

Another friendship developed from a real "fan" meeting. Ann Sothern was an ardent admirer of Joan Bennett. She was as anxious to meet her as you would be. Ann had planned a New York vacation and had made her reservation on a transcontinental airplane. Then she read in the paper that Joan Bennett was going to New York by plane the day before. Ann changed her reservation so that the time of departure would coincide with Joan's. Once in the plane they began to talk and the friendship grew until in New York they lived in the same hotel. They are now almost inseparable.

THE meeting of Mary Brian and June Collyer, however, was not begun with mutual admiration. Mary thought that anyone as pretty as June must be conceited and Mary loathes self-satisfied people. They were introduced by the director, when both worked in a film together. June asked Mary to lunch, Mary declined. But a Hollywood studio is a small world and when Mary walked into the restaurant the only seat vacant was at June's table. There was nothing for her to do but to sit down, embarrassed as she was, but June was so gracious that Mary was put immediately at her ease. She began to like June in spite of herself. They lunched together regularly during the making of the picture, became fast friends and when June's baby was christened Mary was the godmother.

Yes, Hollywood is a small town. By rights everyone should know everyone else. Certainly the faces are familiar enough. So maybe Emily Post should be called in to write a new book of etiquette with a chapter on "Introductions for the Famous." It might save a lot of embarrassing situations in Hollywood. And then again, it might not.

Johnny Arledge and Louise Latimer provide the romantic interest in "Thorobreds All."

HE WANTED NO MARRIAGE TIES

"I don't trust women!" he told her.

Women were cheats! Women were chiselers!

Dr. Frank Hare could not hide the bitterness he felt toward all women.

For five long years Stacia Babcock had tried in vain to break down the wall he had built around his heart. And then he spoke, at last, of love. But he did not believe in marriage. Stacia did not argue with him . . . She knew the futility of that. But always she hoped for a miracle of understanding between herself and the temperamental, moody man beside her. But there seemed no sense even in hoping. Already they were miles apart, hating each other while reluctantly loving . . . each stubbornly clinging to a different idea of what love really meant.

Could this girl sacrifice her ideals, her dreams, to keep the love of this man? Read the thrilling novelette, "WHY THE WEDDING RING?" in the April issue

The Best GRAY HAIR Remedy is Made at Home

You can now make at home a better gray hair remedy than you can buy, by following this simple recipe: To half pint of water add one ounce bay rum, a small box of Barbo Compound and one-fourth ounce of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it yourself at very little cost. Apply to the hair twice a week until the desired shade is obtained. Barbo imparts color to streaked, faded or gray hair, makes it soft and glossy and takes years off your looks. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy and does not rub off.

There's an interesting tale—well, anyway, we like it—connected with Paramount's "13 Hours by Air," which has to do with transcontinental air travel. The Fred MacMurray-Joan Bennett opus was purchased a couple of years ago under the title of "21 Hours by Air." Air transportation has speeded up so in the past year that the story, while lying on the shelf, underwent two title changes, "18 Hours by Air" to "14 Hours by Air." Right now it's down to 13, so if a picture arrives in your neighborhood entitled "10 Minutes by Air," you can tell your friends you knew it when.

And now Warners are about to remake "Main Street." If it turns out well you can thank director Archie Mayo, who has been hounding the producers for months insisting they re-shoot the Sinclair Lewis classic. The Warner Brothers finally relented, but they compromised with Mr. Mayo. They're going to let him make the picture, but he has to call it "I Married a Doctor."

No one has ever questioned the diplomacy of the Japanese, and Joan Crawford probably never will. Recently her gardener asked her out to the Tone garden to show her some of his handiwork. Mrs. T. noted with pleasure a large "JOAN" spelled out in parsley. In the next bed, and also in parsley, the tactful gardner had spelled out "MINA," the name of Joan's cook. "You like it?" beamed the gardener. "I made it for the two ladies of the house."

While Shirley Temple may be the sweetheart of 20th Century-Fox, anyone around the lot will tell you that the studio's Number One siren is Jane Withers. The present object of her attentions is Paul Kelly, and she won him by an insidious campaign which began with clipping news items about Kelly and presenting them to him. Next she inquired about his attitude toward Shirley. When she found out he admired her rival, Jane immediately went into "The Good Ship Lollypop," doing a swell impersonation of Shirley, which cinched matters for her. Now, whenever the Kelly attentions waver, Jane merely goes into a Temple routine.

Perhaps the most interesting production of the moment is "Princess Charming," mainly because everyone is sitting around waiting for an explosion of some sort. Josef von Sternberg, who is not the most placid guy in town, is directing, and his stars are Grace Moore and Franchot Tone. Miss Moore is no blushing violet when it comes to standing up for her rights in a picture, all of which has everyone on the set keeping their fingers crossed, for when the blow-up arrives they're wagering you can hear it all the way to Pasadena.

We're still puzzling about the Jessie Matthews situation. The charming English gal, a British stage and screen favorite, was signed several months ago by M-G-M to co-star in a musical with Bob Montgomery. After the release of her latest picture, "First a Girl," in which she received many nice adjectives from the critics, M-G-M bought off her contract and will substitute Eleanor Powell in the forthcoming musical. It'll be nice to see the Powell lass once more, but it also would have been nice to get a first-hand look at England's best-looking screen star.

Things were pretty tense on the Warner lot for a while, too. Out there they're making a screen version of "The Green Pastures," and the cast, of course, is colored. On the next set another group of colored performers were doing a musical number called "Save Me, Sister" for Al Jolson's "The Singing Kid." The "Green Pastures" contingent would have nothing at all to do with their colored brethren on the next set. The air of mystery was finally cleared up by Rex Ingram, who plays De Lawd in "The Green Pastures." "Over there," he said, "they're doing just exactly what we're preaching against in our picture."

There is also quite a bit of dissension and looking askance among the members of the cast of "The Green Pastures." During the making of the Heaven scenes, the older actors, who are angels in the production, looked with disdain on the younger element, which devoted its between-scenes moments to truckin' and various other forms of Harlem hot-stepping. The angels feel that truckin' has no place in Heaven.

One of the longest single speeches in pictures was delivered by Douglas Dumbrille for a scene in "Opera Hat." The speech was a 750-word number which consumes three minutes of the film. A 3-minute speech is not unusual on the stage, but in picture's it's something of a record—so much so that on each take the extras on the sidelines laid bets with each other as to whether or not Dumbrille would go through it with no errors. Naturally, the scene was shot several times before it was satisfactory. By our watch the speech was recorded for posterity in 45 minutes.

There was a surprised gang of cowboys on the "Sutter's Gold" location trip recently, and it's all because of Binnie Barnes. Every day during production Binnie saddled a horse and enjoyed a short ride around the lot. One morning one of the cowboys in the picture tried, as a gag, to lasso her, but he missed. Binnie borrowed his rope, and proceeded to give the boys a neat demonstration of trick and fancy twirling, much to their amazement. What they didn't know was that Binnie started her professional career on the vaudeville stage in Australia as a fancy roper, and she still knows a trick or two.

Perhaps this isn't amusing, but it seemed funny to us at the moment. Watching a picture in production at Universal, we noticed, sitting in a canvas-backed chair, a large Indian squaw, smoking a pipe and waiting her turn to go on. On the back of the chair was the hand-lettered inscription: CAROLE LOMBARD.

The long-anticipated Astaire twins turned out to be one small boy, weighing somewhere in the vicinity of seven pounds. Fred didn't appear downcast at the solo performance and his wife, the former Phyllis Potter, has two sons now, anyway, one by her former marriage. (Cont'd on page 126)

TAKE A BEAUTY LAXATIVE

You can't expect to have a peaches-and-cream complexion unless you maintain regular habits of elimination.

Don't let more than one day go by without coming to Nature's aid with a beauty laxative.

Olive Tablets are mild and gentle and non-habit-forming. They bring about the desired result promptly.

Accumulated body waste is an enemy of health and beauty. Get rid of stored-up poisons quickly by taking a beauty laxative.

MORE GOOD NEWS

The younger set at the Biltmore Bowl—Grace Durkin, Dick Cromwell, Phil Reed and Anita Louise—have a grand time.

Irene Hervey, minus Bob Taylor, at the Club Seville. Her escort is Allan Jones, handsome baritone.

Lew Ayres, Phyllis Frazer, Ben Alexander and Ginger Rogers. Ginger went East recently with her mother.

Boris Karloff and Buck Jones, who deal in cold-and-red-blooded screen characters exclusively, aren't that way at all at home. In fact, the Joneses and the Karloffs are in the midst of a friendly rivalry over guess what? Well, if you must know, it's roses. They both grow strange and exotic types of flowers, and when one of them comes through with a new one it's immediately called to the other's attention. Can't you picture Frankenstein's monster out in his garden tenderly nursing a rose, and hoping against hope that he's keeping up with the Joneses?

Loud Cheers Department: Kay Francis, regarded by many as cold and rather haughty, can be credited with one of the nicest deeds that has come to our attention in some time. It seems that several months ago Ruth Jones, secretary to the head of the publicity department at Kay's studio, was severely injured in an automobile accident. As a result, she spent considerable time in a hospital in San Bernardino, some distance from Hollywood. Without fanfare or publicity (up till now) the lovely Kay has paid a good share of the hospital bills, and she and Delmar Daves have been Miss Jones' most constant visitors.

All is now serene in the Warren William menage, but 'twas not always so. The W.'s, as you may have noted from the pictures, have a bar, the walls of which are decorated with the features of two quizzical-looking monkeys. The trouble all started when Warren purchased a pair of real simians. The flesh-and-blood pair were puzzled by their inanimate brethren on the wall. Finally they took to jumping at them, trying to stir up a little action, but the only result was that the wall took a terrible beating. To keep his home intact Warren was forced to get rid of half of his collection, and the live pair were sent into exile.

During the racing season at Santa Anita most of the stars spent their spare time hanging on the rail and betting on favorites. Everyone had his special system of picking winners, but our favorite is Arline Judge's. Arline merely counted the letters in the day of the week it happened to be, and played the horse whose number corresponded. She didn't win a bet that way all season, but the system pleased her highly.

Do you want a letter from Bing Crosby? It's easy; just pan him. It's true, for Bing is a very conscientious guy, and handles his fan mail more carefully than any other star in Hollywood. A request for a picture always brings one, and a letter of praise, of which there are many, brings a nice form letter of appreciation. Comes one of the rare letters which denounce him, and Bing sits himself down and delivers a personal reply, hoping thus to straighten out any dislike the letter writer might have. Bing is to be admired for his industry, so please don't pan him unless you mean it.

We spent a pleasant hour beside a swamp load of crocodiles recently, watching Wallace Beery and John Boles do a scene for "A Message to Garcia." John and Wally are escaping from something or other, and in order to make their getaway they must cross the swamp. Before going on, it might be well to inform you that the largest and most menacing of the reptiles is a studio concoction of rubber, but the smaller amphibians surrounding it are the real thing, in charge of a crocodile trainer (swell profession!). On the second take Mr. Boles, an agile crocodile-dodger, crossed successfully, but Wally, perched on a rock in the middle of the swamp, slipped backward and stepped squarely on the head of one of them, who resented it enough to take a vicious snap at the Beery foot. Wally calmly kicked back at the crocodile and marched indignantly across the swamp to safety. There is no moral to this tale, except that if any crocodiles are reading it, let them be warned not to snap at Mr. B.

MAGIC RECIPES

TRY EAGLE BRAND FOR MAGIC SHORT-CUT COOKING:

Magic! Just 2 ingredients!

COCONUT MACAROONS

½ cup Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk
2 cups shredded coconut

Mix Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk and shredded coconut together. Drop by spoonfuls on buttered baking sheet about 1 inch apart. Bake in moderate oven (350° F.) 10 minutes or until a delicate brown. Remove from pan at once. Makes 24.

Magic! Made in 5 minutes! Failure-proof!

CHOCOLATE FROSTING

2 squares unsweetened chocolate
1⅓ cups (1 can) Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk
1 tablespoon water

Melt chocolate in top of double boiler. Add Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk, stir over boiling water 5 minutes until it thickens. Add water. Cool. Spread on cold cake (bought or home-made). Makes enough frosting to cover tops and sides of 2 (9-inch) layers, or top and sides of loaf cake generously, or about 24 cup cakes.

FROM all parts of the country, from all sorts of people, letters pour in. Like the one illustrated, every one is a true experience—a warning to beware of "B. O." (body odor)! Bathe regularly with Lifebuoy! Its abundant lather purifies, stops "B.O."

For lovelier skin... Lifebuoy cleanses deeply, gently. "Patch" tests on the skins of hundreds of women show it is more than 20% milder than many so-called "beauty soaps."

WANT GREASELESS DISHWASHING?

YOU CAN WIPE THAT PLATE FOR AN HOUR—AND THE GREASE WILL STILL CLING TO IT
I KNOW... I CAN NEVER SEEM TO GET RID OF THE GREASY FILM ON DISHES AFTER I WASH THEM

AND JUST FEEL HOW GREASY THE DISHWATER IS. UGH! HOW I HATE DISHWASHING! AND HOW IT RUINS MY HANDS

USE RINSO. ITS RICH SUDS ABSORB THE GREASE... MAKE IT VANISH. DISHES COME CLEAN WITHOUT A TRACE OF GREASE. AND RINSO IS MARVELOUS FOR THE WEEK'S WASH, TOO. IT'S ALL I USE BECAUSE—

Rinso alone, without the aid of bar soaps, chips or powders, gives a tubful of rich suds that soak clothes whiter without scrubbing or boiling. Even grimy edges come clean with a little gentle rubbing between the fingers. And the dirt doesn't "settle back" because Rinso suds have "lifting power." The dirt is held in suspension. Of course this safe "soak-and-rinse" method is not only easy on me —it's easy on the clothes; that means Rinso saves me lots of money. Rinso is all I ever use for the dishes, woodwork, basins and floors. It saves time and work all through the house. Rinso is recommended by the makers of 33 famous washers for safety and for whiter, brighter clothes. It is tested and approved by Good Housekeeping Institute.

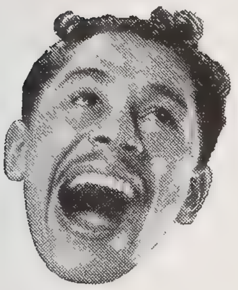
"They love to sing-a"

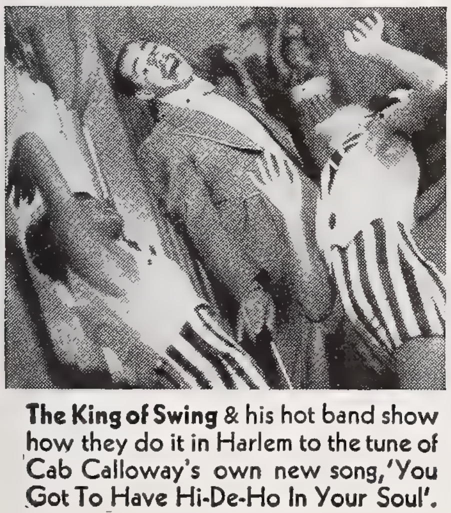


So Al Jolson, Sybil Jason, The Yacht Club Boys, Cab Calloway & His Band, Edward Everett Horton, Wini Shaw, Lyle Talbot, Allen Jenkins and Claire Dodd Have Joined Forces and Voices in a Celebrity-Packed Warner Bros. Song Show That Recalls the Glories of Al's Immortal "Singing Fool."

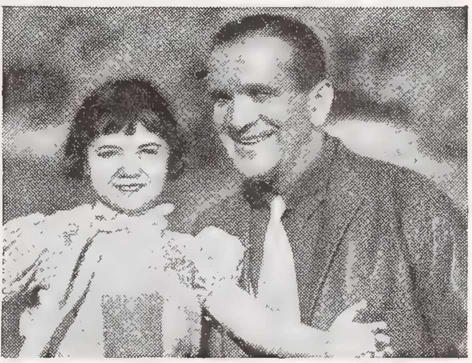
"THE SINGING KID"

THE PICTURE OF THE MONTH

Al knocks 'em dead with 'I Love To Sing-a', 'Save Me Sister' and other torrid tunes by E. Y. Harburg and Harold ('Stormy Weather') Arlen.



The King of Swing & his hot band show how they do it in Harlem to the tune of Cab Calloway's own new song, 'You Got To Have Hi-De-Ho In Your Soul'.



'Sonny Boy' in skirts! The world's greatest and the world's youngest entertainers form one of the most delightful picture partnerships in years.

Those Yacht Club Boys, boast of Broadway's and Hollywood's niftiest night spots, are musically madder than ever in 'My! How This Country Has Changed'.

Girls! Girls! 100's of 'em! bring Harlem to Hollywood in lavish dance numbers staged by Bobby Connolly, forming a gorgeous backdrop for the dramatic story which was directed by William Keighley for First National Pictures.

The Trocadero rocked with merriment one evening recently about two in the morning, for a bicycle party was in progress. All the guests arrived in their best bibs but were asked to enter a bicycle race—the big catch was that the gals couldn't cycle in their evening raiment and so things sorta quieted down.

Some of the star guests that are shown above, left to right: Doug Fairbanks, Jr., gives the old home town the once-over and sits out a dance with Virginia Bruce. Cary Grant and Randolph Scott escort the veddy social Dorothy Fell to the shindig. And Roger Pryor with Ann Sothern deserts the two-wheelers for the more rhythmic and less hectic dancing. These two are still romantically inclined.

Left, Scott catches three interested previewers of "These Three." Ginger Rogers, Joel McCrea and wife, Frances Dee. Frances is certainly masked with those dark cheaters on!

Leave Opera to the Intelligentsia

Recently someone suggested in your columns that Nelson Eddy play opposite Swarthout in "Carmen." Perish the thought! Can we who have seen "Naughty Marietta" and "Rose Marie" conceive of anyone but Jeanette MacDonald as Nelson's singing partner? Of course not!

Being an average college student, who is neither a musical moron nor a musical fanatic, I can only say that opera, even "Carmen," bores me to tears and hurts my ears, except the familiar arias. Of course, we all love selections like the "Toreador Song" because of its melody; because, speaking plainly, it has a tune. But the rest, leave it right where it is, in the opera houses where those few who really enjoy it may hear it. We uncultured people happen to love that "trashy" "Indian Love Call" and we'd rather listen to "Rose Marie" than all of Bizet's operas. Let the poor intelligentsia have Wagner and his fellow composers, but let us remain in our happy, blissful ignorance and satisfy our moronic appetities with Victor Herbert and Rudolph Friml.—Shirley Schottland, New York, N. Y.

Is Screen Drinking Essential?

I find it extremely difficult to criticize a person as delightfully charming and universally loved as William Powell, but I often wonder just how anyone could drink as much liquor as Bill Powell drinks in some of his pictures and still retain his balance, physically and mentally, to the extent of unravelling the most complicated murder cases. Don't you think it a bit far-fetched, to say the least, just a little bit insulting to adult intelligence? Too, the influence is not so good on his young "would-be-sleuth" admirers and, I dare say, he is the idol of as many boys' hearts as of girls'. Don't you think his influence could be just a little more elevating, morally?

Believe me, I am a one hundred per cent Powell fan and consider him second to none when it comes to individual charm and manner of getting that very individual personality of his over to his audience.—Alba M. Wahl, Johnson City, Tenn.

But Is This America?

When Will Hays, the high mogul of the motion picture industry, made the statement that he was "going to sell America to the world" through the medium of the screen, he evidently did not realize the full import of his words.

IT'S A LIE!
RIVERON

Bill Powell's screen drinking is incredible to one fan.

Recently, comments such as these have come to me from the far-flung corners of the earth:

Johannesburg, South Africa: "Our bioscopes (cinemas to you) are always crowded when American pictures are shown, but tell me, is there as much drinking in your country as "Reckless" and other society pictures reveal? I always feel groggy after watching American stars go through their cocktail paces." London, England: "Is it true that most Americans have little respect for law and order, and are the gangster pictures authentic?" Delhi, India: "Is America really a 'land of milk and honey' and are such pictures as 'Forsaking All Others' and 'No More Ladies' typical of American wealth and luxury?" Palestine, Syria: "Why is it that American stenographers dress like heiresses? Are they paid exorbitant salaries, or do they share in common a checking account with the 'big boss'?" Hong Kong, China: "I like your American movie magazines, but it makes me very sad when I read of the instability of the Hollywood homes—too many divorces and trial marriages. I hope it is only publicity."

What a pity, Mr. Hays, that more films showing the lives of the great rank and file of the people are not made!—Corinne Childress, Charlotte, N. C.

When a Star Is Not a Star

Isn't it about time that studio press agents stopped calling every new player "star?" In company with a few million other people, I share the belief that the movie audiences select their favorites and glorify them themselves.

Although I believe that new players should be presented to their public by carefully planned publicity, I don't like to see them billed as stars before they have appeared in a picture.

The unfortunate case of Anna Sten, a million-dollar manufactured "star," should have taught the studios a lesson but apparently it hasn't. The public expressed resentment toward the undeniably talented Miss Sten by almost complete indifference.—E. F. King, Glendale, New York.

CARL LAEMMLE presents

EDNA FERBER'S

"SHOW BOAT"

(Version of 1936)

starring

IRENE DUNNE

ALLAN JONES

Charles Winninger · Paul Robeson

Helen Morgan · Helen Westley

BEYOND QUESTION THE GREATEST SHOW-EVENT OF THE YEAR FOR ALL AGES

THIS 1936 version of Edna Ferber's superb story of the "SHOW BOAT," compared with which every production of its type pales into insignificance, is characterized by GLAMOUR—FASCINATING ROMANCE—BEAUTIFUL, LONG-TO-BE-REMEMBERED NEW MUSIC, new lyrics plus your old favorites, by the masters of melody, Jerome Kern and Oscar Hammerstein II, SCENIC MARVELS and ARTISTS OF RENOWN. We can't enumerate it s multitude of attractions. It will be a striking event in all theatres.

A CARL LAEMMLE, JR. production — directed by JAMES WHALE.

IT'S A UNIVERSAL, OF COURSE!

Nothing could be sweeter than to start this month's proceedings off with a touching little item about friendship. It's the friendship of a man for a little boy. The man is Victor McLaglen, and the little boy is Freddie Bartholomew. During the shooting of "Professional Soldier" Vic became so attached to young Freddie that he wanted to send him a gift as a token of his admiration. Learning that Freddie had just been given a brand new car, Vic, true pal that he is, had the thing equipped with the very latest in automobile accessories—an automatic tear gas gun!

Flash! Here's a Hollywood divorced couple who actually are not friendly! Ruth Chatterton and George Brent, defying the Hollywood tradition, aren't speaking. It all came about because of a gal named Rita Grey. Rita was once Ralph Forbes' secretary, until Ruthie married him and became the young lady's boss, a title which she held through the Forbes and the Brent regimes and until a while ago, when George hired her. Now no one speaks to anyone.

It was a great moment for the sightseers at Glendale Airport when Doug Fairbanks, Junior, stepped off the plane for his first visit in two years. Seems that Fairbanks, père, was on hand to meet his expatriate son, and Fairbanks, père, was attired in the last word in hats, a green chapeau of Tyrolean descent. You can picture his astonishment when the younger Fairbanks appeared at the door of the plane wearing a hat just as green and just as Tyrolean. All of which took a bit of warmth out of their greetings.

Hearts and Flowers: Carole Lombard seems to have given up Bob Riskin temporarily for Cesar Romero, who divides his time between Carole, Betty Furnace, Virginia Bruce and the skating rink in Culver City. . . . Loretta Young spending lots of her spare time with director Eddie Sutherland, whose fourth wife recently returned from Reno . . . and Margaret Sullavan (separated from William Wyler) and Henry Fonda are an occasional twosome.

Autograph hounds and signature collectors can discard anything they may have on hand from the pen of Bob Montgomery, for our Robert has a brand new title. A couple of months ago a little stranger arrived at the Montgomery menage, and he was promptly tagged Robert Montgomery, Jr. So now Bob writes letters to people he doesn't even care about, just so he can sign them "Robert Montgomery, Sr."

Not so long ago it was considered the thing out here to be seen at one of Marion Davies' numerous and elaborate soirees. Nowadays, you're practically nobody until you've attended a Joan Crawford music lesson. Joan takes two lessons daily—one in the morning and one in the afternoon—and at the afternoon session tea is served and the elect gather to sip and listen. Some fun, eh?

Your gossip scribbler finds Hollywood party mad and social

NEWS BY LEO TOWNSEND

Below, Virginia Bruce steps out with two of cinematown's most eligible beaux. On the left, James Stewart and on the right, Henry Fonda. And another threesome is shie on gents! Alice Faye and Dixie Dunbar cheerfully share John McGuire's attentions at the Screen Guild Ball.

There's a certain young actor around town who's noted for his alcoholic as well as his histrionic accomplishments. A couple of months ago he announced he was about to cast off the Demon Rum and dust off once more the mantle of Booth. Ever since his pronouncement a writer has been trying to see him to interview him on his new-found sobriety. But so far the guy hasn't stopped drinking long enough to talk.

The top hats, the white ties and the tails were out in profusion at the "Modern Times" premiere. A Chaplin opening is always something of an event, and the streets for several blocks were lined with people peering into the arriving cars, hoping each would contain a Garbo, a Gable, or a Colbert. A startling note was introduced during the unreeling of one of the short subjects which preceded the feature when a shot of the late John Gilbert was flashed on the screen. A shocked audience applauded timorously, and we noticed that during this short subject both Marlene Dietrich and Virginia Bruce left their seats and stood outside in the lobby.

Not to be outdone by Chaplin, Jean Muir staged a fancy opening at her Workshop Theatre when she premiered her production, "Green Grow the Lilacs," before an audience which paid $5.50 apiece for the privilege. The gathering of notables included even the astute Mr. Percy Hammond, dean of New York's drama critics. Mr. H. flew all the way from New York to see Jean's production, although it is rumored about that he got in on a pass.

Local Girl Makes Good: Talking to Isabel Jewell recently, we complimented her on the critis' raves she received for her dramatic bit as the little seamstress in "A Tale of Two Cities." We learned that while Isabel appreciated the acclaim from the reviewers, what pleased her most was a number of letters from old acquaintances in Faribault, Minnesota, where she attended St. Mary's Hall ten years ago. "And just to show you what fame will do," said Isabel, "when a picture I'm in plays the local theatre, St. Mary's has a half holiday."

Perhaps the strangest affair of the current social season was Donald Ogden Stewart's Nervous Breakdown Party for his wife, who is suffering from same. Mrs. S., under doctor's orders, must retire early each evening, so the party began at noon, with the male guests arriving in top hats and tails, and the ladies bedecked in evening splendor. Along about one o'clock the affair was at its height, with a band blaring away and the guests dancing the afternoon away. Along about two o'clock Carole Lombard made her entrance, made up as a nervous breakdown. And

Everybody turned out for the Screen Guild Ball at the Biltmore. Here are some of the faces that delighted the autograph hounds, lurking in the potted palms! Above, left to right: June Collyer, Norman Foster and wife, Sally Blane. Next, Gene Markey gallantly shares a cocktail with Mrs. Markey, alias Joan Bennett. And Doug Fairbanks, Jr., poses with Marlene Dietrich—at her request!

rumor is rife that most of the party hung around until the crack of dusk.

And Barbara Stanwyck recently stepped out on her first unchaperoned date since the split-up with Frank Fay. We saw her at the Trocadero with that handsome young man about town, Bob Taylor.

The mystery of the month concerns Jeanette MacDonald's new bracelet. It's a golden gadget from which dangle a number of little golden tags, on each of which is inscribed the name of a night club or a theatre, and a date. Jeanette says it was given to her by an admirer to commemorate evenings he had spent with her. But she won't divulge the gent's name, so you can take your choice.

Ida Lupino has a brand new idea in party throwing. If you can't come to one of Ida's parties, Ida brings the party right to your doorstep. Seems she has just purchased a streamlined silver auto trailer equipped with a cocktail bar, which enables her to pick up her guests at their homes, and carry on in all directions. Another advantage for the hostess is that a guest can't very well walk out on her party. He may be miles from home.

Dr. Joel Pressman is still winning his battle with the Hollywood cameramen. Recently he and Claudette Colbert attended the preview of "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine." As they were about to enter the theatre the camera boys stepped forward, and at the same moment a crowd of fans surged around Claudette. The doctor and the photographers retreated, they to protect their cameras and he to keep his haberdashery intact. A few moments later Claudette emerged, slightly battered and more than slightly pulled apart. That gal should have married a couple of football players, don't you agree? (Continued on page 78)

How Pretty Peggy won Harry's Heart

At every party Peggy was the center of attention. She was always so smartly—so colorfully dressed. Men's eyes followed her . . . romantically . . .

But Peggy was unhappy. Listen to her confide to a friend. "Oh, Helen, why is it I seem to attract every boy but your brother Harry? He just doesn't pay any attention to me."

"Harry is a very serious young man," answered Helen. "I know he really likes you, but he thinks you are too extravagant. He says you have on a new dress every time he sees you."

"Well, Helen," said Peggy, "Tintex is the secret of my 'large' wardrobe. What Harry thinks are new dresses are old dresses made new with Tintex. See . . . you just tint as you rinse and get the most gorgeous new colors."

GOSH, CLAIRE — IT'S SWELL TO SEE YOU — AND DON'T WE LOOK NIFTY! THAT'S ONE HONEY OF A HAT, I'LL SAY!

Don't let Adolescent Pimples keep YOU from looking your best

JUST when good looks make such a difference in good times—from about 13 to 25 years of age, or even longer—many young people become afflicted with ugly pimples.

During this time, after the beginning of adolescence, important glands develop and final growth takes place. This causes disturbances throughout the body. The skin, especially, becomes oversensitive. Waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin and pimples appear.

Fleischmann's fresh Yeast helps to give you back a good complexion by clearing these skin irritants out of the blood. Then—pimples go!

Eat it regularly—3 cakes a day, before meals, plain, or in a little water—until your skin is entirely clear. Start today!

CAUSE FOR CELEBRATION

Texas' Centennial inspires John Boles to praise his state's famous foods

By Marjorie Deen

IT WAS John Boles, handsome and debonair star and honorary Texas Ranger, who was directly responsible for a sudden and very genuine interest on my part in Texas history, traditions and foods. This interest is one that I feel sure you will share with me when you hear the many fascinating things John had to tell about the dramatic past and the interesting present of his native state.

"There will be 'big doings' this summer in Texas," John informed me recently. "For, this year the Lone Star State is having its Centennial Celebrations with appropriate ceremonies throughout the entire year and an Exposition in Dallas during the summer months when people on their vacations can come down and enjoy it."

The interest and enthusiasm with which Mr. Boles imparted this information made me realize the high regard in which a native of Texas holds his home state. In fact, according to John Boles, every single living Texan is a natural, dyed-in-the-wool, unblushing booster for everything that concerns Texas.

And why not? Certainly everything about that state could be described in Hollywood terms as "simply colossal." First, of course, there is its size! Did you ever stop to realize that Texas has an area larger than the combined New England States, with New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware and North Carolina thrown in for good measure? That this single state which joined the Union just one hundred years ago added to our already vast country a territory larger than the original thirteen colonies? No wonder that it contains within its borders so many different points of interest and a population as diversified as its landscape.

THEN THERE is its fascinating history . . . a combination of glamor (in the historical rather than in the Hollywood sense) and of hardship; of deeds of bravery and daring; of revolution, border skirmishes and battles, in most of which, incidentally, the Texas Rangers figured prominently.

And last, but by no means least, since it concerns us directly here, there is the reputation Texas has justly earned for the excellence and variety of its meals.

Of course, you realize that the recipes of a particular state are typical of it because of the home-grown products which are prominently featured in its cookery. So, within the borders of Texas, you would find the beef from the Panhandle district in the western section of the state; the tropical fruits such as bananas, oranges and Japanese persimmons grown in the southern portion; the products of farms and orchards throughout the state, as well as native tomatoes, rice, hickory, pecans and walnuts, all featured in native dishes.

Then, too, the cookery of a state is influenced by the foreign countries whose representatives settled in that region. So you can readily imagine that Texas, which has lived under six flags, would show in the variety of its dishes the interesting effects of many outside influences.

But let's leave the Lone Star State for the present and take a flying trip out to Hollywood, where we will let John Boles tell us in his own words about the interesting banquet that took place there recently, given by the Texas Society in honor of visiting and resident Texas celebrities.

"I WAS greatly flattered when they asked me to be master of ceremonies at the Texas banquet," said John, modestly, as he settled back comfortably in an easy chair before the fireplace of the Boles' attractive Colonial style Hollywood home. "My job was to introduce the speakers," he went on. "The list read like a page in 'Who's Who.' There was Governor Allred of Texas, in whose honor the dinner was given, and Governor Merriam of California. Jesse Jones, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, was there, and Mayor Shaw of Los Angeles, while Texas was outstandingly represented by the presence of President Selecman of Southern Methodist University, Mayor Sargent of Dallas, Ginger Rogers, herself, from Texas, Captain Black of the Texas Society and Frank Watson and Don Sterling of the Texas Centennial committee.

"Besides these celebrities and others, there were about six hundred persons present, before whom I had the doubtful pleasure of appearing in a stubbly black beard! The beard was one I had to wear in my role in 'A Message to Garcia.' It wasn't so bad going around in whiskers when I wore sport clothes and soft shirts, but in full evening attire, with a stiff-bosomed shirt and stiff collar, I was a pretty amusing sight. However, I soon forgot about it and entered completely into the spirit of the occasion. And what a fine spirit that was! For, with so many Texans present, you may be sure (Continued on page 74)

"I made a bet with Mom..."

"Say, Mom, I bet I'd help you wash if you'd treat me to an ice cream cone."

"Bobbie, I'd give a couple of cones if somebody'd only tell me what makes these clothes so gray, even though I rub and scrub like fury."

"I wish you'd ask your sister, Bill, and see if she knows what's wrong with my mother's washes."

"I bet I don't have to ask. I hear women discussing things in the grocery store where I work and I know plenty about washing."

"Your mother's clothes have probably got tattle-tale gray—'cause her soap doesn't wash clean. Why doesn't she get wise and change to Fels-Naptha Soap? Everybody raves about the snappy way it gets out ALL the dirt!"

SO I TOLD MOM ABOUT FELS-NAPTHA SOAP AND GOT MY CONES
AND I GOT RID OF TATTLE-TALE GRAY! FELS-NAPTHA'S GRAND GOLDEN SOAP AND LOTS OF NAPTHA WASH CLOTHES SO CLEAN THEY SIMPLY SHINE! I LIKE FELS-NAPTHA BECAUSE IT'S GENTLER, TOO. WONDERFUL FOR SILK THINGS! EASIER ON MY HANDS!

PLAYGROUND OF THE EAST

By Martha Kerr

All in all, the Big City is a veritable merry-go-round of fun for the stars, three thousand miles away from sound tracks, cameras and directors. There's an amusing incident concerning Errol Flynn and Lili Damita (above) and their stop-over in New York. (Left) Roz Russell can always be found at the swankier night clubs.

NEW YORK is the movie stars' playground in the East. It is three thousand miles away from cameras and sound tracks, "unusual" weather and picture producers. It's as stimulating as hot coffee and a cold shower and much more fun. It's the place where anyone who has visited once, longs to return, and which Robert Taylor swears he'll see—or else! (Bob, you see, has never been east of Beatrice, Nebraska, so quite naturally, he's rarin' to go—to New York.)

There is plenty to be done and much to be seen in the town which no other spot in this land seems to offer. The tourists—and movie stars are the most avid of 'em—love to take a peek at Pell Street, the city's Chinatown. Whether or not the disappearing doors, sliding panels, long stem pipes or fat Buddhas are authentic or merely a colorful set-up for travelers, makes little difference to its visitors. ZaSu Pitts, for one, is a lady who would no more think of visiting the Big City without hopping a sight-seeing bus and taking a group of friends to Chinatown than say, playing a scene with her famous fluttery hands parked firmly at her sides.

Although ZaSu invariably takes in Chinatown, she's invariably as excited about it all as a kid on a roller coaster. When she visited its dim streets recently, she took in everything from a game of fan-tan to a plate of chop suey. Her New York friends are not movie people and she herself is not easily recognized, so Miss Pitts may have a veritable field day in whatever part of the city she chooses to see without fear of being mobbed, which, you'll admit, has its finer points.

Most of the picture players go on a shopping spree, for nowhere else is there such a variety of places in which to spend one's hard-earned shekels so lavishly as in this town. Joan Crawford bought twenty-seven hats at a single showing of the latest in ladies' bonnets. Are you gasping? I am, too. But Joan's seemingly extraordinary purchase didn't faze the chapeau-purveyor one single bit. He has become used to the treasured trade of society women and actresses.

AN OPENING night on Broadway draws cinema celebrities as the well-known honey pot attracts flies. Visiting movie players would no more think of missing a play's premiere than of failing to sign an autograph album. When Elissa Landi and Melvyn Douglas opened in "Tapestry in Gray," on Broadway, Errol Flynn, Lili Damita, Henry Fonda, Una Merkel, Sylvia Sidney and Helen Big city lights! Dancing nights! Dazzling sights! Lotsa fun—yes, it's New York!

Gahagan were just a handful of the numbers who turned out. Each lady wore the approved array of diamond bracelets, ermine coats and orchids. Yep, it may have been pea-in-the-pod exactness, but who wouldn't be among them—the peas, of course—when it comes to being surrounded by furs and flowers? You're right. None of us!

Most celebrities smoke in the theatre's foyer and lobby between acts. That insures seeing everything and being seen by everybody. The Franchot Tones, however, never leave their seats, although they do make it a point to arrive just before the lights are dimmed before the first curtain rises, thus insuring as spectacular an entrance as the star who is playing.

After the theatre, there is always a night club—or several of them. El Morocco and the Stork Club get the biggest play, although the celebrities are unpredictable in their patronage and loyalty to a certain place. If suddenly someone of importance shifts to the Versailles or the House of Morgan, where the sloe-eyed, piano-sitting Helen tosses off torch tunes nightly, all the others do likewise.

No matter how crowded a cafe may be, its manager will always see to it that a prominent person is parked in an advantageous spot. Therefore, when nobody could land a seat at the famous Tony's, the Franchot Tones rated a table, without so much as bothering to make a reservation. Such is success—and nothing succeeds like it in New York.

It was amusing to see Errol Flynn and his wife appear at the Stork Club the evening before the premiere (Continued on page 109)

THIS IS THE WOMAN WHO SAID:

"What's the difference, all laxatives are alike!"

The lady above made a mistake. A grave mistake . . . yet lots of people make it. She said, "What's the difference—all laxatives are alike." And that's where she was wrong!

One day she was constipated, and took a laxative. Picked it at random. It happened to be a harsh, quick-acting cathartic that raced through her system in a couple of hours. It upset her. Nauseated her. Sent pains shooting through her stomach. Left her weak—weary. . . . Such drastic remedies should never be taken, except on the advice of a physician.

DON'T SHOCK YOUR SYSTEM

When you need a corrective...and who doesn't every now and then? . . . don't make the mistake of assuming that all laxatives are alike. They're not!

You'll feel a whole lot better when you take a correctly timed laxative. One that won't rush through your system too quickly. And yet, one that is completely thorough.

Ex-Lax is just such a laxative. It takes sufficient time—6 to 8 hours—to work. Hence, your system is not thrown "out of rhythm." You aren't upset, disturbed, nauseated. You don't suffer from stomach pains. Ex-Lax action is so mild, so easy, you scarcely realize you've taken a laxative—except for the complete relief you enjoy.

Another thing . . . Ex-Lax will never embarrass you with ill-timed after-effects.

A PLEASURE TO TAKE

With Ex-Lax you say farewell to bitter, nasty-tasting purgatives and cathartics. Because Ex-Lax tastes just like delicious chocolate. It's a real pleasure to take, not a punishment. Get a box today—only 10c at any drug store. You'll also find a still more economical family size for 25c.

Patricia Ellis, oval-faced and smooth of brow, can wear the off-the-face hat superbly. And right, above, you see a marvelous new acne cream, being applied, which you must read about.

BEAUTY HEADLINERS FOR

Round or oval, square or long, choose flattering lines to frame your face this season

IT TAKES all kinds of beauty tonics to make up a woman's world—a different hair-do, a new hat, a facial, a compliment—all these things are tonic lifts to the everyday routine of living. Even a spring fever patient shows a slight gleam of interest when you mention shopping to her. So let's go shopping for a hairdress and a hat and a make-up that will "do things" to you. And will "do things" to him as well—that unromantic male who needs impressing with your new glamor.

We're going to think about something besides bargain headlines in making our selections. We're going to think about headlines in relation to our faces. What is the thing to consider when you're shopping for a new hairdress or a new hat? Why, the headlines, of course . . . those important lines that frame your face. They include the lines of your hat, your hair and your neck, too, to a certain extent. These lines around your face can either frame it correctly, and bring out the best in it, or they can hide your best points and bring out your worst ones.

There are at least four general types of faces. I put them into four general classifications for the sake of simplicity, although there are, of course, different mixtures and variations of these types. Anyhow, here they are round, square, oval, long-and-thin.

IF YOU have a full-moon sort of face, like Grace Bradley's or Mary Carlisle's, and the bane of your life is the sweet girly-girly look this roundness gives you, don't go out and buy yourself a round little hat. When some coy young salesgirl claps a saucer-like sailor hat on your head, or an equally circular little turban, set your round chin into square lines and shake your head vigorously. It isn't your type! It makes you more moon-faced than ever. Demand a hat that boasts of angles and points, rather than curves. Go in for the peaked Tyrolean sort of thing, or the high-crowned coachman's topper, with an irregularly rolled brim that almost covers one eye. One eye is just as good as two for the purposes of glamor.

If you're wearing too fussy a coiffure, my chubby-faced cherubs-who-want-to-look-sophisticated, you will look all wrong with your new hat. But then that sort of hairdress is all wrong for you, anyway. A nice sleek, ear-tip-length coiffure is best for you, cut in close contour fashion, with swirled waves, perhaps, but not too many ringlets. You don't need the latter. The sleeker your hairdress, the less ingenue you'll look. And don't (Continued on page 110)

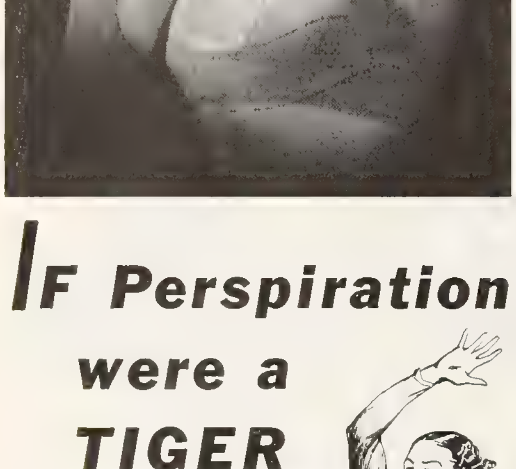
IF Perspiration were a TIGER



—you'd jump to protect yourself from its ravages! Yet the insidious corroding acid of perspiration can destroy the under-arm fabric of your dresses as surely, as completely, as the scarifying claws of a tiger's paw!

Answers to thousands of questionnaires revealed the astounding fact that during the past year perspiration spoiled garments for 1 woman in 3! What appalling wasteful extravagance, when a pair of Kleinert's Dress Shields would have saved any one of them at trifling cost.

And this surest form of perspiration protection is now the easiest also! Kleinert's Bra-form is a dainty uplift bra equipped with shields—always ready, without any sewing, to wear with any dress at any moment. A supply of two or three solves the perspiration problem for the busiest woman and they're as easily swished through the nightly soapsuds as your stockings and lingerie!

Just ask for "Kleinert's" at your favorite notion counter—shields, 25¢ and up; Bra-forms, $1.00 and up.

NOTE: Since there have been so many requests for brief life stories of the following players, it will again be impossible to print the names of our readers. Please consider yourself automatically included.

ERROL FLYNN—Doubtless everyone who saw "Captain Blood" has been wondering just who this dashing, handsome newcomer is. So here you are! He was born in the north of Ireland on June 20, 1909, and received his education at the Lycee Louis le Grand, in Paris, and at St. Paul's School in London—during which time he indulged in the usual college sports; boxing, swimming, rowing and Rugby. Errol Flynn's (that's his real name) father was a professor of biology in Belfast and also at Cambridge. Now, here's an interesting item. Errol is a direct descendant of Fletcher Christian, leader of the real mutiny on the Bounty. And Flynn's first picture work was done in the South Seas, while he was there pearl fishing, for a small English film company making "Mutiny on the Bounty." The role he played, logically enough, was that of his ancestor—the same role played by Clark Gable in the American version of the same picture. Then Errol went back to pearling, but shortly turned to prospecting for gold in the "bush" country of New Guinea. With the money earned in the latter expedition, he bought a coast-wise schooner, but a wreck on a hidden coral reef ended that. Six months of miscellaneous activity and Errol returned to England, carrying with him "the acting bug" caught in his first dramatic experiment. He played on the London stage in several productions, and in stock through the provinces. Finally Warner Brothers signed him to come to America, and on the way over he met Lili Damita, but it wasn't until their paths crossed again in Hollywood that the romance ripened and resulted in marriage. After playing in "The Case of the Curious Bride" and "Don't Bet on Blondes," he finally got a break in the title role of "Captain Blood." Now for a little about his personality. Errol has ambitious literary tendencies and is now completing a book covering his adventures in the "bush" and pearl fishing. Has also written short stories and verse. Does not sketch, paint or play a musical instrument. Dislikes spiders and alarm clocks, but likes thunder storms and the sound of wind and rain. Errol is very athletic. He's a champion boxer and also swims, rides and plays tennis. He is 6 feet 2 inches tall, weighs 180 pounds, and has brown hair and eyes. And here's some really good news—Errol Flynn is slated to make "The Charge of the Light Brigade." Isn't that sumpin'? Write him at Warner Brothers Studios, Burbank, Cal.

A. W. S., Austin, Tex.—I'm glad you asked for a list of the biggest money making stars of 1934-35, according to box office receipts. Doubtless, others will be interested, too. Here are the first twenty: 1. Shirley Temple; 2. Will Rogers; 3. Clark Gable; 4. Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers; 5. Joan Crawford; 6. Claudette Colbert; 7. Dick Powell; 8. Wallace Beery; 9. Joe E. Brown; 10. James Cagney; 11. Mae West; 12. Bing Crosby; 13. William Powell; 14. Janet Gaynor; 15. Jean Harlow; 16. Norma Shearer; 17. W. C. Fields; 18. Ruby Keeler; 19. Warner Baxter; 20. Grace Moore.

ANITA LOUISE—That is her real name, except that there used to be a Fremalt on the end of it, and she was born in New York City on January 9, 1915, of mingled French, German and English ancestry. Anita was educated at the Professional Children's School in New York, and the Greenwood School for Girls in Hollywood. Her first ambitions were to be an actress and to write music. She is an accomplished musician, excelling at the piano and the harp, has a fine singing voice, and is a talented dancer. She can speak several foreign languages. At the age of 7, Anita began her theatrical career, playing in "Peter Ibbetson" and others. In 1927 she made her first picture—"The Music Master." Anita is fond of all outdoor sports, and especially likes tennis, riding, swimming and fencing. She is 5 feet 3½ inches tall, weighs 106 pounds and has light blue eyes and light blonde hair. She is not married. "Brides Are Like That" is Anita's most recent production, and she is also in "Anthony Adverse." She is scheduled to join Dick Powell and Joan Blondell in "Stage Struck," in which she will dance. Write her at Warner Brothers Studios, Burbank, Cal.

JEANETTE PETCH, Gananoque, Ont., Canada—ZaSu Pitts is very much alive and has only recently finished work in "13 Hours by Air." Extra players are divided into several different groups. There are the "class A extras" who are people of good appearance with fine wardrobes. They may earn as much as $15.00 per day. The "class B extras" must also look well and be able to deport themselves in a professional manner. They earn about $10.00 a day in scenes where many people appear. "Class C extras" are used for mob scenes and large gatherings, and are paid $7.50 a day. Appearance is not so important. The average extra is considered very fortunate if he is able to obtain work two days out of the week.

RANDOLPH SCOTT—Born in Orange County, Va., on January 23, 1903, Randy was the son of non-professional parents. In fact, no one in his family had ever been on the stage. He received his education in private school, the Woodberry Forest School, Georgia Tech and the University of Virginia. After finishing college, Randy took off for Europe where he spent a year, then returned home to join his father's engineering firm. Two years of this, and young Mr. Scott decided to take a vacation in Hollywood. There he became interested in dramatics and joined the Pasadena Community Playhouse group, with which he remained for 8 months. His work earned him parts in legitimate productions on the West Coast for two years, until he was signed by Paramount in December, 1931. "The Sky Parade" was Randy's first picture. Followed four years of Westerns, until he finally made good in a straight acting role in "Roberta." Mr. Scott is not married. He is 6 feet 2 inches tall, weighs 190 pounds and has hazel eyes and light hair. He names swimming, golf and riding as his favorite sports. "Follow the Fleet" is Randy's latest screen effort. Write him at RKO-Radio Studios, 780 N. Gower St., Hollywood, Cal.

JANE WEBSTER, Englewood, N. J.—Elissa Landi was born in Venice, Italy, as was correctly stated in Modern Screen—not near Vienna, Austria. Her most recent picture, by the way, is "Amateur Gentleman" with Douglas Fairbanks, Jr.

FRANKIE DARRO—Born in Chicago, Ill., on December 22, 1918, Frankie Johnson was what is known as a "stage child." His parents were vaudeville artists and their young son made his stage debut at an early date. When Frankie was two, he accompanied his family to Hollywood and appeared in Anna Q. Nilsson's "Judgment of the Storm." which film started him on his "picture-stealing" career. Frankie was educated at the Lawlor's School in Chicago. His favorite sports are football, baseball, hockey and tennis, and he was a Boy Scout patrol leader. His screen career began in earnest in 1929, when he appeared in "The Rainbow Man." Most of his earlier work was done in Westerns, but lately he has been getting a lot of well-deserved breaks. Frankie has dark brown hair and eyes, and has been doing a lot of growing lately—he's probably about 5 feet 6 inches tall now. His most recent pictures are "Born to Fight" and "Phantom of Death Valley." Write him at Universal Studios, Universal City, Cal.

LUCILLE LOW, San Antonio, Tex.—Ward Bond is a feature player, not an extra. He was born in Denver, Colo., on April 9, 1905, and was educated in Denver schools, then the University of Southern California. Between college semesters he played roles in pictures. Weighing 200 pounds, he stands 6 feet 2 inches. His most recent productions are "The Cattle Thief" and "United States Smith." His address is Columbia Studios, 1438 N. Gower St., Hollywood, Cal. Felix Knight has only appeared in one "short subject" since "Babes in Toyland."

FRANCHOT TONE—Franchot's life has been almost as varied as the numerous and sundry roles he has portrayed on the screen. Born in Niagara Falls on February 27, he is the son of Frank J. Tone, an industrial executive. He has one brother four years older than himself, Frankie Jerome Tone, Jr. Franchot attended small private schools and then entered the Hill School in Pottsdam, Pa., to prepare for Harvard. His brother, then attending Cornell, arranged for him to enter that University. He finished the course in three years, attended a summer session at the University of Ronnes in France, was president of the Cornell Dramatic Club while there, and served as an assistant to the head of the Romance Language Department, specializing in French. After graduation he joined a stock company in Buffalo and later appeared in a number of New York productions. When he was appearing in the Group Theatre production of "Success Story," which was a sensational hit, he was signed by M-G-M to a long term contract. His first film role was in "Today We Live" with Joan Crawford and Gary Cooper. His favorite sports are golf and swimming. He sees all the movies he can and enjoys dancing for recreation. He plays an excellent game of bridge and likes mystery stories. Franchot married Joan Crawford on October 11, 1935. This is his first marriage. He is 6 feet tall, weighs 160 pounds, and has light brown hair and hazel eyes. His next picture is "The King Steps Out" with Grace Moore. This will be followed by "The Unguarded Hour" with Loretta Young. Write him at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal.

GENE AUTRY—Born in Tioga, Texas, on September 29, 1907, Gene started his vocal career early by singing in his grandfather's church. As a lad he "rode herd" and at 12 entered his first rodeo. At 14, Gene joined a travelling medicine show for a season, acquired a saxophone and traded it for a guitar. While attending school in Ravia, Okla., he learned telegraphy at the railroad station where he worked after school, and at 18 became a full-fledged telegrapher on a lonely division of the Frisco Railroad. There, to pass the time away, he perfected his guitar technique and composed cowboy songs, later making good with them in radio at Tulsa, New York and Chicago as the "Cowboy Idol of the Air." His first picture was "The Phantom Empire." Gene is 5 feet 10 inches tall, weighs 165 pounds and is a natural athlete. He has reddish brown hair and brown eyes. Write him at Republic Studios, 9336 W. Washington Blvd., Culver City, Cal., where he recently completed "Red River Valley," with Frances Grant, and "Galloping Minstrel." He is soon to start on "Comin' 'Round the Mountain."

KAY FRANCIS—Kay was born Katharine Gibbs in Oklahoma City, on Friday the 13th, 1899. Before she was 4 she had lived in Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, Denver and finally New York, and her education was received in almost as many different places—convents in Fort Lee, N. J., Roxbury, Mass., and New York City; Miss Fuller's School in Ossining, N. Y., and the Cathedral School, Garden City, N. Y. During this time she was very proficient in athletics, especially sprinting, and tennis which she still enjoys. After graduation Kay went to secretarial school and then to Europe, later taking secretarial jobs with several prominent people. Eventually she decided to take a fling at the stage and was successful in several New York hits. Then Hollywood, her first picture being "Gentlemen of the Press" in 1929. She has been married three times, most recently to Kenneth MacKenna, and her current swain is Delmar Daves. Kay's hobby is sailing. Miss Francis has black hair and blue-gray eyes, is 5 feet 6½ inches tall and weighs 125 pounds. Her next picture will be "Angel of Mercy" with Ian Hunter and Donald Woods. Write her at Warner Brothers Studios, Burbank, Cal.

TOM BROWN—Whether it sounds like a fake or not, Tom Brown is his real name and he is the son of Harry Brown, stage producer, and Marie Francis, musical comedy star. He is of Irish descent and his birthday is January 13. He is 23 years old. At the age of 6 months Tom first appeared before the footlights in the arms of his mother. The New York Professional Children's School is proud to number him among its alumni, and he almost went to Brown University except that the stage beckoned too strongly. He was a well known child actor in the days of silent films and was prominently cast in more than 50 stage plays both on Broadway and on the road, to say nothing of appearing on three different radio programs. In 1929 he appeared in "A Lady Lies," his first picture—and has been concentrating on screen work ever since. Tom is modest and unassuming about his success, likes to tinker with automobiles and play practical jokes, is an ardent devotee of all outdoor sports but is especially enthusiastic about swimming and hiking. He is 5 feet 9 inches tall, weighs 155 pounds and has blue eyes and medium brown hair. His most recent picture is "Gentle Julia" which will be followed by "Border Flight." Write him at Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Hollywood, Cal.

RICHARD CROMWELL—Starting from the very beginning of this young man's life, he was born Roy Radabaugh on January 8, 1910, in Los Angeles, Cal. He is of Dutch-American descent and has three sisters—Ann, Dorothy and Lillian—and one brother, Hudson. When Richard was 8 his father died, and after having attended Long Beach public and high schools (where he devoted himself to amateur dramatics and art), Dick won a scholarship to the Chouinard Art School in Los Angeles. To support himself he worked as a soda jerker, but eventually opened an art studio which was patronized by many of the stars. He happened to learn that a player was needed for the title role in "Tol'able David." He applied for the job and, what's more, landed it, to his everlasting success. He is 5 feet 10 inches tall, weighs 150 pounds, has blue-green eyes and blonde hair. For recreation Dick plays tennis and swims, and his hobby is painting and making portrait masks. He is scheduled to play in W. C. Field's next picture, "Poppy," opposite Rochelle Hudson. Write him at Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Hollywood, Cal.

JEANETTE MacDONALD—She is one of the three talented daughters of Daniel and Anna MacDonald, and was born in Philadelphia, Pa., on June 18, 1907, of Scotch-American descent. There she attended grammar school, but completed her education in New York City where her family moved. As a child Jeanette studied dancing and singing and later appeared in a revue on the stage. Then followed an engagement with "The Night Boat" company as a chorus girl and understudy for the feminine principals in the cast. The next season she had a small part in "Irene" and then a better one in "Tangerine." Her first real success came when she was cast in "Fantastic Fricassee." Then came a contract and a series of leading roles in musical comedies. Her first picture was "The Love Parade" with Maurice Chevalier in 1930. She is 5 feet 5 inches tall, weighs 120 pounds and has red-gold hair and green eyes. She likes to meet new people, see new places, is fond of swimming, dancing, riding and the theatre. She plays the piano, reads mystery novels, and collects tiny figures playing musical instruments. Her next picture is "San Francisco" with Clark Gable. Of course, you've already seen "Rose Marie" with Jeanette and Nelson Eddy. Write her at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal.

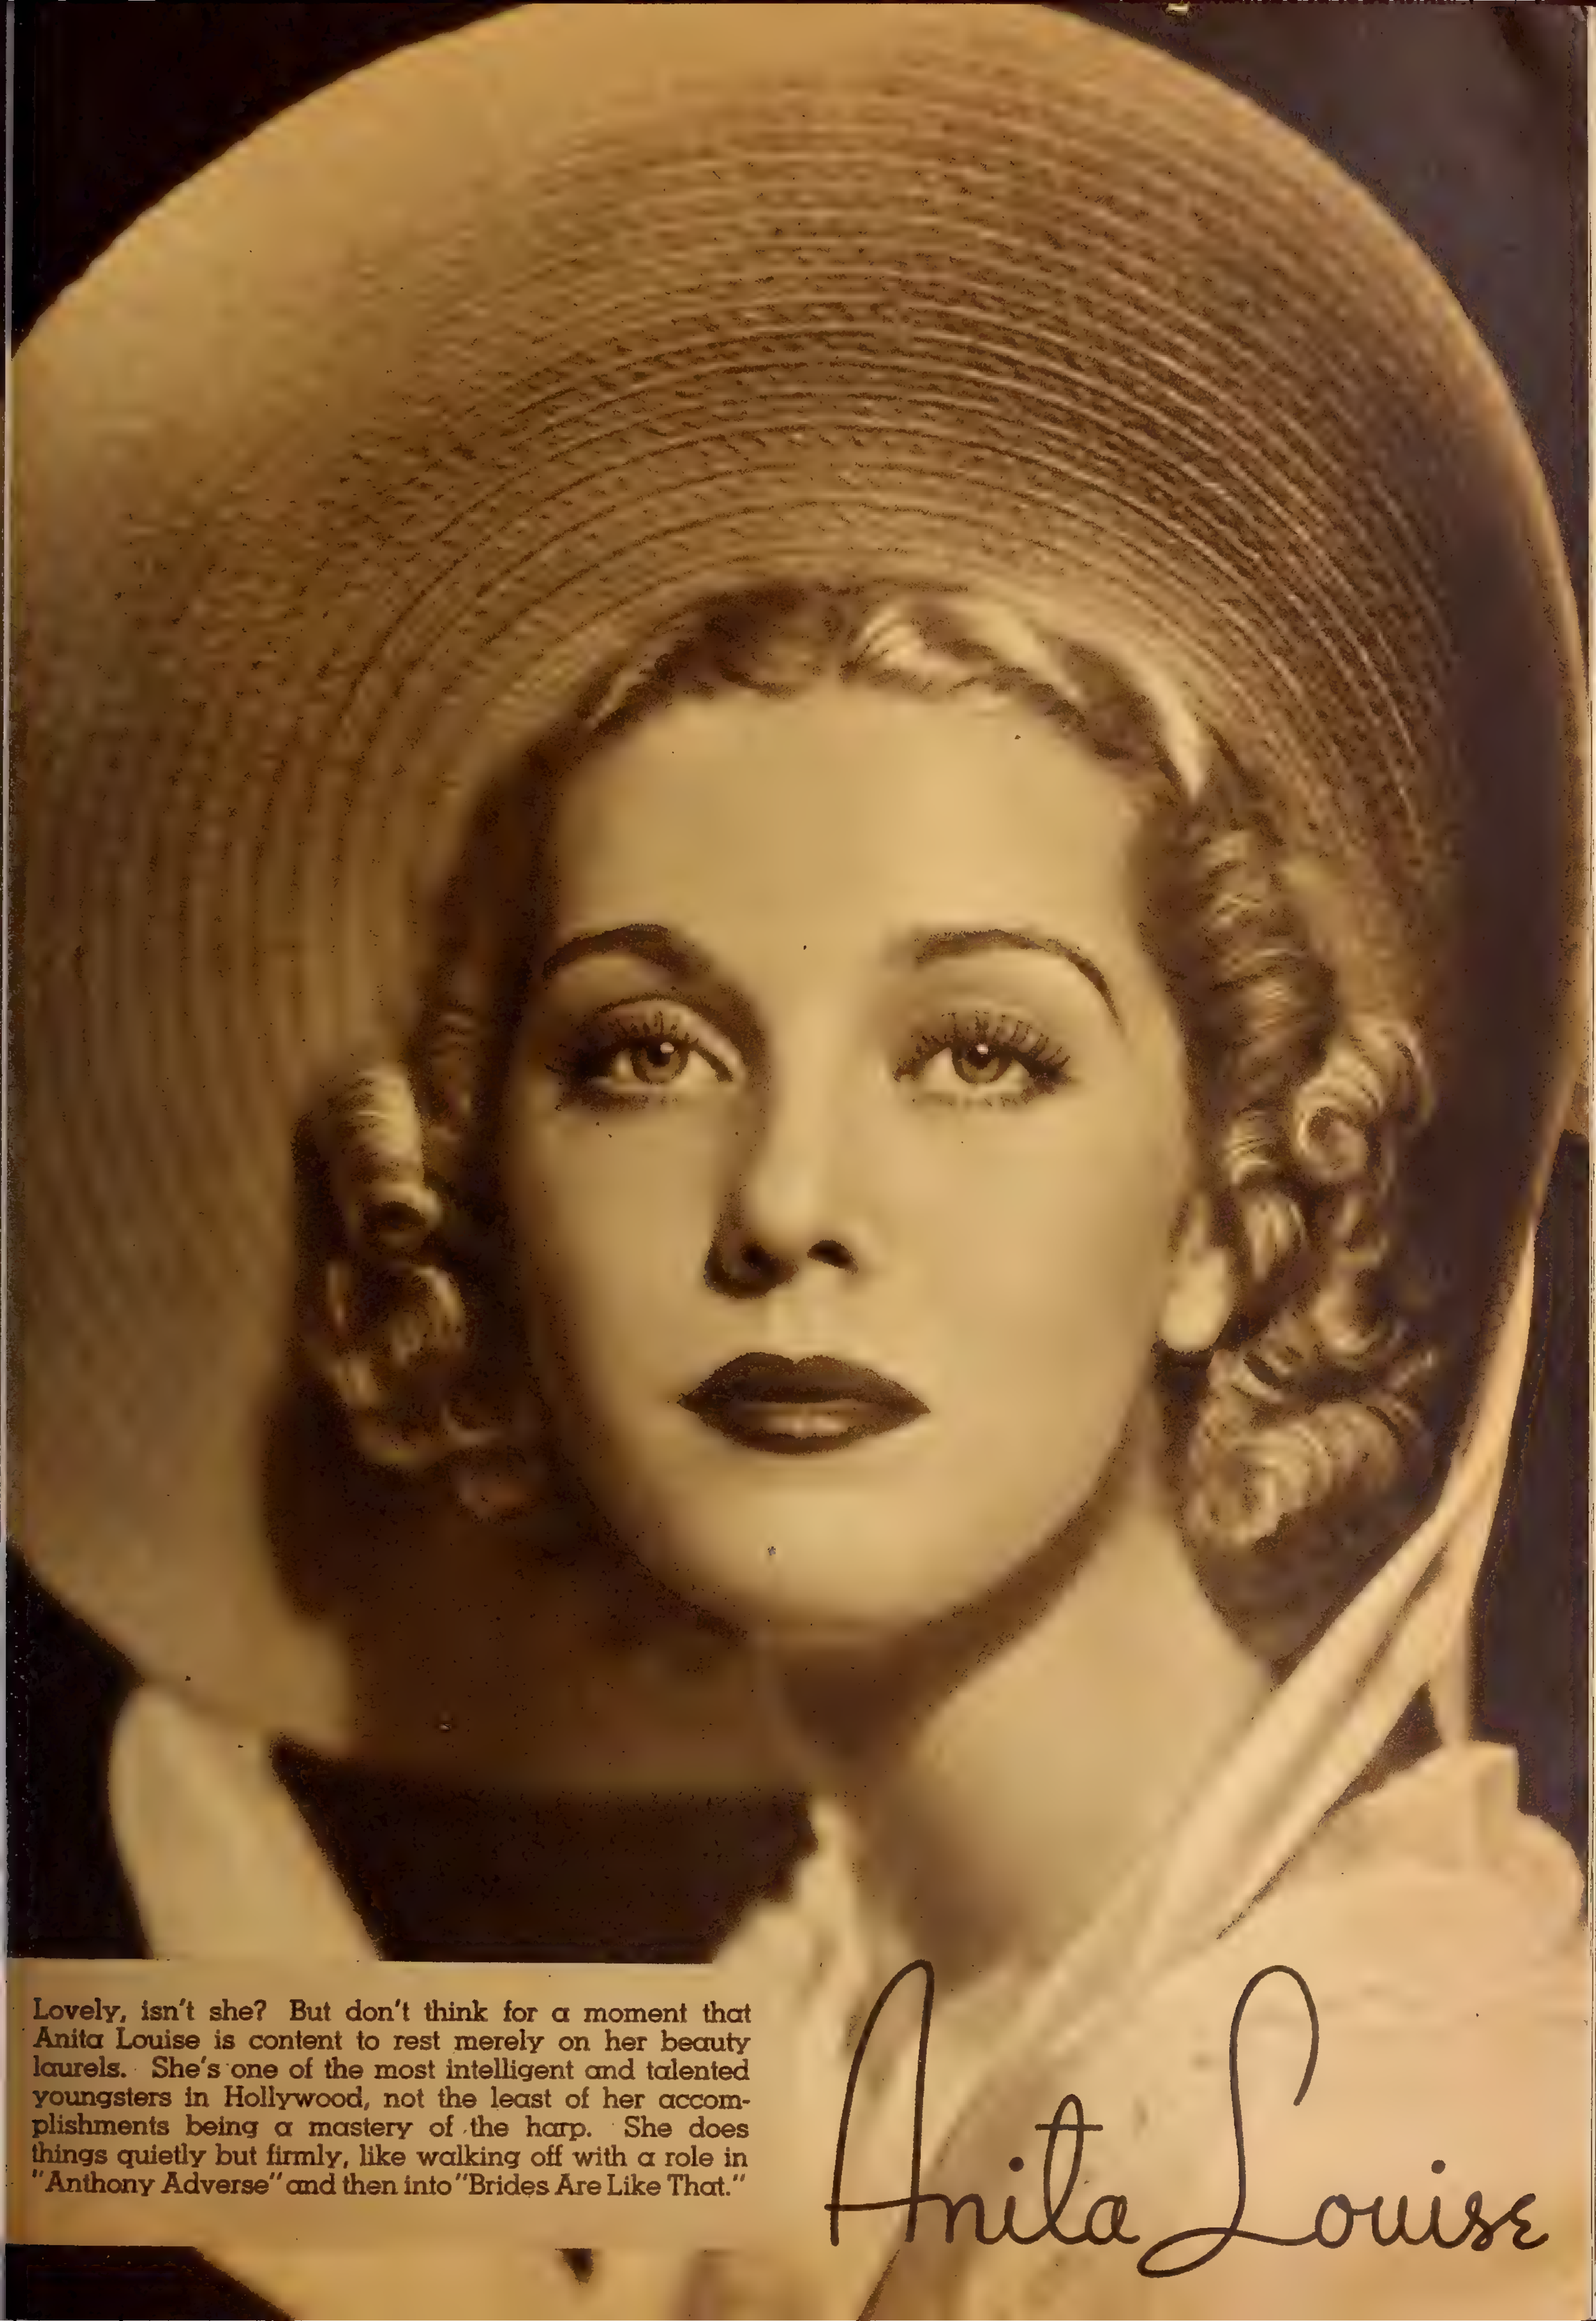
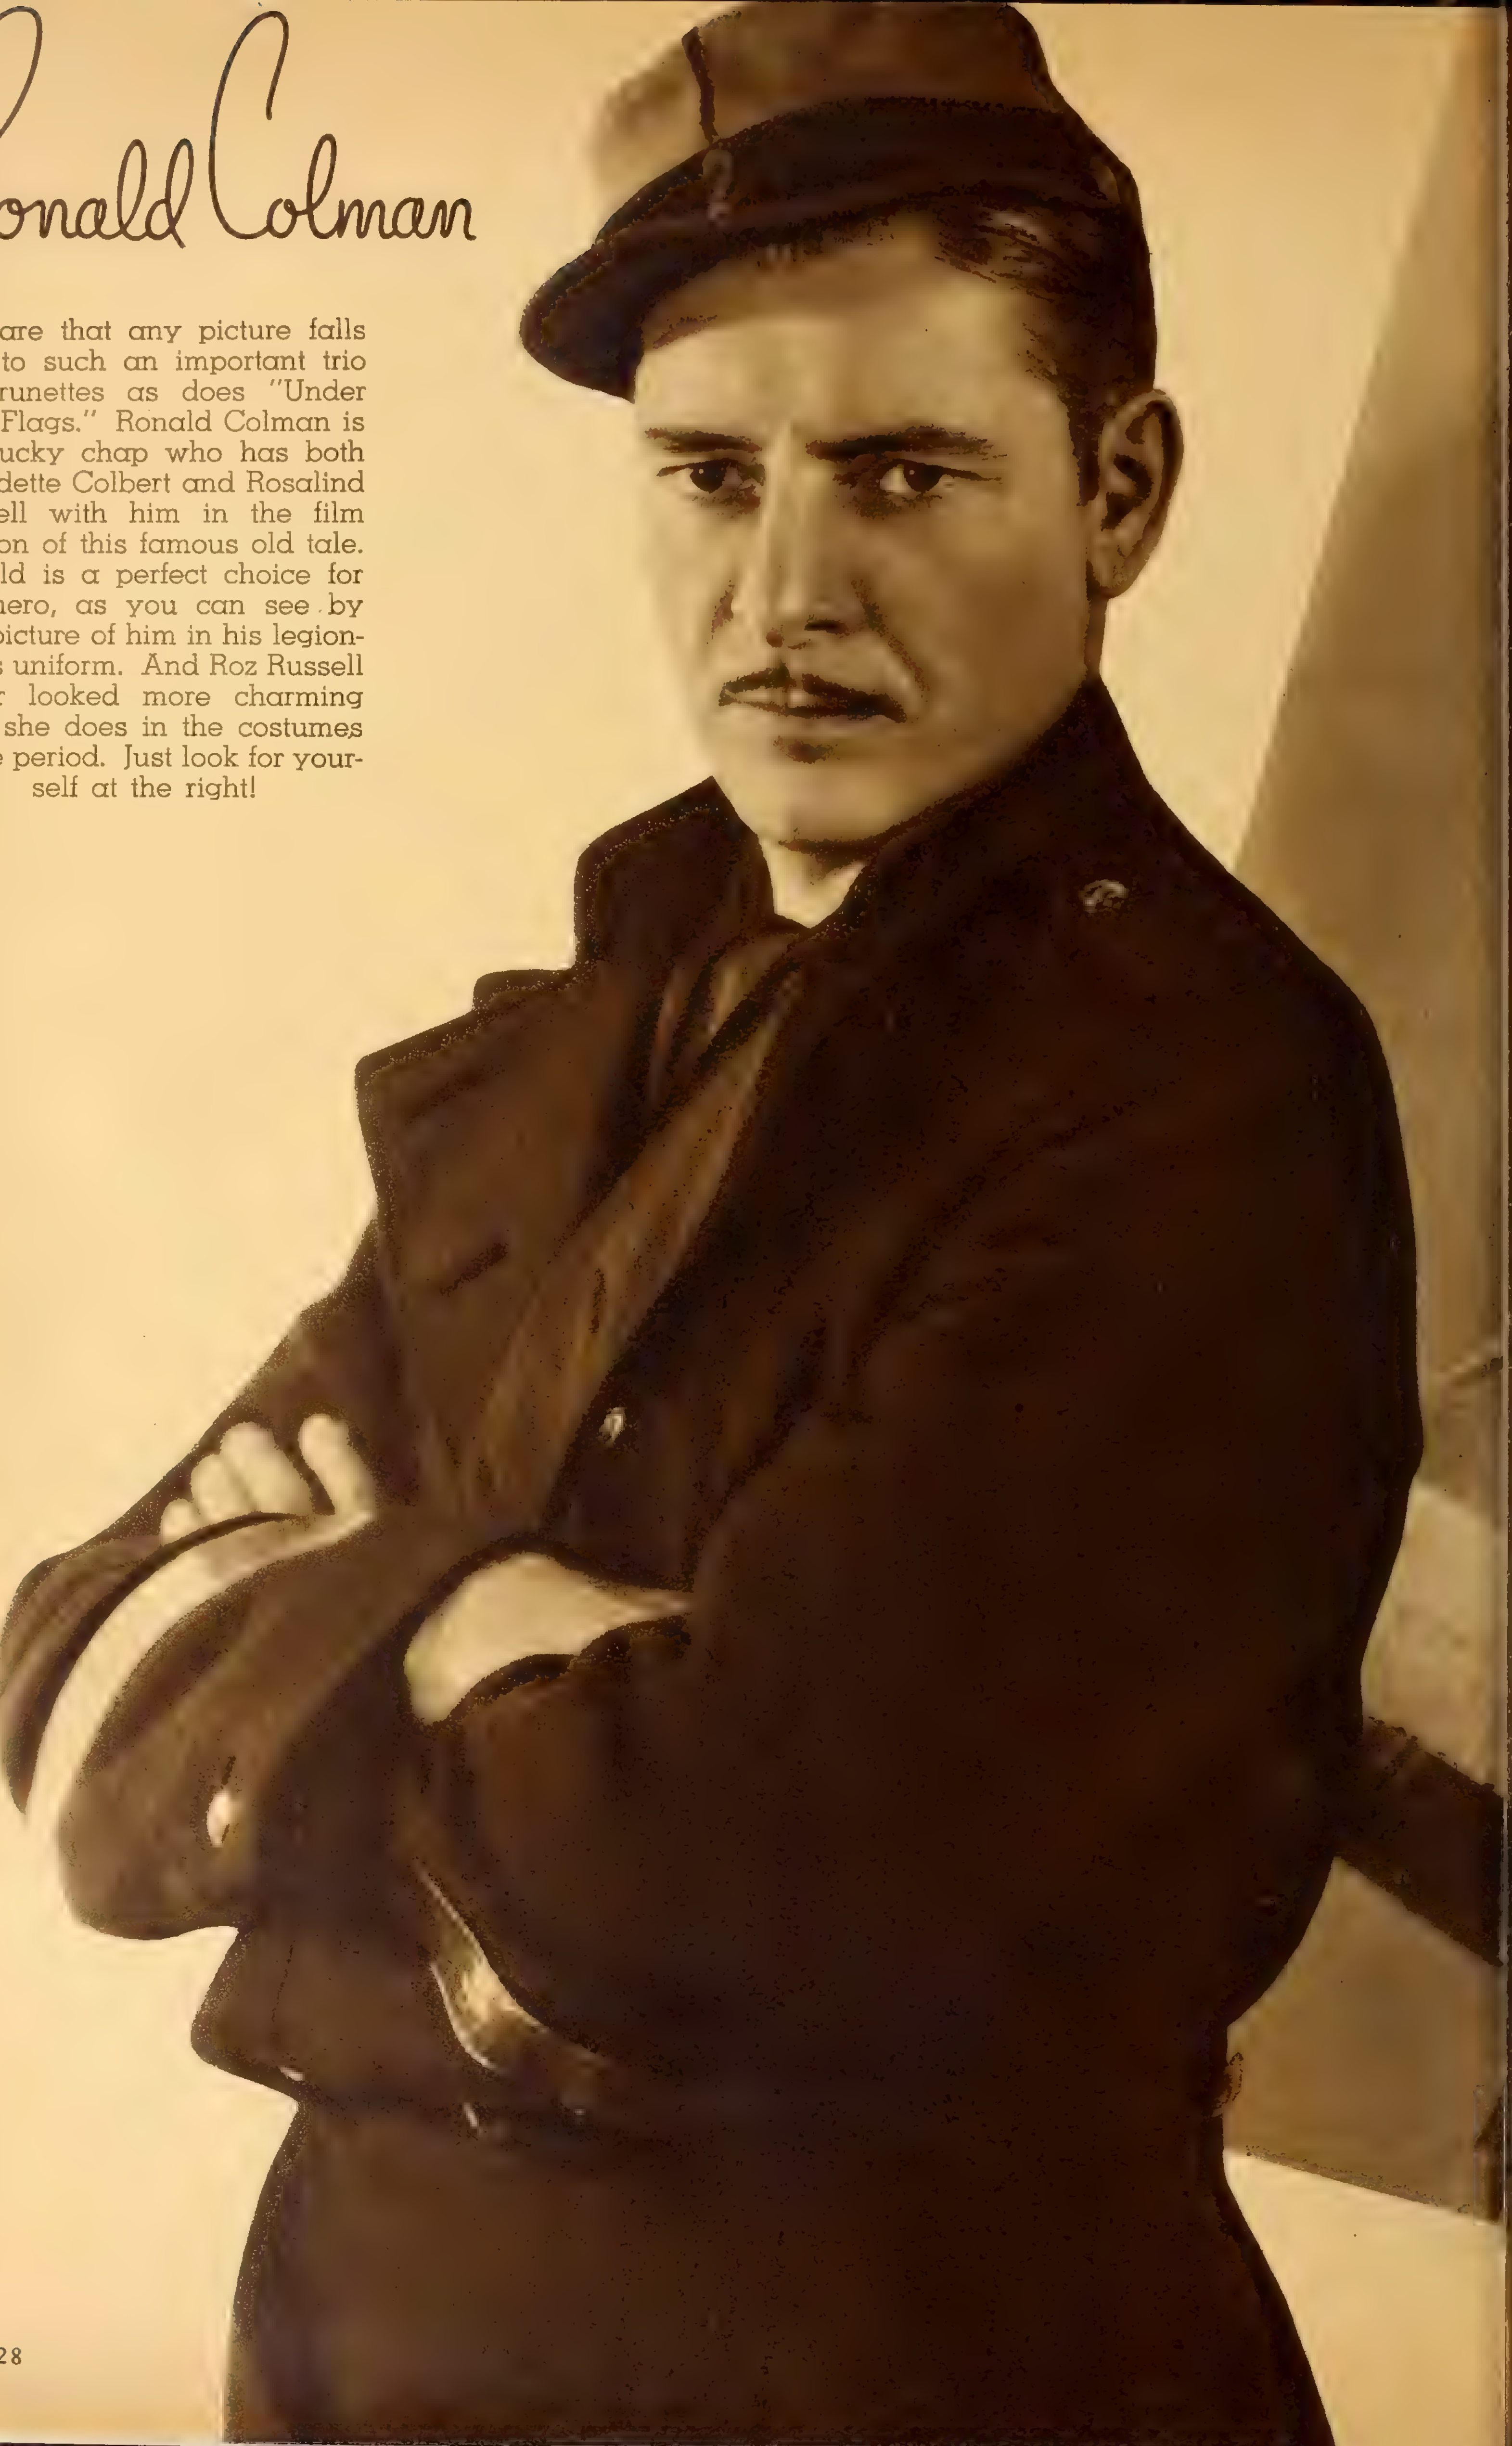
20th CENTURY FOX



Lovely, isn't she? But don't think for a moment that Anita Louise is content to rest merely on her beauty laurels. She's one of the most intelligent and talented youngsters in Hollywood, not the least of her accomplishments being a mastery of the harp. She does things quietly but firmly, like walking off with a role in "Anthony Adverse" and then into "Brides Are Like That."

Ronald Colman

It's rare that any picture falls heir to such an important trio of brunettes as does "Under Two Flags." Ronald Colman is the lucky chap who has both Claudette Colbert and Rosalind Russell with him in the film version of this famous old tale. Ronald is a perfect choice for the hero, as you can see by this picture of him in his legionaire's uniform. And Roz Russell never looked more charming than she does in the costumes of the period. Just look for yourself at the right!



Rosalind Russell

Gene Raymond

Gene likes to talk to you seriously about acting, but just try to get him to commit himself on love! The funny part is that Gene is one of the most popular beaux in town with Jeanette MacDonald and Janet Gaynor on his list. He's in "Love on a Bet" next.

Kay Francis

Kay is portraying Florence Nightingale in her new picture, "Angel of Mercy," and from this pensive pose, it looks as if the soothing influence of the great war nurse has had its effect already on the usually vivacious Kay. Ian Hunter is her new lead.

James Cagney

James C. isn't Irish for nothing, as his studio discovered recently when he staged a one-man revolt. However, when and if things are patched up, this versatile actor will do "Over the Wall."

WHO IS THE GENIUS

THEY WERE waiting for Shirley on the set. In the dressing-room, Mrs. Temple was trying to put the finishing touches on Shirley's curls, but Shirley wouldn't stand still. She was giggling and dimpling and making faces at herself in the mirror. You or I might have thought it was just pep. But Mrs. Temple, a veritable seismograph for every Shirley mood, recognized a tiny trace of suspense, and fear. She waited, however, until she had slipped the last golden-taffy curl off her finger. Then she put her two strong hands on Shirley's shoulders, steadied them firmly, and spoke to her, as her calm dark eyes met Shirley's bright blue ones in the mirror.

"Now, precious, I want you to forget that this scene is any more important or any more difficult than the rest. There's nothing for you to worry about, no reason for you to be frightened or afraid. It's going to be easy for you. As you dance up those stairs, just remember that mother is loving you, and when so much love goes with you, nothing bad can happen."

"I'll remember," said Shirley, suddenly solemn and sober and still.

When they reached the set, Shirley left her mother's side, and skipped off toward the high circular iron staircase, up which she was to tap dance. And as she skipped, she was singing softly under her breath. I didn't recognize the tune—it was all her own—but the words were familiar. I had heard them just a moment or two before. They were, "Mother is loving you, nothing bad can happen."

At the bottom of the steps, she saluted her director and called out gayly, "Okay! Let's go!"

The scene was the one with Guy Kibbee on the circular staircase, in "Captain January." Shirley went through that long, difficult scene without a mistake—four pages of dialogue and more than forty steps! But anyway, that was not the important thing to me. I was held spellbound by quite another miracle—the miracle of faith. As we watched, all of us with hearts beating a little faster, Shirley tapped up those high, narrow, slippery, iron steps without the least fear of falling! There was not even a forced expression of bravery on her face on the way up. Not even one sigh of relief when she reached the top. Yet a mountain goat would have feared for his safety on those steps.

THE ANSWER? Mrs. Temple's words flashed through my mind again. And Shirley's belief in the protection of love had dismissed all nervousness from her mind.

Suddenly I began to understand a lot of things about Shirley that I had never understood before. Why she wasn't spoiled, when all the world was spoiling her. Why she wasn't conceited when all the world was praising her. Why she wasn't a nervous wreck, when all the world was clamoring for her! Mrs. Temple was the reason why!

I have known a lot of child actors and I have known a lot of stage mothers. There are few of them who have ever won my approval. I have always been prejudiced against them ever since the time a fire broke out on a set which I happened to be visiting. There were forty children on that set. And forty mothers on the sideline. The mothers beat a hasty retreat toward the doors, and the children, believe it or not, were left to get out the best way they could! Is there any wonder that I'm prejudiced against the mothers of talented tots?

This small star gets her encouragement and guidance from an inspiring source

By Kay Osborn

But about Mrs. Temple I feel differently. I have met her often and watched her with Shirley on many occasions, and since that day on the "Captain January" set, I have talked to many people who know her well. I had a grand chat about her with Irving Cummings, just the other day—one which bears repeating. Mr. Cummings directed Shirley in one of her most successful pictures, "Curly Top," and now he's making "Poor Little Rich Girl" with her.

When I asked him, "How much do you think Mrs. Temple has had to do with Shirley's success?" he answered quickly and enthusiastically, "Everything! Why, Mrs. Temple is much more Shirley's director than I am. She teaches her her lines, coaches her on how to say them, suggests Shirley's expressions, shows her how to stand and sit and walk and talk and run! There's really very little left for a director to do when Shirley arrives on the scene.

BUT MOST important of all are the things she does, and the things she doesn't do, to keep Shirley from becoming spoiled. For everyone knows that on the day when Shirley becomes conscious of her great charm, then, on that day, will her charm disappear. That's what makes Mrs. Temple's job one of the most difficult tasks that there are in all Hollywood.

She must keep a constant eye on her famous daughter—her health, her habits, her whereabouts—yet she mustn't let Shirley know that she is being watched any more than an ordinary child would be watched. When they are driving to and from the studio, Mrs. Temple usually closes the windows in the car, but she doesn't tell Shirley she does that to keep a draft off her, or to prevent soot from blowing in her eyes. Nor does she tell her that the man driving the car is a G-man as well as a chauffeur. Never, in any way, does she let on to Shirley that she is the important little person she is.

WHEN SHIRLEY is asked to sign autographs, she thinks it's just part of the game of acting that she loves so much. She never dreams it's a personal compliment. Mrs. Temple, too, is responsible for that healthy thought. Even when Shirley says she's tired of signing autographs and wants to stop, Mrs. Temple says, "All right, stop!" That happened recently at a big luncheon for Shirley. All the guests were sending up their menus to have them autographed. Shirley autographed a few, but then the food took her fancy and she said she'd rather eat—and eat she did!

Mrs. Temple might have said, "Look, Shirley dear, all those people will be disappointed, you'd better finish (Continued on page 80)

Ginger and husband, Lew Ayres, share many enthusiasms, one of them being tennis.

"'TAIN'T SO!" CRIES Ginger

By Dorothy Donnell

THE POLICE held hands and made a ring around us, but they couldn't keep the crowd from trampling us," said Ginger Rogers' mother. "I saw their faces. Neither admiration nor affection nor even curiosity was registered on them, but something quite dreadful. Do you suppose that the depression has made the public envious of movie people? It needn't have! In the old days when investments were safe a few players might become rich, but not now. I said to Mary Pickford recently, 'You were the last. There will never be another wealthy movie star!' We of this generation have disinherited our children even in Hollywood. But that crowd—it was like a French Revolutionary mob scene! I saw their hands clutching at my daughter's hair. She'll never be able to wear that dress again. And it wasn't hero worship. It was almost hate!"

Is this the explanation—I thought—of people's eagerness to listen to Hollywood divorce rumors? Is it a sop to their own miseries to believe that their movie idols are unhappy in spite of their limousines and race horses and bank accounts? Is there compensation for every day, garden variety humans, like you and me, in the thought that hair like a red gold glory doesn't bring happiness and that beautiful eyes may shed tears? Is it the fans themselves who refuse to allow their film favorites to be happy? For love in Hollywood does not die of some exotic blight or unnatural disease, but simply—forgive the pun—of rumortism!"

Just now, all the forces of nature and science seem combined to break up one movie marriage that threatens to be successful.

For centuries scholars have worn their eyes out over midnight manuscripts, inventors have given their lifetimes to perfecting miracle working machines, in order to enable a radio announcer to send out into the ether the report of another broken screen romance.

And all over our great country, by simply turning a knob, we fortunate heirs of the ages, the privileged possessors of modern civilization, were able to receive the news.

"What did we tell you? Another Hollywood star is in Reno tonight to have her marriage melted."

All movie households do not have marble swimming pools and ermine bedspreads. The rented home of one young film couple, for example, has seven rooms, partially occupied by a high-powered telescope, a complete toy railway system which the master and mistress of the house run perching on their hands and knees, and a nice collection of first editions of Kipling and the Victorian poets. It's monthly rental leaves change from a hundred dollar bill.

"But we do have a good radio," young Mrs. Lew Ayres—Ginger Rogers to you—told me a trifle grimly. "And after dessert that evening we moved into the living-room and turned it on. We'd had Margaret Sullavan and her husband and the Andy Devines to dinner and, as we sat 'round the fire drinking our coffee, somebody said, 'Let's tune in and listen to the lowdown.' So Lew turned the knob—just in time to hear, 'Another Hollywood star is in Reno tonight. Ginger Rogers and Lew Ayres have come to the parting of the ways.'

WAS I BURNED?" exclaimed Ginger. I reached for the telephone and got Long Distance. I guess the operator could tell from my voice something was awfully wrong. At any rate she got me the broadcasting station in New York in a hurry. 'I want to speak to that movie columnist,' I shrieked. The voice at the other end was shocked. 'He is on the air at this moment, I couldn't possibly interrupt a broadcast,' I was told. 'Can't you give me the message?' 'Tell him that this is Ginger Rogers, and I'm calling from Hollywood, not Reno. I'm sitting here in my own home with my husband and some friends and if he doesn't deny the statement he's just made about me before he goes off the air, I'll call my lawyer.' The man tried to soothe me. 'If there's been any mistake, I am sure it will be rectified in the next broadcast.'

"I fairly screamed at him clear across the continent. 'Tonight! Now! I want the same people who heard it just now to hear the denial!' I guess I frightened him. He turned away and said something to someone. In a minute he was back. 'Listen to the radio,' he said. There was an advertising announcement on the air, and then the voice again. 'I've just had Ginger Rogers on the wire. She denies that she's in Reno or getting a divorce. Sorry, Ginger!' "

"Just before we came East on this trip," Ginger's mother added, "a newspaper editor in Reno called to tell me that he had just met Ginger on the street. (Continued on page 98)

SENTIMENTAL ROUGHNECK

By Franc Dillon

George Raft is no ladies' man, but he has some ideas about women and love that you couldn't possibly have suspected

ONE DAY recently, at the Paramount Studio, the monotony of the morning's work was interrupted when the director looked up to speak to George Raft, who had been standing at his elbow a moment before. George was not there. The director called but there was no answer. Assistants began to scurry around. They looked all over the huge sound stage. They looked outside; he might have stepped outside for a breath of air. They questioned Mack Grey, his friend who is like a shadow, but he, like the others, could only say: "He was here a minute ago."

When telephone calls to various other places in the studio failed to produce any sign of George, a systematic search began because, during his five years as a star, George had never before held up a scene. Twenty minutes passed and, as the situation began to take on an air of seriousness, in walked George with an elderly lady on each arm. He placed each one tenderly in a chair where they could see everything and, realizing he had been holding up the scene, rushed to the director and whispered his apology:

"I found these ladies wandering around outside. They were lost and they want to see how movies are made. Don't tell them who I am."

That incident is hardly consistent with the George Raft you know on the screen, is it? It isn't consistent with your emotions as you sit in a theatre and watch him, as you alternately thrill with admiration at his superb portrayals of wicked characters and shiver with apprehension at the terrifying possibility of meeting him in the dark.

On the screen his cold, steel-blue eyes have much the same effect on you that looking into the business end of a loaded gun would have, but out of the picture there is hardly anything about this charming, soft-spoken chap which would establish him as a villain. He is decidedly not a tough guy and the fact that his admirers believe the real George Raft to be like his screen characters is just another tribute to his competence as an actor.

Off the screen he is an amiable, quiet, considerate person—just the opposite from his screen self—and, like many another portrayer of hard-boiled roles, George is just an old softie where women are concerned. Any woman, he likes, can wind him around her little finger and the sight of tears from feminine eyes reduces him to a state of helplessness.

AT THE moment, there is a young lady who has George literally standing on his head, doing handsprings and spending his spare shopping moments buying her pretty presents. She returns his affection but, being a smart girl, knows his weak points and never fails to press an advantage. Ordinarily, she calls him "Uncle George" but when other wiles fail, the little flirt looks up at him archly and lisps: "Daddy."

And George, being no stronger than other weak men where a lady is concerned, immediately capitulates.

"I'm just nuts about her," he confessed to me. "She can have anything I've got."

It may be her blue eyes that attract George, or her blonde curls or maybe the fact that she measures thirty-six inches from stem to stern and is just five years old. At any rate, one of George's fondest dreams is that some day he will be in reality her daddy, for she is the small daughter of George's best girl, Virginia Pine. He buys toys for the child by the truck load, keeping the most fascinating ones at his own apartment in the hope that she will call on him frequently.

George isn't a ladies' man in the popular sense of the word. He likes women and they like him, but he isn't a flirt. He confines his attentions to one girl at a time, and since he has been in Hollywood his name has been closely linked with but one girl—and only one. She is Virginia Pine who, in George's words is "the sweetest and the prettiest girl in the world."

George doesn't like to talk about girls and hesitates to be seen too frequently with the same girl because he's not free to marry. "It subjects a girl to gossip," he explains gallantly. "What can a girl think my intentions are when I ask to take her out?" he demanded. "I'm a married man."

He doesn't like to talk about his marriage, which occurred years ago when he was very young and which didn't turn out happily, but ended in an

Jeanette's MADCAP MOMENTS

EVERY TIME I read about Jeanette MacDonald's wholesale sagacity I become annoyed. People are so persistent in plugging her as a cool and calculating creature. She's always the level-headed lovely who never makes a move without first pausing to think it over. Her Hollywood life is apparently a cut-and-dried affair, time-clocked to such a degree that she's in tempo only with her career.

The girl evidently does everything with a reflecting weather eye warily out. When I see write-ups, purporting to be the complete lowdown on Miss MacDonald, I can't help sighing at the crime they're committing!

For, in reality, Jeanette isn't a stuffy soul at all. She's a radiant redhead who may be a prim princess to her press agents, but who's often a riot to her friends. Have you ever heard of how she went whooping it up at the beach concessions in Ocean Park and ended up by falling off the merry-go-round? Or of the time she went berserk with the pearls? I like the episode when she "borrowed" a costume from the show she was doing, because she was sick of her one and only evening dress. And, mentioning clothes, do you know she chooses her wardrobe in a positively nutty way?

Her last-minute scrambles to be sewed into her party duds before sweeping into a formal Hollywood gathering are minor mad moments in the exciting existence this prima donna actually leads. You ought to be fully informed of that occasion when she lit into a big New York theatrical producer. And why she once impetuously forsook Hollywood and all its monetary rewards. But snatch yourself a cigarette and relax. I've merely begun.

It's a fact, yes, that Jeanette MacDonald is one star who is exceptionally sensible where her job is concerned. She has worked hard to acquire her present fan following. She's too intelligent to spoil her set-up by playing the fool, and certainly she's too well-bred to indulge in those gaudy gestures.

I do believe, however, that it's my duty to the MacDonald admirers to tell the rest of the truth. Jeanette's human streak will endear her (Continued on page 81)

ON HIS WAY

By Carolyn S. Hoyt

Kathleen Lockhart, Ross and Anita Louise in "Brides Are Like That."

Stardom is his goal and Ross Alexander, with that Gable "ummph," is very near it

ROSS ALEXANDER, six-footer plus, has what it takes for movie idolhood. The Gable "ummph." A voice, deep, throaty, controlled, that sends little shivers undulating up and down the feminine spines. A realistic grip on life that shows in his faintly cynical blue-eyed gaze. It's the quizzical look in those eyes that's going to round up the ladies. It already has.

What attracts them, too, is the excessive masculinity he radiates. He likes dogs and prize fights (none of your sissy featherweight matches, either . . . they have to be heavyweight, with blood spurting and teeth raining onto the canvas) and ice hockey (the more banged shins the better) and horse races. Stacked up against some of our better delineators of he-manhood, Alexander (born Alexander Ross Smith, Junior, and a real New Yorker) makes them look like a bunch of posey pickers.

"It's a funny thing about that," said Alexander between bites of roast duck, absorbed in the rarefied air of Warner Brothers' exclusive "Green Room" studio cafe ". . . . I had a wardrobe woman at a Long Island house party comment on it. She was something of a fortune teller, went around predicting peoples' futures at the party.

"I really don't know how I happened to be there because it was made up of a university theatrical group, and I hadn't been to college. I was 'kicked out' of school at sixteen, as a matter of fact. I met this woman earlier in the evening. 'And at what school did you matriculate?' she asked me, putting on a big act. 'Experience,' I answered. And she didn't say another word to me until later, when she started to read my palm.

"At the party were a lot of fellows and girls, one chap was so womanish, you'd wonder if he had brought his knitting. Well, the wardrobe (Continued on page 87)

It's that amused twinkle in the eye that's so beguiling. He's a happy-go-lucky fellow.

Would you risk your career as did these stars?

THE DECISIONS of actors, standing at the crossroads of their careers, are the cause back of their success or failure. Those who take a stand, decide, and go on are those who in the going-on meet up with "good luck." But good luck is the smile of a right decision while facing the crossroads of left or right.

Many a decision made by a player has become the most famous story associated with him. When Greta Garbo decided that five o'clock was late enough for her to work for any motion picture company, she put her decision into execution with the now famous line: "I tank I go home now."

Arline Judge is a youngster who had a decision thrust upon her. It was a ticklish decision to make inasmuch as it was love against a career. At least, it was put up to her that way by those who thrust the decision upon her. They were merely business names to her, but names who had the say-so in the studio that had brought her from New York to give her a picture career. This career began as one of the leads in Wesley Ruggles' picture "Are These Our Children?" Mr. Ruggles' interest in Arline became more than professional. He invited her to have dinner with him. She did. The first date led to others. Ruggles' interest warmed. Likewise, Arline's. They were becoming very serious and matrimony loomed around a near corner.

The studio, however, wanted no such corner for Miss Judge. It was one thing to romanticize in celluloid. It was another to romanticize away from celluloid. Arline received a request to make a prompt appearance in the head office. She appeared. Very tactfully, the executive, behind the flat-topped desk, intimated that the studio had big things in store for Arline

DECISIONS AT THE CROSSROADS

JUST HOME Folks

The Lloyds—Peggy, Harold, Gloria, Mildred and Harold, Jr.

PLEASE DON'T call us Hollywood's happiest couple," begged Mildred Davis Lloyd. "We aren't the happiest couple in Hollywood, I am sure. I wouldn't want to be. Harold and I are just two normal, healthy people who married because we loved each other and we are raising a normal, healthy family and are enjoying it.

"We have disagreements. They are never very serious, but we frequently have a difference in opinion and we don't hesitate to tell each other about it. When we get peeved about anything we talk it out and arrive at an understanding that is agreeable to both of us. Then we kiss and 'make up' like other folks do.

"I think it is absurd for anyone to say that two people can live without occasional quarrels. Harold and I don't. We are really just plain home folks. Harold is an ordinary business man at heart whose business happens to be located in Hollywood. There isn't anything of the actor about him after he leaves the studio. Luckily we like the same things and get a lot of happiness out of the children, so we never have a dull or wasted moment."

That, in a nutshell, is the story of Harold and Mildred Lloyd and how they have managed to make a success of matrimony in a place known the world over for its menaces to marital happiness. When Junior gains a pound or learns to chin himself, that item is just as important in the Lloyd menage as is Harold's selection of his newest leading lady.

Mildred suffers for Harold's art occasionally. In his latest picture, "The Milky Way," he plays the part of a milkman. Mildred says that for a solid month he got up at dawn and slipped around to the front door, to practise the art of delivering milk. It seems that one of the fine points in a milkman's technique is to be able to put down the bottles in the wee small hours of the morning without making any noise.

It was several weeks before Harold accomplished the art, but now he is so good that if anything should ever go amiss with his movie career, he could get a job in any dairy.

Mildred says she goes through an ordeal every time he starts a picture. When he made "The Catspaw" he would greet her in Chinese every morning and he would eat with chop-sticks at the table and say good-bye like a Chinaman. She says she felt like a half-caste herself before the picture was finished.

It is easy to understand why Harold has found his greatest success since marriage. Mildred is an optimistic person and has a canny understanding of audience appreciation. She catches all the "sneak previews" of Harold's pictures with him and whenever she says that a scene should be cut or lengthened, Harold accepts her advice without question.

It is surprising to find that Mildred's domestic problems are like so many other wives. Gloria and Peggy Lloyd are going through the same experiences and phases that all normal children do. They have bands on their teeth and they have become ardent movie fans.

Mildred says that taking them to the movies is quite an ordeal. The whole family goes to the neighborhood theatre every Saturday night, but the children never get enough. They always want to see the show over again. Every time they go Harold says, very sternly, "Now remember, we are going home the minute the picture is over and I don't want anybody to say a word or we won't go again." But they usually come home around midnight with both Harold and Mildred vowing that they never will go again. However, next Saturday always finds them back in their old seats.

The girls have a little club in the neighborhood which they call "The Jolly Eggers." They were deep in initiation plans a few weeks ago. They were planning a portable club house so they could move it about and were trying to decide upon the insignia for their membership pins.

The Lloyd home consists of eighteen acres, beautifully landscaped. There is no need for them to go any place to seek relaxation or enjoyment, for everything is there within those high stone walls.

On account of numerous kidnapping threats, an armed guard patrols the estate and nobody is ever admitted inside the barred gate until they establish their identity. Every part of the house is connected by means of a private telephone exchange. The Lloyds have a private telephone book listing all of the various connections.

Although they are surrounded with every conceivable form of luxury, they maintain a sane method of living. They are all interested in the Dionne quintuplets. Each one has picked a baby as his special pet and each one watches all the news items and photos concerning "his" infant's progress. Mildred, Gloria and Peggy selected five dainty little bonnets which they sent to the Quintuplets and their proudest possession is the letter of acknowledgment sent them by Dr. Dafoe.

THE Lloyd children are advanced mentally for their years. Travel has undoubtedly helped them. The entire (Continued on page 85)

Rarely will you hear a star discuss her true love, her career and her faults so frankly or honestly

I DON'T think I'll ever commit suicide," said Maureen, with a pleasant laugh. "I don't think I'll ever have melancholia or die of a broken heart or be hauled off to a psychopathic ward or go under for the third time. Perhaps I might for love, but for nothing else."

And, as she spoke, Maureen's blue eyes strayed, as they had been straying ever since we sat down to lunch in the studio commissary, to John Farrow where he sat at a table a few feet from ours. And it's not being sentimental to say that never have I seen such a look in the eyes of any girl in love. All of the tenderness, all of that starry first wonder, all of the sweetness and fidelity, pride and humbleness, slavery and sovereignty of love was in her eyes.

"John is all I really care about . . ." whispered Maureen.

"But to go back—I'll never do anything desperate about anything else that may befall me because, when I have most reason to be desperate and depressed, I am the most do-and-darish. When I'm down, I'm up. I'm like my native Ireland in this respect. I parallel the history of my country—I'm at my best when I'm cornered and have to fight.

"On the other hand, any little success I may have simply anesthetizes me. I just sit down and do nothing. I sink into the first comfy chair, with a book, and call it a day.

"I've always been like this. When I was a tiny youngster, at home in Ireland, if I happened to be on the outs with the family and was being ignored and sent to Coventry, my back was up right away. I'd do drastic things to recall attention to myself. I'd work like a demon in school so that my report card would be better than the reports of my sisters and brothers. Or I'd give away all of my clothes to the poor so that I could pose as a poor little martyr, stripped to the skin. Or I'd deliberately fall downstairs, injure myself in some carefully minor way so that I would be in the limelight, entitled to sympathy. It usually worked—and once I was reinstated I promptly lapsed again.

"When I was sent to a convent school in London, I did very well at first; I got good marks, both in my work and in my conduct. There seemed to be nothing to strive for then. So I just did nothing. I muffed my studies. I didn't so much disobey rules and regulations as disregard them. I let myself go to such an extent that I was—and I've never told of this blot on my 'scutcheon before—I was expelled.

"My people were sent for to come from Ireland and take me home. I knew that I had a battle on my hands. I knew that I would have to face the music and that the music would be plenty martial. I was down in the slough of despond and defeat but—my spirits soared! I prepared for the fray. I wore my prettiest dress. I decided not to eat too much so that I would lose weight and look pale and interesting. I adopted the martyr pose as the one best suited to my needs. I played my part excellently. I posed as a free soul who could not be subjected to English rule, or something. The result was excellent for me. For I was sent to Fontainbleau to live for several months. And it did me good. I got more out of that experience than I would ever have got out of remaining in school. I learned to speak a very decent French. I met some interesting people. It really did things for me . . . .

"I would never have come to Hollywood if it hadn't been for one of those 'down' periods of mine. I hadn't been sitting very pretty with the family. Mother was strict and I'd been going out a lot more than she approved. Came a night when I was invited to dance and dine at a sort of night club in Dublin, a place very similar to our Cocoanut Grove here in Hollywood. Mother told me I couldn't go. Immediately my fighting spirit rose. I was defiant, I'm afraid. I said that I must go. I would go—and I did. And that was the night when Frank Borzage saw me and asked me if I would like to make a test for the screen.

NOT THAT this has anything to do with the subject we're talking about," said Maureen, her dark eyes suddenly tender, "but here's something about my coming to Hollywood I've never told anyone before. Dad, you see, didn't want me to come. Frank Borzage knew this and he said he would come and talk to Dad but that, if Dad continued to feel too strongly about it, I'd better abide by his wishes and remain at home. I was pretty certain Dad would say 'no.' And then, the night before Mr. Borzage was to call on us, my baby sister was saying her prayers, when Dad chanced to pass her door and heard her say, 'Dear God, please make Daddy let Maureen go to Hollywood, for thy Son's sake. Amen.'

"It was on the wings of that dear little prayer," said Maureen, with a shaky laugh, "that I really came to Hollywood. . . .

"When I first arrived, everything was wonderful. I made the picture with John McCormick and he was marvellous to me. Everyone was interested; things went beautifully. I took myself a very swank apartment at the Garden of Allah. I was up—oh, 'way up . . .

"After the McCormick picture I was judged a 'success.' That was my undoing. Everyone was only too anxious to be nice to 'the little Irish girl.'

"I just can't stand success," laughed Maureen. "And this is what I did. The studio offered to give me singing lessons, drawing lessons, elocution lessons. But, I figured, if one could be successful without knowing these things, why bother to learn? I took one elocution lesson, two dancing lessons, no singing lessons and then sat back quite pleased with myself!

"Next they told me that I should see pictures and watch other actresses but I, in my ignorance, thought that the reason I was 'successful' was just because I didn't know how to act! (Must have been an acute case of swelled head which ballooned me up into that mirage!)

"The final straw came when they compared me to Janet Gaynor who was my favorite star. From that point I just bent backwards doing nothing. Nothing has ever been done as completely as I did nothing—if I make myself clear!

"I didn't bother about my clothes, on the screen or off. I never studied. I stayed out late every night and arrived for work each morning in a state of total exhaustion.

FINALLY came the awakening! What I had considered my 'success' was no such thing at all, merely the mistaken enthusiasm of someone in the front office. I was not attracting people into the theatres. On the contrary, I was keeping them out. Yes, I'm going to let you have it all. I had, you see, made enemies of Janet Gaynor's fans, who resented their idol being compared to this upstart young creature playing in pictures Janet should have been in. The picture parade of laugh hits and musicals marches on

★★★★ Modern Times (United Artists)

All that actually need be said about "Modern Times" is: Chaplin is back. As it's been nearly five years since "City Lights," the return of Charlie in any sort of picture is an event. His return, it is our happy duty to report, is doubly welcome because this is a better picture than "City Lights." Some will regard it as Chaplin's best film: our own opinion is that it ranks with "The Gold Rush" and "Shoulder Arms." Anyway, it's more than pleasant to see once again the familiar figure of the pathetic little vagabond, still the underdog, still at odds with the world, and still aiding the damsel in distress. "Modern Times" is a satire, the story of the clash between an individual and a system, between man and the machine. It's a silent picture (if you don't know what that is, ask somebody's mother), with musical accompaniment composed by the star, who also wrote and directed the film. Best of all, it's Chaplin with all his tricks. Two of the funniest comedy sequences in recent years are his tussle with an automatic feeding machine and his debut as a singing waiter, in which he chants a strange jargon accompanied by a dance that out-Freds Mr. Astaire. Portraying the waif one expects in all Chaplin pictures is Paulette Goddard, and the young lady has beauty and considerable animation. You'll be seeing "Modern Times" anyway, so why are we telling you all this?

This marks the first time that Chaplin actually "shot" from a completed script. Heretofore he has merely had the skeleton story outlined in his mind, improvising the action on the set. But the comedian spent almost three years writing this story, down to the most minute detail. Contrary to general belief, Chaplin is not averse to the talking picture for screen expression or entertainment. But for his own medium he feels the pantomime method is far superior. Among the most familiar symbols in the world today are the stick, hat, shoes and moustache which have contributed so much to Chaplin's fame. When he arrived in America for the first time in 1910 and made a two-year tour in vaudeville, they were with him. When he made his first appearance in pictures, in the Keystone Comedies, they were with him. And when he formed his own company—the first star to acquire his own studio—the stick, hat, shoes and moustache were listed as his chief assets. It isn't all fun being a celebrity and a legend, though. Hardly a morning passes that the Chaplin mail does not include a request for a few hundred dollars as a suitable prize for a "Chaplin Contest" in some corner of the globe. Last month a nation-wide contest was held in Japan for the best impersonation of the little comedian. A few weeks ago in Hungary, a poll was taken by one of the leading newspapers, asking its readers that if seven world-famous figures were in danger and only one was to be saved, whom would they choose to rescue. Chaplin won by an overwhelming majority. You'll spot many an old familiar face in a Chaplin picture. Whether it's a chance for a "bit" or a larger role, Charlie considers his pals of the old acting days first. Among those present in "Modern Times" you'll find Henry Bergman, who has appeared in every Chaplin film for the past twenty years, Stanley Sandford, Chester Conklin and Hank Mann—all Keystone pals. Then there's Edward Kimball, Wilfred Lucas, Lloyd Ingraham, Johnny Rand and many others. Paulette Goddard is a new face, though. She was discovered by Chaplin while playing minor parts in the Hal Roach studios. Because he believes the public prefers to make its own discoveries, Charlie has refused to have his protégée interviewed or given any publicity.

★★★★ The Milky Way (Paramount)

Since Hollywood's two best-known comedians return to the screen simultaneously, it is a pleasure to report that Harold Lloyd is almost as funny in his way as Charlie Chaplin is in his. The difference between them is, perhaps, that Chaplin's comedy is built entirely around himself, while Lloyd's is fashioned around anyone who happens to be present at the moment the gag explodes. Our hero is a mild-mannered milkman who inadvertently gets mixed up in a fracas in which the middleweight champion of the world is knocked out. The press believes the milk purveyor landed the lethal sock, and since the press is a powerful thing, our meek friend soon finds himself a hero of the ring, completely equipped with a smart manager, Adolphe Menjou, and a set of boxing opponents. Around this situation Mr. Lloyd, his director and his script writers have contrived a series of unending and hilarious gags which leave the audience limp with exhaustion by the time the final bell rings. Notable scenes are: Lloyd demonstrating his ducking prowess, Lloyd punching in waltz time, Lloyd teaching his ducking trick to a dowager, and Lloyd in a cab trying to conceal from the driver the fact that his companion is a horse. The entire cast is superb, with special emphasis on Adolphe Menjou, Verree Teasdale, William Gargan and Lionel Stander.

Harold Lloyd's proudest claim to fame is that he never seriously wanted to play "Hamlet." Not seriously. But he does have a hankering to give an audience the chance to roar at his soliloquy and roll in the aisles over his death at Ophelia's bier. Says he's aiming at the funny-bone of his audience, not their brain. Rather make 'em laugh than think, any day . . . One

'FURRINER' FROM TIMES SQUARE

By Dorothy Spensley

NEW YORK'S Montmartre Cafe, during the 'twenties was a popular night spot. It's small, columned dance floor was the scene for the gallant act that sent Cesar Romero into films, via the stepladder of the stage.

Since Romero's arrival in Hollywood two years ago, the Manhattan Latin has made fourteen films, his first "The Thin Man," and his latest "Love Before Breakfast," with Carole Lombard. He has appeared with Dietrich, Arliss, Colman, Margaret Sullavan and other noteworthies' pictures, and has a contract with Universal.

But before telling you about his Montmartre days, let us trace Cesar's footsteps through a period when he was employed by the National City Bank. It was too dull for the graceful six-footer. Nights found him dancing, as a guest. Presently he was dancing, as a professional, with Lisbeth Higgins, Brooklyn debutante, who had theatrical aspirations. Cesar quit the bank job.

All of fashionable Brooklyn turned out in 1927 when Higgins and Romero did their turn in the show, "Lady, Do!" They waltzed, did a fast fox-trot, a tango and threw in a bit of the Apache for good measure. For three years, with partners he hated, partners he liked, and a partner he loved, Romero was a New York exhibition dancer . . . Club Richman, Ambassador Roof, St. Regis Roof, the Montmartre.

One night in 1930, with lovely Nitza Vernille in his arms, Romero stepped out under the colored spotlights of the Club Montmartre. They swung out on the floor to the notes of a tango that had acrobatic variations. Suddenly Nitza, slim and tall, like a column, stood still. Ready, Romero! A swirl of silks, and Nitza was horizontally atop his shoulders, arms outstretched, toes pointing like arrows, and Cesar was performing great arcs about the floor with Nitza on his shoulders.

Be careful! For God's sake, be careful. Those columns . . . too near the floor. A swerve too near, a false move, and Nitza would be dashed against their flutings. Night after night they took this risk for the sake of applause. Applause meant money.

Then a sudden, biting pain in Cesar's side. Excruciating, like a knife that tears its way through tissue. I'm going to fall! I can't stand this agony. I can't faint . . . Nitza . . . confident that I won't drop her. If she fell, she might never walk again. One more dip, then she slides from my shoulders. She is down. Applause. We bow off. My hand clutched to my side.

"I fell to the floor in the hallway," says Romero, retelling the story, "in more pain than I have ever suffered. Finally, I was carried to my dressing-room. Someone found an ice bag. A doctor came, hurriedly. Said it was a strain that affected my appendix, that it might necessitate an operation. I couldn't afford to take time off to remain in a hospital for any length of time.

"For two weeks I danced with the same pain griping me, and I'd rush off the floor and slap an ice bag over my appendix. It was agony, but we fulfilled our contract, although I knew it spelled the end of my dancing career. And it did. But it drove me to the stage. And from the stage I went into pictures."

Cesar Romero danced his way to fame, and here he is stepping with Carole Lombard in "Love Before Breakfast."

Films were glad to see Romero. They took one look at his six-foot two-inch body, his huge chest expansion, his wavy, black hair, his brown eyes, his easy grace, and yelled, "Here's another Valentino."

He isn't another Valentino. And doesn't want to be. He'd like to know who started that fable. Years ago when he was a youngster, and a rabid movie fan, he admits that he would cover the lower part of his longish face with one hand and mark the resemblance that he bore to the late film idol. But he

MEN ARE OUT . . !

Glenda won't rely on them, but is always in love with 'em

By Ruth Rankin

Glenda Farrell, in person! She's doing "Snowed Under" with George Brent.

MEN HAVE never done me any good! . . . but I can't live without 'em!" Glenda added with a flourish, in case you get any wrong ideas.

In the old Farrell homestead is a little brown-and-beige sitting-room known as the "tell-all" department. Something sort of warm and friendly about it, something conducive to spilling the beans.

My motto is, always trap Glenda in the sitting-room if you really want her to talk. I've heard her in every room in the house on account of being a neighbor who runs in and out at odd times, and here's the way it sizes up: she goes grand in the drawing-room, that green-and-white-and-crystal magnificence with the old-ivory concert-size piano, and who wouldn't? I always want to say, "Come off, Duchess, I just saw you lift that chicken leg from the ice-box." In Tommy's playroom she is all mother, as she patiently demonstrates the wrong way to put an airplane together.

In the dining-room she is busy being a hostess, and even upstairs in the rumpus-room, she doesn't let down her hair. Everyone else does, and *some*body has to keep the pressure down. In her bedroom, with the pink satin slip-covers, she goes to bed with Mr. Tilley—that's the name of her favorite hot water bottle—and before you can say, "nine o'clock on the set, made up," she's sound asleep. Or else she takes a book with her, and many is the love-sick swain who has murmured, "Oh, to be bound in vellum."

Well, now that small digression is over, we can get back to the story which is about how men have never done Glenda any good, remember? Of course, if they weren't around under foot all the time and ringing up on the telephone every twenty minutes, she would probably be saying, "Men are marvellous, so big and strong and wonderful, I owe all my success to men. Hey men, where are you?" But you see, Glenda hasn't reached the grateful age yet, an age which even actresses reach, believe it or not. In fact, Glenda is such a long way this side of it she can still afford to tell the truth—a rare luxury seldom afforded any woman, much less a picture actress.

Let's see, where were we? Wait now, don't tell me. Oh yes. Glenda was sitting over there on that beige Chesterfield thing you sink into a foot and it practically takes a tug-of-war to pull you out of it. Often, I've thought how nice it would be to spend a winter in Glenda's Chesterfield, just thinking about life and hatching ideas like this one (only it happens to be Glenda's idea, this time).

"You know," said Glenda, gradually receding from sight, "in the general direction of our subject, allow me to begin by saying I have never met a man yet who asked me to give up my career for him!

"Maybe it's my fault. It seems to be a mistake to be too capable and self-supporting. These girls, brought up from the cradle to be helpless and dependent, are the ones who get the breaks. They are rotten spoiled, but the basic theory is sound—if they don't

Grace Moore has risen from a lonely night club singer to the very peak of picture, radio and operatic fame.

Once Grace Moore bought gumdrops instead of champagne

SHE KNEW HER When—

By Mary Watkins Reeves

WHAT'S she really like?" There's scarcely a week that four or five people don't ask me that question about Grace Moore. And when I answer them I never know whether to start with the Bag of Gumdrops incident or The Case of the Case of Champagne story, since both prove the same rare and delightful thing that Grace Moore has risen from a lonely little night club singer to the very peak of picture, radio and operatic fame, and she hasn't changed a bit!

This time, since the gumdrops are lo! these thirteen years stale, while the champagne is as yet uncorked, I'm going to start this story at the beginning.

It still strikes me as darned odd that I should have met Grace Moore as long ago and in as unusual a way as I did. Except that in Manhattan you can bump into most anybody most anytime. It was in 1922, during an Easter vacation from school. I was spending the holidays in New York when one afternoon I stopped in Washington Square Park for a swallow of water.

A girl was bending over the fountain drinking. When she finished she looked up, noted the bundles in my arms, smiled and said to me, "Go ahayd, I'll hol' it faw yuh," indicating the iron knob that had to be turned to make the water flow.

I drank. And I probably remarked something as definitely non-Yankee as, "That's right nice of you. Thank you mighty much." Because the next moment she was saying, "What part of the South are you from?" in the way all Southerners do when they meet each other in alien territory. And a few minutes later we were sitting on a park bench under a ratty little tree eating gumdrops together.

They were her gumdrops. They were what got the conversation started because they were brickbats if I ever gnawed on any.

THAT'S THE way they do you in this town," she said, offering me the bag again. "The shopkeeper vowed these were fresh. Look at them. Things like that make me so mad I could spit! It isn't the dime, it's the principle of the thing. Now down home . . ."

I liked the girl. She had fiery blue eyes, she gesticulated incessantly when she talked and she was friendly. I was sure she was pretty lonely, and when she told me she was a night club singer I almost died of adolescent curiosity.

"I work in the floor show at "Le Chat Noir," a couple blocks over that way." She pointed toward the Sixth Avenue "L" and added, "The Black Cat."

Night club singer! According to my naïve, homegrown brand of ideas, night club singers were razmataz ladies who slunk around in mascara and skin-tight black satin, crusty with rhinestones and broke into the Charleston on the last chorus. They made merry all night and slept all day under ermine coverlets and probably even wore high-heeled bedroom slippers. And this girl wasn't a bit like that.

In the first place—well, she just was a nice girl. She looked no more than eighteen. Her hair was a dull but not an unpretty shade of brown. (Continued on page 90)

BOB

—big

He's sitting pretty, with stardom ahead—but has it turned his head and heart?

TELL ME, honest and truly, cross-your-heart-hope-to-die, how does it really feel to be the big rave?"

M-G-M's Daily Special, that day, a mushroom smothered filet mignon, was temporarily forgotten as I leaned forward across the lunch table and earnestly directed that question at Robert Taylor. Then, quickly, I laughed at my own folly. "Of course, you won't really tell me the truth. It's one of those hackneyed questions that everybody asks and that nobody ever really answers."

"I'll answer it," Bob said enthusiastically. "I'll tell you the honest-to-goodness, cross-my-heart truth! Only you won't believe me! But anyway I'll tell it to you. Here's exactly how it feels. Maybe I'll be sitting in my house all alone some evening, and maybe I'll pick up a movie column or a fan magazine and, of course, I look to see what they say about me. Somebody says, 'Bob Taylor, the most promising young man on the screen today . . . due to be one of the biggest stars by the end of 1936.'

"I read it twice to make sure I read right, and then I throw the thing across the room and I get up and walk around with a sort of silly expression on my face. I say to myself, 'Well, it would be nice to believe, but I doubt it. They'll catch on to me sooner or later. I can't be anything but a flash in the pan!' There, that's how it feels! And it's darned uncomfortable!"

"But the thrill?" I put in lamely. "You don't get a kick out of it?"

"How can I be thrilled about something I don't believe? Oh, I'm glad about having some money in the bank, instead of working in one for $30 a week, which is where I was headed before Metro signed me up. And I'm thrilled about the nice house I just rented for my mother, and about my new car. But thrilled because they say there are big things ahead of me? Now, wouldn't I be a chump to fall for that kind of ballyhoo? I'll be thrilled when I've proved my success, when I've got more than just a couple of good roles under my belt—but not until then.

"I've just had the breaks so far. Anybody would have come through in a great picture like 'Broadway Melody.' 'Magnificent Obsession' was sure fire, too, with a cast that just naturally carried me along! But suppose I had to carry a picture myself? That's what it means to be a star. And I won't believe I'll be a big one, till I am one! Even then I'll probably still be pinching myself, and holding my breath, like I am now.

YOU SEE, if I'd had any theatrical inheritance, or any theatrical experience, or even any great urge to be an actor, I might have felt differently about it. In that case I might have felt that I was entitled to some success as an actor. But I never really acted before in my life—college theatricals can't count for much—and I never took any lessons. So naturally, I was just as surprised as the next fellow when I found myself with a contract."

"But your mother? At least she must be thrilled?"

"If she is, she doesn't say so. We never talk about my pictures. We don't even go to see them together. Once we went together to see 'Society Doctor,' but it made me so nervous to watch her watching me that we don't do that any more. If she had only said, 'That's good,' 'That's bad,' 'That's indifferent,' it would have been something to ease the strain—but she never said anything. Just patted my hand, and let it go at that. I know she saw 'Broadway Melody' six times, because my cousin, my grandmother and my secretary—they all live with mother—told me so. But she never mentioned it.

"Then the other afternoon she went to see 'The Magnificent Obsession' for the first time. Well, about six o'clock I dropped in at the house, hoping to find out what she thought of it. The first thing she said was, 'Oh, Bob, I'm so glad you came over. I want you to tell me what I should do. The salesman at the gas company tells me that if we turn in the old stove we have now, I can get a brand new one, for only $3.25 a month, and they just put it on the gas bill. What do you think? Shall I do it?' So the talk started on stoves and ended on stoves, and I still don't know what she thought of 'The Magnificent Obsession.'

"All the time I have been in pictures, she has had only one criticism to make and that is that she thinks I spend too much money. In spite of the fact that I'm saving more than half of my salary! Like me, she can't believe it will last, I guess."

DOES HOLLYWOOD WANT NEW types?

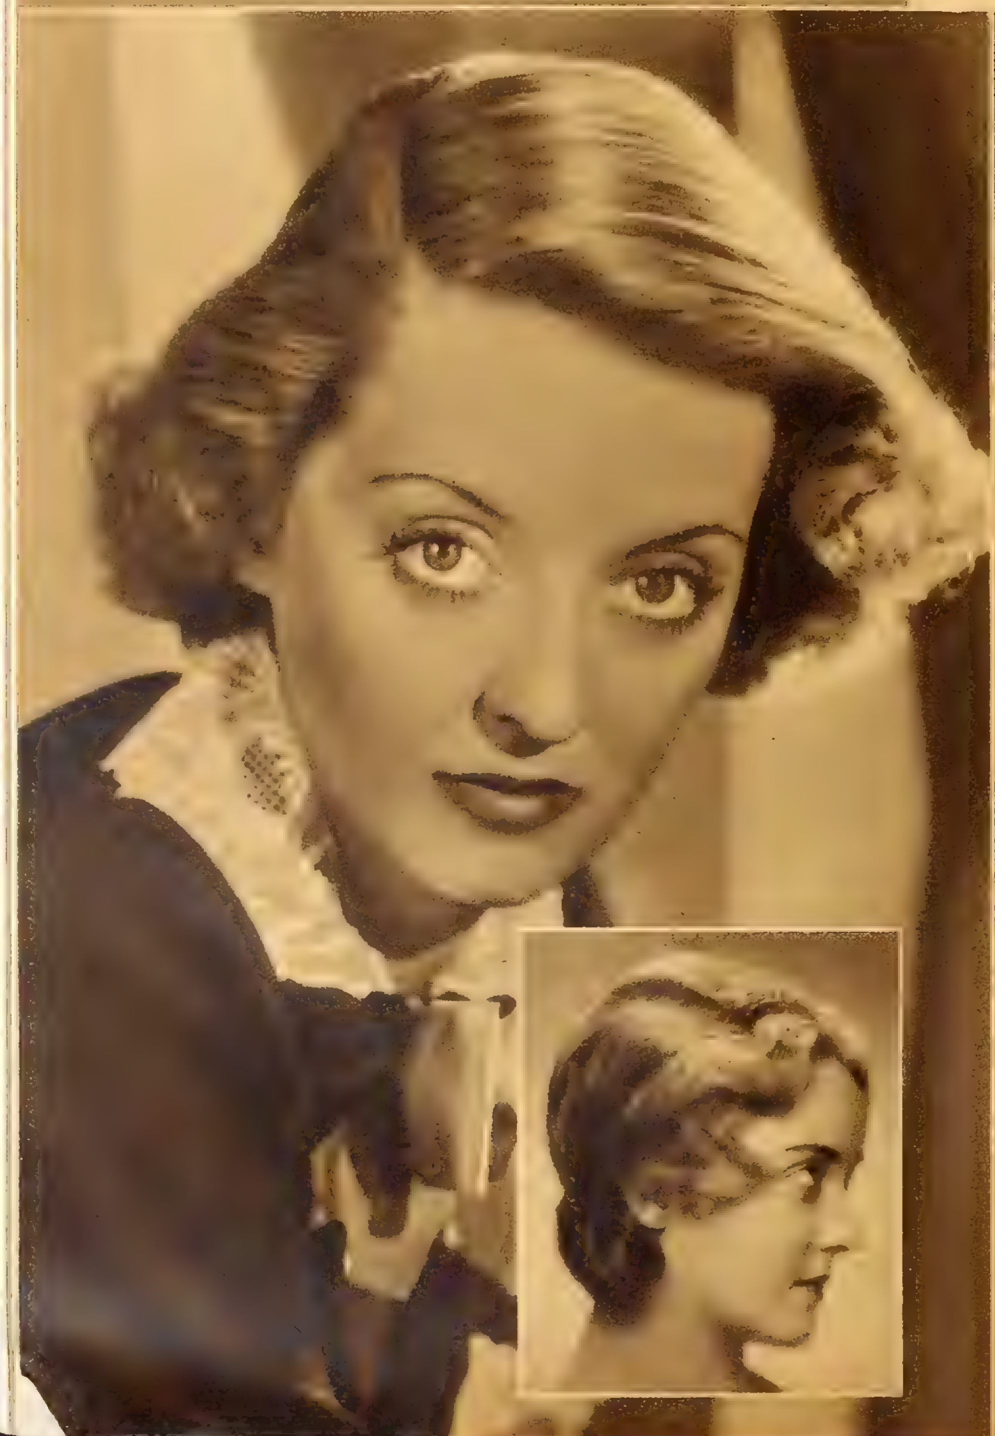
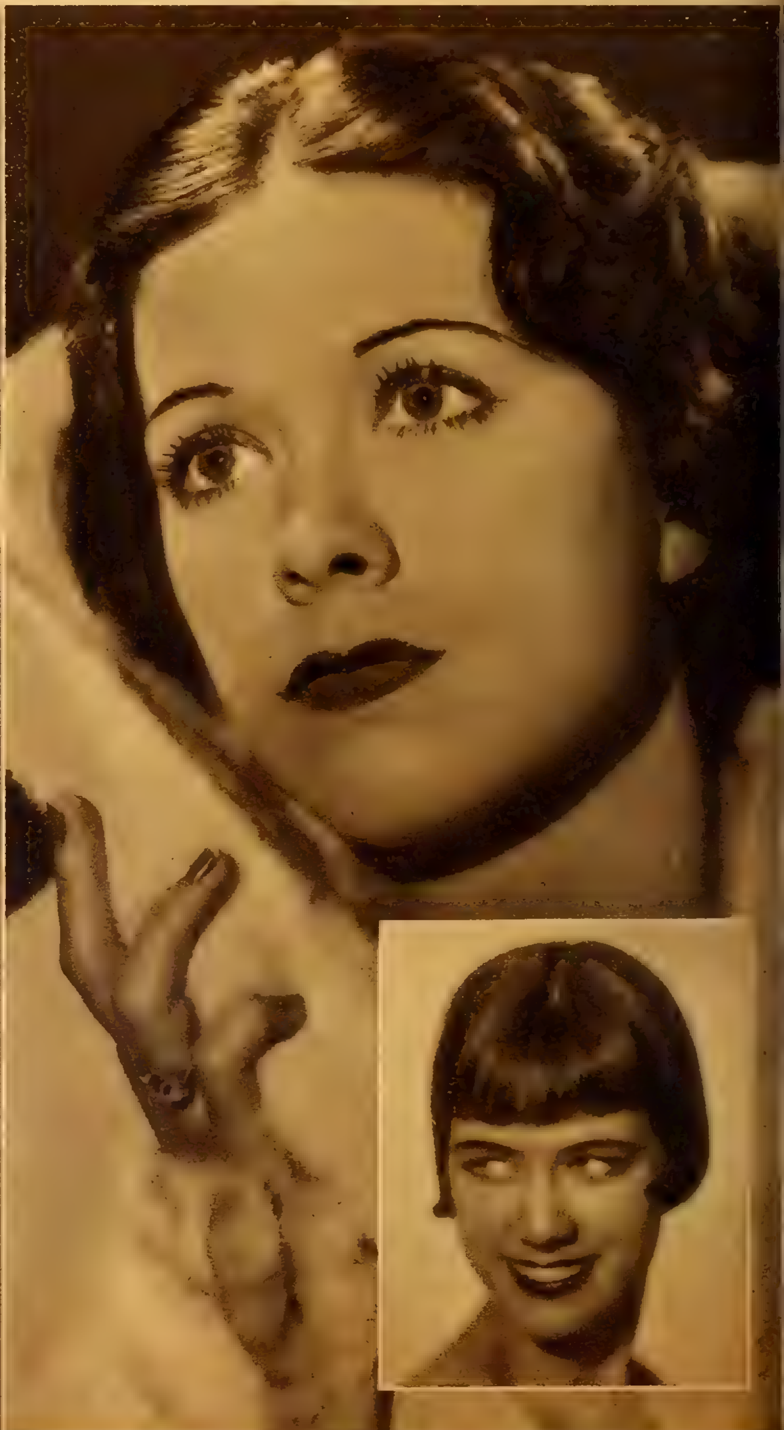
Studios insist that they do, but see if you think they mean it

By Katherine Albert

The small picture shows Bette Davis before she was remodelled according to the usual Hollywood standards.



Before and after "shots" of Eleanor Powell. Don't you think she had more individuality before her movie days?



HOLLYWOOD needs new types," cry the producers. "We are actually looking for new faces all the time," they tell you.

And just to prove it, almost every big studio has a "scouting" department, consisting of a group of expert men and women whose job it is to cover the country like a Joe E. Brown grin. They look in at all the Little Theatres, ferret around in the highways and byways, spot girls and boys dining in restaurants and say, "Ah-ha, we have a new face. Here is a different type."

When big directors "receive the press" they're always giving out advice to you girls and it always runs something like this, "Don't imitate. Be individual. Create your own personality. Don't arrange your hair in the standardized way. Don't wear the same type of clothes others wear. If you want a chance in Hollywood you must have individuality. You don't need beauty. All you need is individuality. You must not look like the already established stars." And so on ad infinitum, ad nauseum, add your own music.

So we believe all this and say, "Isn't it wonderful? Why, I don't look like anybody except myself. I guess I have a chance."

And now suppose you had a chance to go to Hollywood because you were a new type, the one and only of your kind. What would happen? Well, the only thing I can go by is precedent. Let me point out what happens to individuality in Hollywood.

Gladys Swarthout, too, had to conform to Hollywood's idea of glamor, so that now she looks like all the rest.

So Hollywood wants new types, eh, new faces? Then why don't they use a few of the new types they already have?

Listen! You can be as individual as a sword fish and when Hollywood gets through with you, you'll find yourself (much to your surprise) one of the four standard Hollywood types—a Garbo, a Gaynor, a Shearer, or a Harlow.

LET'S LOOK for a minute at what they've done to Gladys Swarthout. The first time I saw her she was rehearsing a radio program. Certainly, there was a girl who stood out from the crowd. In all that melée of sound effects, technicians, microphones and singers, Gladys was an outstanding individualist. Not pretty in the conventional sense of the word, she had that thing called personality the already quoted directors rave about.

Well, Hollywood snatched her from the opera and the radio, and the other day I was looking at some photographs of her and I give you my word I didn't know who she was. She might have been Gail Patrick or Rosalind Russell or Eleanor Powell. For she had been through the Hollywood standardization process and had come out with her hair done in the standard fashion, her eyebrows made up in just the same way as the rest, her mouth rouged exactly as the make-up experts rouge every other mouth.

They've had a tough time cutting Eleanor Powell to the pattern. But boy, they've tried. There's a girl with a face that's almost impossible to confuse with any other face. Here's one with no conventional prettiness, but before Hollywood got her, when she was a dancer on Broadway, she had a cuteness enhanced by a Dutch bob and straight bangs that took away some of the length of her face.

A year before Eleanor was given her Hollywood contract they made a test of her and said she was by no means good-looking enough to make the grade in pictures. So she set out to re-make herself. And presently she found herself in Hollywood where they did her over again, just in case.

Everybody had a hand in this process. Even Louis B. Mayer, the head of the studio, gave suggestions and wrote memos about it.

She was sent first to the hairdresser where she had a permanent wave with little curls all around her face. A lightening rinse was applied. Then they plucked her eyebrows into a thinner line, although she has always had a fine natural arch. The make-up man had his day and gave her a new mouth and there were porcelain caps for her teeth. And they taught her how to confine her gestures —she had always spoken with broad, sweeping gestures before—until, at last, with all the high-paid folks in the studio working on her, Eleanor Powell was as nearly standardized as a girl with Eleanor's true

Ann Harding's tendency is toward a weak spine—thus an ungraceful walk.

Round-shouldered? Conscious of height? Ungraceful walk?

GO AND STAND in front of a full-length mirror. How do you look? Not so bad, perhaps? That is to say, you're not overly fat and you're not skinny. You might not win any prizes, but you'd pass in a crowd. Mm-hmm.

Listen, darlings, I don't want you to pass in a crowd. I want you to stand out in a crowd for beauty and poise and grace.

And remember another thing: while you're standing in front of your mirror, you unconsciously try to look your best. The common garden variety of vanity which you all possess makes you pull your stomach in, throw your shoulders back, hold your head up, when you're looking at yourself in the mirror. Once away from said mirror, you forget—you slump, let the abdomen stick out, duck your head forward. Naturally, you can't go around concentrating all the time on your stomach and shoulders and head. A dandy companion you'd be if you did thataway. No. You must work on these weak spots in your figure and these weaknesses in posture and carriage so that correct habits become as natural as breathing. And how are you going to do that? I'll tell you.

The common figure faults of people who are known as "average"—neither marvelous nor terrible, neither too thin nor too fat—are the following: round shoulders; an ungraceful walk; an awkward sitting posture; bulging abdomens on comparatively slender figures, which look all the worse for the very fact that the figure is slim; and heads that thrust forward, which fault brings with it such consequences as a lump on the back of the neck, sagging chin lines and lines in the flesh of the throat.

of these sins as you are yourself. Pretty little Joan Bennett, for example, was at one time very round-shouldered. She is, as you know, near sighted and though she wears proper glasses off the screen, she has acquired the habit of peering closely at things. Joan, furthermore, is not particularly strong.

You may be round-shouldered for any number of reasons: youngsters who grow too fast get the habit of slouching from fatigue. Tall girls try to make themselves look shorter by hunching their shoulders forward. Lack of energy, starved nerves, lack of circulation—all these things cause one to slump. It becomes natural to slump and it's much harder to overcome a fixed habit than to get rid of twenty pounds of excess weight. Harder—but not impossible. I don't care how long you've had the habit, you can (Continued on page 76)

SHE WANTS TO BE A MISSUS

Alice Faye would gladly trade her big movie contract for a

By Reginald Taviner

YOU'D THINK she'd had her Wonderland already—Alice Faye. March Hares, Mad Hatters, Walruses and all. For Alice lives through the looking-glass now, and hers is everything that Hollywood has to offer.

But this Alice wants something more, something much more. She wants love and—a husband. She wants them so much that even though the husband might be making only enough money for love in a cottage, she'd still gladly trade her big movie contract for him if she had to choose between the two. It's hard to believe, but the fact is Alice would prefer that he could only afford love in a cottage, for this is exactly her idea of real happiness.

Now, don't get Alice Faye wrong. She isn't "fed up" with Hollywood. She isn't dissatisfied with her career. She isn't a bird in a movie-gilded cage, nor a poor little rich girl who wants to throw that swell mink coat, and all that goes with it, into the first convenient ashcan.

Quite the contrary. Alice is thrilled by her good fortune. But she wants a husband whom she can love more than anything she has ever had or known or loved thus far, more than all those other things put together.

"I want someone who will make me forget me," said Alice wistfully, "someone who will make me jump at the lift of a finger, someone who will lead me around, someone who will be so important in my life that even my work will be relatively unimportant."

You know Alice Faye, of course. She's the slim, blonde, blue-eyed streak of vivacity whose feet twinkled so flashingly in "George White's Scandals" both on stage and screen. She's the girl who got her first break when she good chance to promise to "love, honor and obey" was a Broadway chorine by becoming a featured radio singer with Rudy Vallee, and then, coming with him to make the picture, stepped into Lilian Harvey's shoes when Lilian walked out of 'em and off the set.

Alice is the girl who came through so nicely in the movie, "Scandals," that the studio gave her that nice, juicy contract, the one that enabled her to bring her mother and her brother out to California from New York and have all the things that every girl longs for and dreams of.

But Alice is fearfully in earnest about that husband.

"You see," says Alice in that quiet little voice of hers, "I have been working ever since I was thirteen. I've been trying to get somewhere, trying to make the grade by myself. Thinking about me and the career I was trying to carve. Now I'm beginning to think that there's something better than that, thinking about someone else. Thinking about what someone else is trying to do, and helping him to do it."

Alice is still pretty young to have found out that sharing somebody else's dream is the way to happiness, and not being all wrapped up in your own.

"It isn't that I don't love my work," Alice went on, "and it isn't that I haven't a nice home, nice clothes, a nice car. I have all that. It isn't that I don't get a tremendous thrill out of being in front of the camera, seeing my picture and my name on the billboards. I do. But that isn't all there is, is it?"

Alice knows it isn't, and that's why she wants a husband. Sitting among the topmost branches of the tree at twenty, she looks around her and her vision grows surprisingly clear. She's beginning to feel that even a rosy world is only a very sour apple if you've got to eat it entirely by yourself.

IF THE SHOE FITS—Wear It!

I'M TAKING special license this month with that moralizing old saying which is the title of this fashion yarn. Costumes and shoes are so closely related in this spring of 1936 that you can't consider one without the other. Don't become so absorbed with your new spring clothes that you skip casually over that very important item, your shoes! In other words, paraphrasing, don't wear a shoe unless it fits your costume!

Those clever people, who design your footwear, have studied important spring costume trends with an eye to making their shoes veritable first cousins to your clothes in every respect. Here are some of the ingenious ways your shoes show that they're close relatives of your new outfits.

Pleats are very big in costume design, so some of your new daytime shoes have pleated details, introduced in many clever ways, some requiring an almost unbelievable shoemaking skill. Then there's the peasant influence which is echoed in footwear—bright colors, embroidery, and a sturdiness of design. Shoes retaliate with bright stitching, color contrast, broad straps and decorated tongues, low heels and the very new development of

Hollywood closely relates the shoe to the costume this

Next, Ann Harding in beige and red ensemble with the new shorter type of flared coat. Chamois and brown kid perforated step-in pumps, below. And Lucille Ball's blue and white printed peasant style dress with navy blue ribbed wool coat. Broad strapped, sabot-style shoes in blue kid are pictured with this costume. The new square toe and heel are important details to note.

Many dressmaker touches, of avowed femininity, such as braid, puffing and smocking are back. Even ribbon and bow trimmings—and each of these fine points of fashioning are repeated in your shoes. You'll find it's twice as much of a kick to pick your shoes with an eye to their relationship to your best spring bib and tucker.

Navy blue, green, brown, black and wine-red shoes with matching accessories are worn to contrast with pastel costumes. And light and dark leathers in contrast with each other are smart. As the season turns into summer, you're going to approve of sports shoes that reverse the usual brown and white theme, that is, the white is used only to trim the brown body of the shoes, instead of the white as the body and the brown as the trim.

One big bit of shoe news that all Hollywood, as well as you gals, will cheer is the return of patent leather to a bright spot in the fashion sun. And such patent leathers! No longer just the staple black but a galaxy of fascinating colors in gem tones ranging from pearly white to a glowing ruby red, even amethyst, in the violet range, which makes a marvelous alliance for evening gowns. You'll be crazy about them.

Ties and oxfords, step-in pumps (and the good old standby, the opera pump) and the very new looking broad strap shoe are much seen—to mention just a few of the important styles.

I could go on for pages discussing details and styles, but rather than do that, I have selected a number of the stars' new spring costumes together with a group of the newest shoes that would make a perfect match for them. In each case, the star is wearing a shoe which is most suitable to her costume—but I've gone them one better and picked out another shoe style that would be just as smart to wear, too!

Before beginning a detailed description of these, however, I want to mention the return of a shoe that has been Hollywood's most beloved style for years. It's the darling of you girls who have to wear short vamps, it's the French cut pump called the D'orsay. Loud have been the wails of many star gals who, (Continued on page 103)

The fast pace of Modern Living puts an extra strain on Digestion

Natural Digestive Action Notably Increased by Smoking Camels

People in every walk of life get "keyed up." The effects on digestion are known to all! In this connection, it is an interesting fact that smoking a Camel during or between meals tends to stimulate and promote digestion. HILL-BILLY ROMANCE

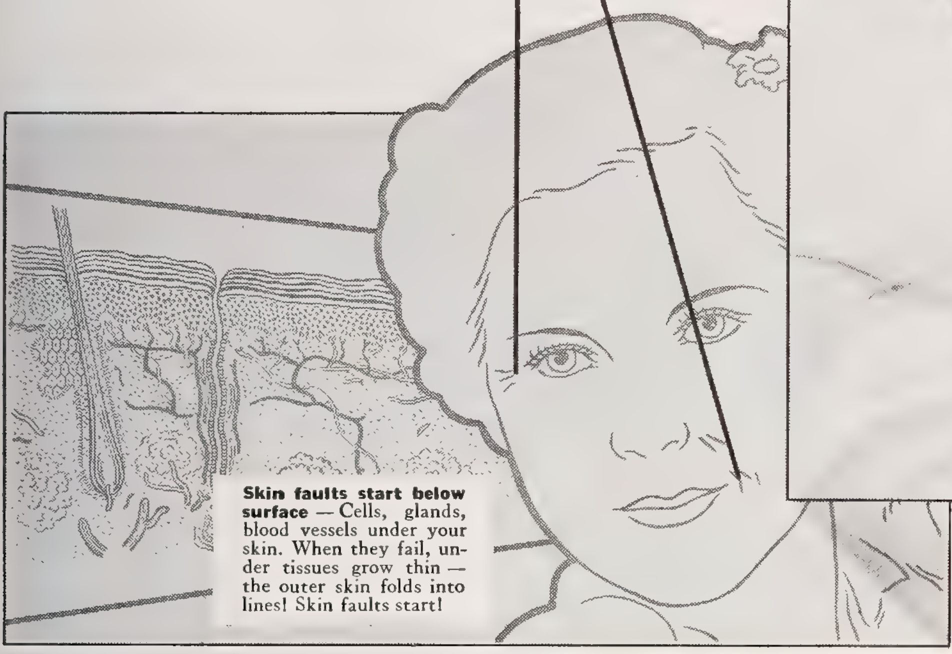
You lovers of homespun romance will revel in the revival of that old thriller, "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine." It's in color this time and Sylvia Sidney is June Tolliver with Henry Fonda as the object of her affections. This saga of the Virginia mountains, when feuds and moonshine likker kept life virile, still makes good entertainment due greatly to Fred Stone, Sylvia, Henry and others of the able cast. Sylvia will do "Mob Rule" with Spencer Tracy and Henry plays opposite his ex-wife, Maggie Sullavan, in "The Moon's Our Home."

LINES SAY "over 30!"



Skin faults start below surface — Cells, glands, blood vessels under your skin. When they fail, under tissues grow thin — the outer skin folds into lines! Skin faults start!

Miss Esther Brooks, much admired in New York this past winter, says: "Pond's Cold Cream takes every speck of dirt out of my pores, keeps my skin clear of blackheads."

A Sign that UNDER TISSUES are Shrinking!

THOSE mean little lines that creep in around your eyes, your mouth . . . You are only 25. But people see them—"She's every bit of thirty!"

Or, you are over thirty . . . but not a sign of a line. And everybody takes you for years younger than you are—"Not a day over 20!"

Do you know what those same little lines say to a dermatologist? He sees right through them to the under layers of your skin, and says: "It's the under tissues at fault!"

Keep away Blackheads, Blemishes —with Under Skin treatment

Skin faults are not always a matter of years. Look at the skin diagram above. Those hundreds of tiny cells, glands, fibres under your skin are what really make it clear and satiny—or full of faults! Once they fail, skin faults begin. But keep them active—you can, with Pond's rousing "deep-skin" treatment—and your skin blooms fresh, line-free, as in your teens.

Pond's Cold Cream contains specially processed oils which reach deep into the pores. It floats out all the dirt, make-up, skin secretions that are starting to clog. Already, your skin looks fresher!

More . . . You pat this perfectly balanced cream briskly into your skin . . . Start the circulation pulsing, oil glands working freely.

Do this regularly—day after day. Before long, cloggings cease. Pores grow finer. Blackheads, blemishes go . . . And those myriads of little fibres strengthen! Your skin grows firm underneath—smooth, line-free outside, where it shows.

Mrs. Eugene du Pont III whose fresh, glowing skin just radiates youth and beauty, says: "Pond's Cold Cream freshens me up right away . . . It takes away that tired look and makes 'late-hour' lines fade completely."

Here's the simple Pond's way to win the clear, glowing skin that never tells of birthdays. Follow this treatment day and night.

Two things to remember

Every night, cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream. Watch it bring out all the dirt, make-up, secretions. Wipe it all off! . . . Now pat in more cream briskly. Rouse that failing underskin. Set it to work again—for that smooth, line-free skin you want.

Every morning, and during the day, repeat this treatment with Pond's Cold Cream. Your skin becomes softer, finer every time. Powder goes on beautifully.

Start in at once. The coupon below brings you a special 9-treatment tube of Pond's Cold Cream.

EYE DEAS
by Jane Heath

Do CANDLELIT dinner tables appear in your When-to-be-Beautiful Chart these early spring months? Then make this simple, amusing experiment: First, make up your face. Then, with KURLASH, curl the lashes of one eye. Add LASHTINT to these lashtips and touch the eyelid with SHADETTE. Now light a candle and look in a mirror. Notice how the side of your face with the eye unbeautified "fades away" . . . but how the other seems more delicately tinted, glowing and alive. It's the best way we know to discover how eye make-up and curled and glorified lashes can make your whole face lovelier. KURLASH does it without heat, cosmetics or practice. ($1 at good stores.)

Naturally, the candlelight test will show up straggly, bushy, or poorly marked brows. And that will be your cue to send for TWEEZETTE, the automatic tweezer that whisks away offending hairs, roots and all, painlessly! Probably you'll want a LASHPAC also, with a unique stick of mascara, like a lipstick, to darken lashes and mark brows. It has a clever little brush for grooming too! Each, $1—at good stores.

Does Hollywood Want New Types?

individuality can be.

I HONESTLY think that pretty soon they'll work out a system whereby a face can be made into putty, put into a thoroughly approved Hollywood mould and come out exactly as the executives, directors and cameramen want it to be.

Did I say that there were four Hollywood types? I think I'm giving them a break. Sometimes it seems that there are but two—the blondes and the brunettes.

In fact, I knew a man living in Hollywood who met a blonde. At every party he attended he thought he saw this girl. Naturally, he spoke, thinking it was the one he knew. He got several icy stares and one good resounding smack in the face. So he stopped speaking to blondes. And then a few weeks later he was at another party not speaking to any blondes when a girl came up and said, "Well, getting pretty ritzy, aren't you?" And that was the girl he really knew.

Garbo is definitely a type of her own now. Yet she, too, was run through the Hollywood mill. If you'll look at some of her early stills taken in Sweden and if your eye can ignore the dated clothes, I think you'll see that actually she had much more individuality then than she has now.

Garbo was one gal who fought hard against being standardized. (The rest submit to it docilely and with delight.) But you can't fight very hard when you're a studio newcomer and speak only Swedish.

So they would sit Garbo before a mirror and the make-up people and hairdressers would do their stuff. And when they were finished and would stand back admiring themselves for the reflection they had created, Garbo would look at herself with a jaundiced eye and pronounce, "Garbo does not like!"

It happened over and over again. So they'd get out the book again and try type 4-BX and still Garbo would not like. Finally, she was reported to the front office and the front office sent word that Garbo would like or else. And that's how the Garbo you know was born.

LUISE RAINER has a nice new sort of face, but I'll bet silver dollars to hardtack that it won't be long until it is standardized, Hollywood style. Elisabeth Bergner has a face of her own. Maybe that's why she won't return to Hollywood. In fact, most of the foreign stars look like real people.

Look at Bette Davis. She couldn't get anything to do but weak sister roles. Her trunks were all packed to leave for New York when a call came from George Arliss asking her to appear in his picture because he knew Bette was a swell actress. There followed a big remodeling process—hair blondined, eyebrows plucked, mouth painted on. And presto! chango! abracadabra! Bette was a big success.

Remember Kay Francis in "Gentlemen of the Press"? With that sleek boyish bob and those heavy eyebrows, she looked like nobody else in the world but Kay Francis. But it wasn't long, it wasn't long!

No, sir, you're only allowed to see the stars au naturelle for a very short time. Then they must conform, they must be remade or you don't see them any more. They're just shipped back home with a "sorry, brought out by mistake" notice.

Now, the interesting part is that the gals, themselves, get a kick out of it. It is thrilling to sit before a mirror with dozens of efficient hands giving you the works and emerge with a personality utterly different from the one you sat down with. It appeals to the imagination of every woman. I'm sure you, too, have looked at yourself and wished you could trade in that old pan for a new one.

True, the camera makes certain demands. But you can't tell me that it isn't able to photograph girls unless their eyebrows stand up like totem poles and their mouths look as if they've been freshly tattooed. Certain things are necessary, I realize, but why must they all be the same things?

I may be dead wrong, but I thought Joan Blondell was sort of cute the way she was—her hair flying around her face, a little on the plump side, maybe, but at least she was herself and a definitely different type. And, she did have pep and vitality and a certain dynamic quality which is rare enough among the languid lilies of the screen.

And now Joan Blondell has gone and done it, too. Now she is a "new" Joan Blondell with hair thinned out, eyebrows plucked differently, sleekness and chic all over the place.

Just to prove my argument I'm going to pull a small psychology test. Very slowly I'm going to say some names. Rosalind Russell. Rochelle Hudson. Patricia Ellis. Anita Louise. Anne Shirley. Ann Dvorak. Arline Judge. Cecilia Parker. June Knight. Gertrude Michael. Marian Marsh. Betty Grable. Gail Patrick.

I could go on, but that's enough for the test. You've seen these girls, either in the films or in photographs dozens of times. And yet when I mention their names does an instant vision flash into your mind? Does a complete face, an individual face come up clearly in your brain's eye at the mention of each name?

NOW, have someone name ten girls in your class at school or friends of your friends—girls you don't know too well. Betty Jones. Mary Smith. Sally Brown. Okay? Do you see their faces sharp and clear when their names are mentioned? I have a hunch you do.

There, then, the case rests. Your friends haven't been standardized by Hollywood. They haven't been stripped of individuality.

Oh, mind you, there are exceptions. There are stars who survive the process and emerge with clear, sparkling personalities. And I don't know why I should be complaining about those who have been remade to fit the Hollywood pattern. Certainly they're all beautiful. They're all glamorous. The Hollywood type is a lovely type and I'm all for it.

But the only thing that makes me mad is that they're always saying that Hollywood needs and wants new types. That individuality is the thing. And then they don't stand behind their statements.

So don't fall for it any longer. Because if you were picked by one of the "new faces scouts" and brought to Hollywood this is what would happen: if you are little and cute and soft, you'd be moulded into the Janet Gaynor pattern. If you are tall and willowy and sloe-eyed, you'd turn out to be Garbo, no matter what you thought about it. And if you are of medium height and medium coloring and look like a lady, they'd make you into a Norma Shearer. And so on and on and on. Improvement is commendable but standardization is something else again.

The most tragic triangle of all—

HUSBAND...WIFE and FEAR

Back of most marriage failures, say family doctors, is woman's fear, born of ignorance and half-truths. "Lysol" would help to prevent many such needless tragedies.

IGNORANCE of proper marriage hygiene, and the "incompatibility" it brings, is estimated to be the cause of more than half the divorces in America today.

The nervous fears of a wife...her natural reluctance to be frank about such a delicate subject...a husband's puzzled resentment. These are the rocks on which thousands of marriages crash.

How stupid—how sad—that this tragedy should go recklessly on—when there is one simple method which has earned the confidence of millions of women who use it regularly...the "Lysol" method.

There are two important properties of "Lysol" which make it valuable in antiseptic marriage hygiene. (1) It has an exceptional spreading quality; it reaches germs where many ordinary methods can't reach. And, (2) it remains effective in the presence of organic matter (mucus, serum, etc.) when many products don't work. Yet in the proper solution, "Lysol" is dependable and harmless to sensitive tissue. So dependable and harmless, it is used in the delicate operation of childbirth.

The use of "Lysol" gives a reassuring sense of antiseptic cleanliness. But, far more important, it gives you peace of mind, free from that tension of suspense that leads to so many needless heartaches.

The 6 Special Features of "Lysol"

1. SAFETY..."Lysol" is gentle and reliable. It contains no harmful free caustic alkali.

2. EFFECTIVENESS..."Lysol" is a true germicide, which means that it kills germs under practical conditions...even in the presence of organic matter (such as dirt, mucus, serum, etc.). Some other preparations don't work when they meet with these conditions.

3. PENETRATION..."Lysol" solutions, because of their low surface tension, spread into hidden folds of the skin, and thus virtually search out germs.

4. ECONOMY..."Lysol", because it is concentrated, costs less than one cent an application in the proper solution for feminine hygiene.

5. ODOR...The cleanly odor of "Lysol" disappears immediately after use.

6. STABILITY..."Lysol" keeps its full strength, no matter how long it is kept, no matter how often it is uncorked.

that interest in this year's Centennial Exposition ran high. Then, during the course of the banquet I received from the Governor of Texas my honorary commission as a Texas Ranger."

"Only a Texan familiar with the history of the Rangers can fully appreciate how highly I value that honor. For the memory of the Texas Ranger will live forever in the great Southwest in song and story. Organized in 1836, the Rangers were the guardians of the border, the dashing and ever-ready hunters of the buffalo and the ever-watchful foes of warring Indian tribes.

"Besides receiving my commission I also received a special invitation from Governor Allred to visit the Centennial Exposition at Dallas with the special promise made to my two daughters, Marcelite and Janet, that they would be allowed to sleep in Sam Houston's very own bed. Naturally, I expect to go home this summer, not only because of the inducements I have just mentioned, but also to sample some of the wonderful Texas dishes I've always loved.

"Eating has always been a family tradition," said John, a certain nostalgia creeping into his voice. "At home, in Greenville, near Dallas, Texas, we ate not only well, but plenty! Of course, my parents had been well trained in eating by their parents, for both Grandmother Boles and Grandmother Love always had at least three meats on the table at one meal! I guess it must have made us all grow, for every one of the Boles men were over five feet eleven (John himself, you know, is six feet two), while on my mother's side the Love men had to stoop to pass through doors.

"Although, most folks think only of Chili, Enchilada and other Mexican dishes in connection with Texas foods," went on John Boles, visibly warming to his subject, "in our home we adhered more to Southern traditions, even to the colored mammies who cooked for us. But even if my mother had a million cooks there are certain things she has always made and always will make herself. For no cook could ever make them to suit her! Such things as Pecan Devil's Food Cake and home-made Frozen Fruit Salad are her pride and joy. She'll prepare them for us this summer, or I miss my guess, and by special request she'll be sure to have my special favorite, Fried Chicken with Cream Gravy, served with Rice Croquettes which have a dab of jelly in the hollow of each croquette. I can just taste it now!"

AND I could, too, as John described it. But, fortunately, I did not have to stop with an imaginary meal for through Marcelite Boles, John's delightful Texas-born wife, I secured his mother's recipe for this famous chicken dish — Cream Gravy, Rice Croquettes and all—and was able, therefore, to prove to my own entire satisfaction the truth of John's claims. The combination is completely perfect. But my enthusiasm for that dish is as nothing compared to my liking for the Greenville Pecan Devil's Food Cake or the Frozen Fruit Salad. In fact, I tried out a complete meal à la John Boles! And so vociferous were the praises of those who ate it with me that I now feel more confident that it was the Boles recipes and not merely the Boles charm which sold me so completely on the excellence of Texas cookery. Here's the menu:

A TYPICAL BOLES DINNER
Fried Chicken, Cream Gravy*
Fresh Garden Peas
Rice and Jelly Croquettes*
Frozen Fruit Salad
Greenville Pecan Devil's Food Cake*

Now if that makes you as hungry in imagination as it does John Boles in memory, you'll surely be delighted to know that you can get recipes for all the starred dishes of this popular star by sending in the coupon at the end of the article.

No article on Texas cookery would be complete without some mention of dishes of Mexican inspiration. Nor will we need to omit such mention, for Mexican dishes also came in for enthusiastic praise on the part of this famous son of the Lone Star State.

"Both my wife and I are extremely fond of Tortillas, Enchilada and that perennial favorite, Chili Con Carne," John told me. "We often serve toasted Tortillas with hors d'oeuvres. Tortillas, served with a sauce become Enchilada and a delicious concoction it is, too, one that is as famous here in California as it is in southern Texas. Then of course we often serve Chili as a party dish, or with vegetables as a Boiled Mexican Dinner. Chili Con Carne now comes in cans, put up by Gebhardt's whose Chili Powder has long been famous as a seasoning. Sometimes our colored butler, who does about everything around our place except buy our clothes, concocts a home-made Chili that is marvelous."

I secured an immediate promise from Marcelite Boles that she would let me have her recipes for all those interesting Mexican dishes — Tortillas, Enchilada and Chili Con Carne. And then, in the few minutes that were left of our interview, I tried to gather as much information as possible about Texas and the reason for this year's interesting Centennial plans. Doubtless, you, too, will be interested in some of the things I learned from Mr. and Mrs. Boles about their home state. But before telling you about them, let me remind you that this month's leaflet will bring you not only the Chicken Dinner so glowingly described by John, with its Frozen Salad and yummy cake, but also recipes for those tempting-sounding Mexican treats we were just discussing. That's a lot of recipes for the cost of a single stamp, so send in your coupon, now, before you forget! And while you are clipping the coupon, be sure to cut out the Corn Tamale recipe which is directly above it.

And now back to Texas for a review of its colorful history and a preview of its equally colorful Centennial which many of you, probably, like the Boles family, are planning to attend this summer.

THE Centennial Exposition which opens in Dallas on the 6th of June commemorates the 100th year of Texas independence from Mexican rule.

Other celebrations will be held at different times and in historic places throughout the state—notably in San Antonio, at the Alamo, in whose defense a hundred years ago, 181 Texans died to the last man, giving to the cause of independence their noble example and the stirring watchword of the Revolution, "Remember the Alamo!"

Visitors to the Lone Star State are sure to learn other things about its history, notably the reason for Texas' rightful claim that it has lived under six flags!

The first Texas settlement, it seems, was made by the French under LaSalle, whose mortal remains to this day repose there in an unmarked grave. But because of previous explorations Spain claimed that territory and eventually settled and ruled there, giving it its name.

In 1810 Mexico revolted from Spain and when they gained their independence, ruled Texas as a province of Mexico. Then in 1836 Texas revolted from Mexico and raised the flag of the Texas Republic with its Lone Star, thus gaining the name of the Lone Star State, a designation which, as you know, has remained to this day. In this revolt countless colorful characters stepped into the pages of history, notably Sam Houston who, with but 800 Texans, defeated the Mexican General, Santa Anna, commanding a force three times as great, in the decisive battle of San Jacinto which won Texas the independence it is celebrating in this year's Centennial.

After ten years of independent statehood Texas was admitted to the Union, later to secede with the other southern states and to serve valiantly during the Civil War under the Confederate flag.

So there you have the six flags of Texas — those of France, Spain and Mexico, the flag of the Texas Republic, the flag of the Southern Confederacy and that of the United States. Small wonder, then, with so much variety, that their history is absorbing, their cooking delicious, and their men as charming as John Boles, whose favorite dishes we feature in this month's leaflet.

TEXAS CORN TAMALE

1 mild onion, sliced thin
¼ cup butter, melted
¾ pound ground beef
2 cups canned tomatoes
1 cup yellow corn meal
1 cup canned yellow bantam corn
1 teaspoon minced parsley
½ cup chopped stuffed olives
2 teaspoons salt
1 teaspoon paprika
A few grains pepper, black
A dash of cayenne
2 eggs, slightly beaten

Fry onion slices in butter until faintly brown. Add meat and cook until meat has lost its pink color, stirring constantly. Add tomatoes, bring to a boil and add corn meal gradually. Cook and stir until thoroughly blended. Remove from heat, add corn, parsley, olives and seasonings, then the beaten eggs. Mix together thoroughly. Turn into well greased baking dish. Bake in moderate oven (350°F.) for 1 hour and 15 minutes, or until firm and brown. Serve in slices, hot or cold. Particularly delicious when served hot with a sauce made by adding Worcestershire sauce to undiluted, condensed canned tomato soup. Serves 6.

LET ME TELL YOU ABOUT MY DISCOVERY. IT COSTS LESS THAN 3¢ A PORTION

"MILLIONAIRE'S DISH"

"JOHN'S fussy about food and seasonings. It's not often he gets enthusiastic. But I don't think I ever serve Franco-American Spaghetti that he doesn't say, 'This is positively the finest spaghetti I ever tasted!'

Helps me save

"Franco-American not only costs very little itself, but helps me save on other dishes, too. It makes inexpensive cuts of meat so tasty and tempting. It combines wonderfully with left-overs. And I often have it for lunch or supper in place of meat. It's the biggest help I know in planning 'economy' meals we really enjoy eating!"

Far and wide Franco-American is becoming known as "the spaghetti with the extra good sauce." The cheese and tomato are combined in exactly the right proportions. The seasoning is so skilfully done. There's plenty of zest, but no strong over-seasoning; instead, you find a subtle blend of flavors, a delicate piquancy that delights you anew every time you taste it.

Yet a can all ready to heat and serve is usually no more than ten cents, actually less than 3c a portion. You couldn't prepare spaghetti at home for so little. Think of all the different ingredients you need for the sauce (Franco-American chefs use eleven!), the cost of cooking them, the time and trouble it takes. It's decidedly more economical to buy Franco-American. Order several cans today.

NOTHING COULD BE EASIER

Norforms are small, convenient, antiseptic suppositories completely ready for use. They require no awkward apparatus for application. They leave no lingering antiseptic smell around the room or about your person. They are dainty and feminine, soothing and deodorizing. Many women use them for this deodorizing effect alone.

EVERY DAY, more and more women are adopting Norforms as the most modern, convenient and satisfactory form of feminine hygiene.

Norforms are easy-to-use antiseptic suppositories that melt at internal body temperature, and spread a protective, soothing film over delicate internal membranes —an antiseptic film that remains in effective contact for many hours.

- A distinctive and exclusive feature of Norforms is their concentrated content of Parahydrecin—a powerful yet harmless antiseptic developed by Norwich, makers of Unguentine. Parahydrecin kills germs, yet Norforms are positively non-injurious. There is no danger of an "over-dose" or "burn."

MILLIONS SOLD EVERY YEAR

Send for the Norforms booklet "The New Way." It gives further facts about modernized feminine hygiene. Or, buy a box of Norforms at your druggist's today. 12 in a package, with leaflet of instructions. The Norwich Pharmacal Co., Norwich, New York.

Are You Guilty of These Sins?

get rid of it. And you must, because a graceful carriage is just as important as correct weight. You may have a basically lovely figure and a pretty face, but if you go drooping through life like limp spaghetti, you'll never look well and the most expensive clothes will look dowdy on your figure.

Here is an exercise I gave Joan, to rouse up the old circulation and so help do away with slumping:

There's a large muscle located just over each shoulder blade. Put your left hand over onto your right shoulder and fish around until you feel it. See? Dig your thumb down under your shoulder blade. Dig hard. Hurt yourself a little—that's the idea. Keep your right hand just above your right hip, elbow bent, the hand a little more toward your back than your middle. There, that keeps the shoulder muscle in the right position for this treatment. Repeat, on the other side. You can do this exercise so easily, any time during the day. At your office desk, take a few minutes for each shoulder. At home, take ten minutes out once a day, five minutes for each shoulder. What does it do? It snaps up your circulation, without putting you through strenuous exercise. After ten minutes of digging, you won't feel like slumping.

Another exercise for round-shouldered souls: put two or three books on your head and walk back and forth. Cross your hands behind your back, the left elbow in the palm of the right hand and the right elbow—but you get the idea, I'm sure. It will strengthen your neck muscles, make you keep your head up and when your head is up, it's practically impossible to be round-shouldered.

Don't do these very easy exercises a few times and then think, "Heck, that's nothing," and stop. As I said in the beginning of this article, you have to work on faults which are the result of bad habits until correct habits become second nature to you.

YOUNG Jean Muir offers a fine example of some youthful figure faults. Jean is taller than the average movie star. She has a well developed bust. Long arms and legs. These attributes, which are really assets, Jean has a tendency to turn into liabilities. She's self-conscious about her height, perhaps, so she tries the old knee-bending stunt to look smaller. Many a tall girl will do this when dancing with a short man. And what's the result? Well, the stagline asks, "Who's the awkward number in blue?" I know—I know. Oftentimes, the boys seem to go for the cute little girls. And you feel left out of things, all because of those few extra inches. But never mind—there are plenty of men in this world who admire tall girls. Stop moaning over your height, which you can't do anything about and concentrate on carrying yourself as a tall girl should—like a queen or a goddess or an Indian maid, or any other poetic simile you can think of.

Since I've brought up the subject of dancing, I might as well include a few tips. Tall girls dancing with short partners, place your hand flat on the man's shoulder. Don't stick your elbow out in any fancy position—keep your arm close to his arm. Look down at your partner—smile as fetchingly as you can. He'll look up, you see, which gives him additional height and keeps the poor chap from feeling unnecessarily self-conscious. Flat-heeled sandals are popular for evening right now. Wear your hair low—no bunches of curls or ornaments. All these tricks help, but it doesn't help to slump.

But to get back to Exhibit B—Miss Muir. Another thing which knee-sagging does to the figure—it's almost impossible to keep the abdomen flat, the muscles of the abdomen firm and strong, if you let your legs bend. Do I need to say more? Straighten up those legs and firm up those tired abdomen muscles by the following exercise:

Lie on the floor, on your back, with your hands under your hips for support. Bring your legs up. Continue the right leg on up toward the chest, and lower the left to about three inches from the floor. Then reverse—left leg up, right leg down. Don't let the down leg touch the floor. Make five shifts and then let your legs down and rest. Sure it's difficult, but I've been easy on you up to this point.

This exercise is also good for slimming the thighs and upper legs, in case you're interested. It's also grand for firming flabby flesh and muscles after a general reducing routine and for restoring the abdomen to self-respecting flatness after having a baby. In the last case you should, of course, consult your doctor and perhaps prepare for this exercise by easier work first. I'm merely making a suggestion.

I spoke of Jean Muir's healthy, well developed bust, which she has a tendency to try to make look small by hunching her shoulders forward. So many self-conscious young things do this. What does it do? It ruins the muscles of the breasts, makes them sagging and unlovely. It ruins the line of your back—dresses look sloppy and ill-fitting. In short, the entire figure suffers. Now, there's some excuse for Jean, for she's in pictures and the general fashion persists for petite movie stars. But there's no excuse for you. Don't do it.

Where slumping is due to general lack of strength and vitality, you should follow an energy-building diet. I can make suggestions for foods you should eat, and plan a diet for you, if you'll write me for such information.

ANN HARDING once had a very ungraceful walk. This was partly due to the fact that Ann cared very little how she looked—she never cared what she had on—any old thing would do. And it was partly due to the fact that Ann had a weak back. Here is an exercise I gave her to strengthen and stimulate the back muscles:

Massage your own spine? Impossible, you say? Not at all. Place your eight fingers firmly at the base of your spine, thumbs pointed out toward the hips. Rotate your fingers. Don't move 'em around over the skin—move the flesh itself around firmly. Work up—up—as far as you can. And massage as firmly as you can. Standing or sitting, I don't care how you do this exercise, just so's you do it. Do it at night, before you go to bed. It will make you sleep well, which never hurt anybody.

The German goose step is another way to get grace and spring into your walk. This isn't so easy, it takes a bit of strength. But go at it. Knees stiff. Exaggerate. Kick your feet out as far as you can. It strengthens the leg muscles.

Of course, in this article I'm talking mostly about average figures, which have been allowed to get into certain bad habits. Naturally, you can't walk gracefully if you're carrying around pounds of excess weight, nor can you walk gracefully if you're so thin that you're apt to fall apart. You've got to get your body's flesh as it should be before you can begin to talk about grace and suppleness. These exercises are okay to do if you're working on weight problems, sure, but don't slack on the real hard work of reducing or building up.

Don't point your toes out when you walk, point them straight ahead. To be a little bit pigeon-toed isn't a bad thing. I said a little! Wear as good shoes as you can possibly afford. Take care of your feet; you've only got one pair to last you a lifetime. Wear a good foundation garment—snug, but not tight—if you're inclined to sag. An uplift bras is a good thing, but don't have the straps too tight.

Avoid mannerisms in walking. Oh, yes, there are such things. That's the reason I included a picture of Bette Davis on the opening spread of this article. Bette's walk—on the screen, that is—illustrates my point a little. Bette has played so many meanies of late that she has developed a swaggering, insolent sort of walk to fit the parts she plays. Let's hope she doesn't adopt the walk in real life. Don't mince. Don't stride like a man. It's quite possible to have a free, vigorous gait without being masculine about it. Don't swing your rear in an exaggerated manner —'tain't refined, nor is it graceful. Joan Crawford has an extremely graceful walk which is at the same time spirited and easy, in the modern manner.

AND now—sitting. I could write reams about sitting, and I haven't the space for even one ream. Do, please, sit on what you were given to sit on and not halfway between that part and your neck. The figure should be lightly poised against the back of your chair. If you haven't the will power to sit properly in a soft, comfortable chair, choose a hard, straight-backed one. I give you my word that, though it may be difficult to sit up straight at first, once you acquire the habit, you'll never get tired. Don't keep your legs crossed all the time. You shouldn't, really, ever cross your legs, for it retards circulation, but I realize it's a modern habit. Put both feet on the floor, one a little in advance of the other—that's the best position. Keep the knees together. And hold your stomach in. Don't think you can conceal a bulging tum by crossing your arms over your front. Oh, yes—I've seen you!

That's all I can take the space for this month. If I've left out your pet and particular fault, 'scuse mama, please, and write and ask her about it. One subject I haven't taken up is that of the nervous gals—those who are all in a twitch most of the time, who can't eat and can't sleep and who commit some of the faults mentioned herein, but through causes that are more difficult to remove. I can help you, with diets and easy exercises and relaxing stunts, if you want me to.

Next month I'm going to tackle some really hard problems—like big legs and bad noses and sagging busts and the problem of the exceptionally tall and exceptionally short. This is Sylvia, signing off, and looking forward to hearing from you.

Now, darlings, I want you all to get busy and get all the loveliness and health that belong to you. Are there any questions? Write me your problems, whatever they are. I will help you with your beauty, your figure, general health and other difficulties. It is my work and I love it. And remember this: to me your problems are more important than the movie stars' and furthermore I read and answer every one of your letters myself, and everything is strictly confidential. Let's work together. Sit down and WRITE NOW! It doesn't cost a thing. Just a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

And here's a surprise for you! I've made up a very Special Consultation And Measurement Chart. It will help you check and control your weight. Would you like to have one? You would? Okay, darlings, just send in the little coupon below.

Paul Kelly thinks he's a difficult guy to live with, but Mrs. K. considers him something of a martyr for living with her as long as he has. Anyway, on their fifth anniversary a couple of months ago, Paul received a medal from Dorothy on which was engraved: "To Paul—for living with me for five years." It's a domestic croix de guerre, a tribute to a fighting man and a patient husband.

Bob Taylor is getting a reputation around Hollywood. People are regarding him as a "Good Influence." It seems that Bob, who is one of the best-natured boys in these parts, has on occasion stepped out with a few of the town's haughtiest gals. In the Taylor presence the ladies, for some reason or other, clamber down from their high horses and turn out to be as gracious and pleasant as you please. Right now the shining example is Janet Gaynor. The little Gaynor has never been noted for sociability, but ever since her first few dates with Bob she's been practically the friendliest gal in town.

Speaking of haughty ladies, how about the actress who made a picture with Gary Cooper some months ago? Walking onto the set the first day of production, she asked the name of a tall young man standing on the sidelines. "That," she was told, "is Mr. Cooper." "And who," inquired the lady, "is Mr. Cooper?" And they say she wasn't kidding.

As you probably know, George Raft walked out of his co-starring role with Carole Lombard in "The Princess Comes Across" when he discovered Carole's favorite cameraman was to photograph it. George's last words, as he exited, were: "Put the names of ten cameramen in a hat and let me draw one." Jack Oakie, announcing he would comply with the Raft request, called for a hat. A prop boy returned with a derby, bits of paper were tossed into it, and Mrs. Oakie's whimsical son reached in, only to withdraw immediately, screaming murder. The prop boy, a bit on the whimsical side himself, had equipped the hat with a mousetrap.

Not to be outdone by the Donald Ogden Stewarts, who tossed a formal party at high noon, another gay group sponsored an affair a few evenings later which began at three in the morning. A mad, mad time was had by all, with Doug Fairbanks, Jr., and Betty Furness racing across the dance floor on a tandem bike, pursued by that arch-of-all-villains, Cesar Romero. Also among those present was Marlene Dietrich, but, to the disappointment of all, she didn't ride a single bicycle.

the autographs first! She might have, but she didn't. Because she doesn't want Shirley to know that anybody attaches any importance to the autographs she signs.

Mrs. Temple has also helped to keep her natural by never forcing her to say or do anything she doesn't feel like doing, or saying. And that in itself is revolutionary. Stage mothers are always telling their offspring what to say to the director, how to curtsey to the star, how to compliment the cameraman, how to smile so they'll show their teeth to the best advantage, how to grab the best lighting, and so on and on—and such mother-coaching naturally can lead to only one thing. The child becomes unnatural, false, affected, and extremely conscious of his or her looks. Mrs. Temple has never been guilty of such a practice.

"She always allows Shirley to act on her own initiative. And, except on the set, where she is entirely responsible for Shirley's grooming, she never pays particular attention to how she looks. She never fusses with Shirley's hair in public. She doesn't even notice if Shirley's face gets dirty. And even when Shirley decides to take out her teeth, Mrs. Temple doesn't stop her!

"Oh, didn't you know?" Irving Cummings leaned back and laughed genially at the recollection. "Yes, Shirley lost a front baby tooth or two, some time ago, and naturally we had to make a temporary bridge for her, so we could continue with her pictures. But in spite of the fact that Shirley looks ridiculous without the bridge, (just as any child does, without her front teeth), she is always taking it out without the slightest self-consciousness. It seems she can eat better without it, and eating is one thing she likes almost as well as acting. It was at that same big luncheon, the one I mentioned before, that Shirley yanked out the bridge, and tossed it across a space of five or ten feet to her mother, with the loud words, "Keep my teeth till I eat, will you, mother?"

DID Mrs. Temple get flustered and embarrassed in front of so many strangers? Did she scold Shirley for her abandon of the bridge, and of propriety? She did not. She just ignored the entire incident as being unimportant!

"And recently when Shirley got into a rough-and-tumble scrap with her brothers and came out of it a little worse for wear, Mrs. Temple made no comment whatsoever on the bold bad scratch on Shirley's face. Yet such a scratch would have thrown many a movie mother into a tantrum, and would have brought a heap of abuse down on the boys' heads, for endangering their so-beautiful, and so-valuable sister! Perhaps Mrs. Temple did caution the boys later, but it was not in front of Shirley!

"It's been said that Shirley remains unspoiled and unconscious of her importance, because she lives in a world of her own imagination. That's a lot of bunk—it's not true at all. Shirley's imagination is no different from any other kid imagination, and she doesn't live in a world of her own. She lives in an ordinary, everyday world, just the same as other children do—and that's the sole reason why she isn't spoiled. Mrs. Temple, more than Shirley, deserves credit in that respect!"

I asked Mr. Cummings if he thought that Shirley was a "poor little rich girl" herself. In spite of all the worldly treasures she owns—all sorts of animals, dolls from every country, as many clothes as she can wear—isn't there something that she wants, and can't have, because of fame? Friends, perhaps? Isn't it true that she's kept away from other children—because of contagion?

MR. CUMMINGS shook his head. "It's true that she isn't allowed to make friends with everybody she'd like to make friends with—but that isn't for the reason you suggest. It's because of the very thing we have been talking about—the possibility of contracting something worse than physical disease. You see most children, having seen Shirley on the screen, stare at her with hero-worship in their eyes. They think Shirley is wonderful. Mrs. Temple doesn't want Shirley to 'catch' that idea from them, so she has to keep Shirley away from non-professional children. Professional children, like her stand-in for example, are a little less in awe of her, and for that reason, Mrs. Temple believes that they make better playmates."

Mrs. Temple reads daughter Shirley a bedtime story before tucking her in bed. And this famous little girl enjoys it as much as any other youngster would.

I can see now why Mrs. Temple's is one of the hardest jobs in Hollywood, and why it's a job that is never finished. Even long after she has tucked Shirley in her tiny bed at night, there is still work to do. Sounds to be listened to, fears to be fought, and prayers to be said. Yet through it all Mrs. Temple knows, and Shirley knows, that the most important thought of all is, "Mother is loving you."

Shirley, by the way, celebrates her seventh birthday on April twenty-third.

to you a lot more than all those tales of her concentration on her career. She's smart. Yet that doesn't prevent her from being delightfully silly sometimes.

Some years ago when Jeanette came up to New York from her native Philadelphia, she managed to experience her most embarrassing moments. She had a part at a Newark theatre. And to her distress only one evening gown. She'd worn it a whole season and was heartily tired of it. There was no money to splurge when New Year's Eve rolled around.

Her problem was all the more acute because she was in the throes of first love and the young man's family and associates were wealthy, socially prominent folk. She realized that all the other girls at the party which his mother was giving would be decked in splendor.

Finally, Jeanette yielded to temptation. When the theatre curtain rose she wore a beautiful bouffant gown of shimmering yellow taffeta, trimmed in a lush green. She waited until everyone had departed and then put it on again for the party.

At the stage door was her aristocratic beau. Also, a howling storm. In dashing to his car she ruined the slippers that accompanied the outfit, and the snow spotted the voluminous skirt. In spite of a guilty conscience, though, she had a pretty grand time. She outshone all the women there. But came the morning after! She'd been a house guest who had forgotten to bring a street suit.

There was a New Year's Day matinee and Jeanette had to return to the theatre in billowing attire. She had to go by subway and the blizzard was getting worse. Traffic was held up, delaying her. They held the curtain, praying she'd arrive. When she did, far too late to sneak in, she was caught short. The leading lady was upset, the stage manager was in a tantrum, and—well, Jeanette's been darned understanding of girls in catastrophies ever since!

SHE was punished for phenagling her initial airplane ride, too, but indirectly. Jeanette was in Kansas City, and she'd made her decision not to wed until she'd savored thoroughly of personally achieved success. Still, she enjoyed dates and a most attractive young man was paying her court. His father was a rich bread king and owned planes to advertise the family product. But papa had put his foot down on sonny's taking any girl-friends sky-gliding.

However, Jeanette was determined to discover how it felt to fly. With feminine guile she prevailed upon this smitten scion to invite her to dinner at a specific country club. Papa's planes were parked nearby. So when she smiled her sweetest and begged for a glance at the airships, her ecstatic escort couldn't resist her.

Somehow her friend found himself chatting with someone else when a pilot was climbing into one of the planes. So minx MacDonald had no trouble addressing herself to the employee. She confided that she was dying for a flight. And zoom, they were off before papa's obedient son had a chance to shout stop! But the wind-up was this: Jeanette's bewitched cavalier outdid himself with such figure-eights and complicated loopings that she staggered onto the ground so air-sick she couldn't stay for the programmed dinner and dancing!

With precocity like that cropping out, you'll be surprised to learn that Jeanette has a horror of showing off. She never sings at fashionable Hollywood functions, even when the other celebrities do their stuff. It isn't that she isn't regular. She just becomes so fussed at the closeness of peering strangers that she couldn't utter a note if her life depended upon it.

Yet, recently a dozen of her friends were presented with a perfectly fascinating one-woman show. After a scrumptious supper at her Colonial home in Brentwood, where she lives now because the doors stuck in the house she used to live in, Jeanette suddenly went batty. She dragged her pals upstairs and began tearing through her trunks, searching for old costumes. Her studio accompanist was there, and soon the grand piano in the living-room was tinkling gayly while Jeanette, making quick changes, delivered a repertoire with magnificent gusto. That's an evening that won't be forgotten.

In person she is smaller than you'd anticipate. She is athletic, rather than delicate. And although she is modish with the metropolitan simplicity that is most chic, she cares little for clothes. She's bored with shopping and when she has to make sartorial selections she does so as fast as possible. And depend on her to start the task in a crazy manner!

THE one thing Jeanette has a weakness for is footwear. So she'll eagerly go on "shoe-benders" and bring home a flock of appealing pumps. It's a constant struggle to assemble ensembles that'll match the shades of her shoes. If she intends to step out tomorrow night, for instance, and needs a new outfit, she has her secretary telephone four particular Los Angeles stores. Each sends three or four gowns for her consideration. A lightning decision is made. An hour or so before she goes out the MacDonald dressmaker arrives, and there ensues a whirlwind of alterations and final touches.

Directors have a mania for equipping her costumes with elaborate trains. Personally, Jeanette says, "I think they are a blasted nuisance. You have to kick them around or hold them up. And when I hear music I want to dance!" Which reminds me of that afternoon when La MacDonald blew up so elegantly.

It was a spectacular set and Jeanette had donned a concoction with several trailing trains. She had to walk in, sing, do some emoting, and then exit—gracefully, of course. On each rehearsal it was okay, but on every take she'd get tangled up and trip herself. After dozens of takes her patience was exhausted. "This dress . . . this dress!" she screamed. She stamped. Her hands went this way and that and got mixed accidentally with the pearl necklaces draped around her neck. The strands broke and the beads shot wildly in every direction.

A pall had fallen over everyone. Jeanette, when she came to, stood glaring. Then the cameraman remarked, "Why, Miss MacDonald, aren't you ashamed of yourself?" To which she retorted, "No, I'm not! There ought to be a law against a dress like this!" Next day she went to see the rushes. But they'd filmed and recorded her outburst, too. "I never saw anyone look sillier," Jeanette declared. "There I was, behaving like a spoiled child, absurdly ferocious!"

SHE figures it's not sporting for a star to be temperamental, just because she can get away with it for awhile. When Jeanette's angry it's almost always at something for which she alone is to blame. She's liable to stir up a rage when she repeatedly gets a bit of action wrong. Director Woody Van Dyke recognizes this mood and keeps a chair handy. On occasions he'll place it in front of her. She kicks it and then stops seething.

If Jeanette finds herself boiling at her daily music lessons—and this occurs when she can't remember the exact words or register the right melody—she grabs a book, throws it on the floor, and jumps on it lustily. Her teacher remains very calm during this demonstration, and finally inquires nonchalantly, "Are you over it?"

I don't want to give you the impression that Jeanette has a hectic temper, even though she is redheaded and sensitive. She is slow to rile. She doesn't pick quarrels with those she dislikes. It annoys her to have to be pleasant to them, so she simply avoids them. Poseurs and two-faced people are not on her list, for she herself can't be deceitful. But in depicting her as an ever-serious young woman her biographers have disregarded certain happenings which largely account for her popularity. She couldn't be the stimulating personality she is, if she'd never demanded her due. And, at critical moments, in outbursts of temperament.

There was that rash run-in she had with a stage producer. She had the lead in a Broadway musical and two days before the opening a whole new routine was casually introduced. They didn't have time to rehearse it properly and Jeanette asserted that it shouldn't be attempted on such short notice. This stage mogul was notoriously hard to get along with, and no mere actor had ever dared cross him. He thereupon squelched the ambitious Jeanette before everyone, condemning all performers in his egotistical harangue.

Before the still startled company she told him exactly what she thought of him. He'd had his nerve to speak to her that way, and to want a song-and-dance that couldn't be good. Furthermore, his luck might be better if he'd pay more attention to actors' suggestions! That stand in behalf of her own and her fellow artists' self-respect was so new to him that on the following day the new routine went out and she went on to be acclaimed in a smoothly rehearsed number which she refused to have marred.

It is Jeanette's credo that you have to maintain high standards for yourself if you wish to progress. She broke with Hollywood a few seasons ago, boldly abandoning a long-term contract. It seems she'd signed with a studio which failed to capitalize on her talents, and after three starring films she was utterly disappointed and chagrined. She didn't mind the total absence of songs. Her objection was to the mediocrity of the stories. "I like to try at least to furnish entertainment," she states, recollecting.

One eventful day she resolved that she'd quit Hollywood altogether if she was going to have to continue with ordinary material. She requested her release. They gave it to her only on the condition that she promise in writing that she wouldn't appear in anyone else's pictures for six months.

As it turned out that was a most fortunate step for Jeanette. She'd been besieged with personal appearance offers from Europe. She was such a sensation in Paris and London that the English scouts of another Hollywood studio insisted on hastening her back to California. They bought off the continental tour she'd arranged and fixed it up with her ex-bosses. And hence today, instead of being a forgotten idol, thanks to poor pictures, she's tops in major productions.

As I asserted, the public generally assumes that Jeanette MacDonald is perpetually swathed in sables. Consequently, when she digs out her slacks, an average coat, and brushes her hair underneath a jaunty tam, she can fare forth quite incognito. More than once she's wandered up and down the pier with the Saturday night throng at the beach. The most notable visit was in her customary raiment. Being recognized didn't stop her from being the life of the party.

She went to Ocean Park's concessions with a couple of chums, and on the way they ran into another group of acquaintances in play. After a million chuckles the group approached the merry-go-round.

"Come on, let's go on it!" cried this supposedly dignified star. Jeanette was off on another of her mad moments. "I used to be in the circus as a youngster," she explained with convincing earnestness. (She who was so carefully reared in Philadelphia!) "My parents were bareback riders, and I can do stunts, too!"

She became a feminine Tom Mix, jockeying spectacularly on her pseudo-saddle. With every whirl she waved more impressively. Finally she caught her foot in the stirrup and was bolted right off the merry-go-round. And she sat up bruised but grinning.

Yes, indeed, this Jeanette MacDonald is a keen careerist. But, believe me, she's also some elegant fun when she's got a fancy to frolic!

This story will interest many Men and Women

NOT long ago I was like some friends I have...low in spirits...run-down... out of sorts...tired easily and looked terrible. I knew I had no serious organic trouble so I reasoned sensibly...as my experience has since proven...that work, worry, colds and whatnot had just worn me down.

I had been listening to the S.S.S. Radio Program and began to wonder if my trouble was not lowered strength in my blood... I started a course of S.S.S. Tonic Treatment...at the end of ten days I noticed a change...I followed directions faithfully... a tablespoonful before each meal.

The color began to come back to my skin ...I felt better...I did not tire easily and soon I felt that those red-blood-cells were back to so-called fighting strength.

The confidence mother has always had in S.S.S....which is still her stand-by when she feels run-down...convinced me I ought to try this Treatment...it is great to feel strong again and like my old self.

Much more could be said...a trial will thoroughly convince you that this way, in the absence of any organic trouble, will start you on the road to feeling like yourself again. You should soon enjoy again the satisfaction of appetizing food...sound sleep ...steady nerves...a good complexion... and renewed strength.

There is no guess work in the S.S.S. Tonic Treatment...decades of popular acceptance and enthusiastic words of praise by users themselves speak even louder than the scientific appraisal of the progressively improved S.S.S. product which has caused millions to say to their friends—know how to do anything, why, some man will have to take care of them. And the silly thing about it is, some man always does." Glenda sighed and answered the telephone for the fifth time. All I heard her say was "no." Out in the yard, Tommy whooped it up with the boys next door.

Men Are Out!

WHEN Glenda came back, I wondered innocently, "Do you ever wish Tommy had been a girl?"

"But please, my nerves!" Glenda pressed her forehead and looked anguished. "Listen, my fine feverish friend. Is it not enough that I, a woman alone against the elements, am endowed with a cyclone in pants? But a daughter—spare me! A daughter at least should have her father and several assorted uncles, brothers and cousins to practise on, to teach her to be suitably helpless.

"If I had a daughter, the kindest thing I could do for her would be to bring her up to be a little tow-headed nitwit, always losing things for some attractive man to find, that's what I would prefer her to be —for her own ultimate happiness. And how could I give her lessons? I don't know how, myself. Haven't any idea how to go about it."

"But what," I suggested, gently, "has this to do with men?"

"Lots. Think it over," Glenda advised. We studied the situation for three minutes. It kind of occurred to me we got off on the wrong foot—she came to the same conclusion, right then.

"Lord, how ridiculous! It's a lot of nonsense. I wouldn't be happy being that kind of a woman, might as well admit it. I doubt if half of the type are really happy, themselves. Anyway, the energetic self-supporting woman is just a little jealous of her, that's why we say these things about her."

Well, you can't beat that for honesty, can you?

"Now to return to our premise, if you don't mind," I suggested with typical Irish subtlety—Glenda is Irish too, so she likes you to be subtle in an obvious way—"how's about in business? I thought an actress . . . well, you know."

GLENDA leaned forward and shot sparks as if she had just swallowed a fire-cracker. "Look, funnyface. Because it's you and this is business, I can't get sore, but here's how it is. No man has ever helped me along toward success as an actress. I got whatever I have through just plain struggle and hard work!

"Men have never helped me in connection with jobs. I landed 'em by going in and convincing producers, by saying, 'I'm better than so-and-so for this part, and I can prove it to you.' Then we argued and fenced and banged the ash trays until I finally played the part, or didn't play it, received the salary I asked for, or didn't receive it. That's the way it was, and that's the way it is, in nine-tenths of the cases.

"All this lah-de-dah business about what a girl has to do to be a success on the stage or screen is so much applesauce. It's a very highly organized, competitive business, and you have to treat it as one. No girl ever got very far or lasted very long with any other kind of an approach!" Glenda snorted a few times like a Scotty puppy at a rathole, and finally subsided. (She's very handsome copy when you get her mad enough.)

The telephone rang again and Glenda took plenty of time out, this trip.

She came back all soothed and calmed and slightly in a fog. "Yoo, hoo," I waved over at her, "you remember me. We were doing a story an hour ago, all about men. You went away mad and I finished the Scotch. Have you any idea how we might finish the story?"

The fog cleared and there was Glenda, all merry and bright and rarin' to go.

"We just wound up how to be an actress, didn't we? Well, and so then you get to be one and achieve a certain measure of success—and then what do you want? You want some man to whisper 'give it all up and lean on me.' But he never does.

"I don't know, maybe it's Hollywood, maybe it's being in the movies, maybe it's me—but I have never met a man I could rely on. One on whom I could depend enough to retire and leave it all up to him.

"The fact is, I have never met a man who asked me to! That particular circumstance has inspired countless novels and pictures—but I am skeptical enough to think it never happens in life, except in a very few isolated cases. A man is attracted because you are an actress and more or less in the public eye. That's the only kind of man you meet or have any opportunity to know and naturally, he's the last one in the world to ask you to relinquish your very attraction for him.

"Oh sure, I've had lots of proposals—who hasn't?—but no man has said, 'Now little woman, you're going to sit down and take it easy. Let me do the worrying and make the money and have the public life.' No, that doesn't happen to an actress. At least, I haven't heard of it happening lately.

"Anyway, I have too many responsibilities to ask a man to share, unless he had plenty of money. And millionaires are very hard to fall in love with!

"Certainly, there are any number of attractive and wealthy young men. But they are all play-boys, and who wants to be married to a play-boy? Marriage is a serious thing. You don't think of a husband in terms of how well he can dance or play bridge, or where will we go to dinner tonight.

"Another reason men have never done me any good, I'm miserable when I'm in love, and miserable when I'm not!

"In love, everything suffers, duties are neglected. It interferes with my work and rest. I want to see the instigator of all my misery at night when I should be sleeping, and I stay out way too late. If I don't see him, I worry about where he is. You can't win, any way you take it.

EVERY now and then, between engagements you might say, life seems so calm and peaceful and well-ordered, I wonder why I can't leave well enough alone and let it remain that way. Then something happens. You know, you're not looking for love, it just sneaks up on you. And then everything goes haywire again." I thought she looked awfully bright and happy about things going haywire, and told her so.

"Oh yes. I'd stagnate in peace and calm all the time. Mercy, imagine, how terrible! When the symptoms of falling in love again begin to show, I feel deliriously happy about it. It's going to interfere with my work, I'll worry myself into a decline because the gent drinks too much or drives too fast or something—but it's a nice change from too much rest. He won't do me a bit of good, I know that before it starts, but life would be pretty dull without him—for as long as it lasts."

This passing thought occurred: only a girl who has to shake suitors out of her sitting-room every evening could afford to be this frank about them.

"How about marrying one of them, while it's still lasting?" I asked.

Glenda paddled around in a pool of indecision. She decided against it, I saw her make the resolution, plain as day.

"How about you getting back to the premise? This is about men, not a man, so don't try to put over any of those fast ones, my girl. To continue, all men are so spoiled these days, maybe they've always been and I just haven't heard about it. Not only Hollywood men, but all the world over. There must be a shortage or something. And the girl who waits on table somewhere, or simply lives at home, has a better chance to get the man she wants than any actress has!

"All men are wary of actresses, especially an actress who plays gold-diggers. As a real life gold-digger, I'm a terrible washout. But that's what I play, and that's what they think I must be. The real sober fact of the matter is this: the little clinging babe, with the crying blue eyes, intent on getting herself a husband, any husband at all, is the world's most successful and accomplished gold-digger. She has something to show for it all her life!

"How about marriage for you?" I persisted like a Jersey mosquito.

"Well," Glenda considered. "What do you think, after all I've this minute finished telling you?"

"I think you'll probably marry before I can get this in print," I answered.

"Ha!" said Glenda.

So, dear patient reader, I leave you to figure it out for yourself. Maybe if you would do a little figuring for Glenda, too, she would appreciate it.

As for me—I'm on the way downtown to buy a wedding present. Something I can always use in case the wedding doesn't come off.

family—eleven in all, including Harold's publicity man, Mildred's mother and two nurses—went to Europe two years ago.

Mildred told me a funny incident that occurred on their trip. They decided to leave the children with her mother in Cannes, while they motored through France, Belgium and Germany. They enrolled the children in a French school because they thought it would be such a wonderful opportunity for them to learn how to speak French correctly. They were gone five months. Upon their return they found that their youngsters had taught the entire school how to speak English and everybody was conversing fluently and happily but nobody was speaking a word of French.

Harold enjoys hobbies. For a time he was much interested in magic. Then he took up the study of botany. Now he has thousands of rare flowers and shrubs on his estate and he knows the botanical name of every one of them.

While he was showing the children how to use the brushes and paints of an elaborate painting and drawing outfit he bought them, he became interested in them himself. Now, painting is one of his favorite hobbies. He has a number of pictures that could be exhibited, but he doesn't like to have attention directed toward this particular talent.

"Most hospitals give it to their babies. I want it too!"

"Other kids seem to get the breaks. When I see 'em—nice and comfy—covered with that wonderful Mennen Antiseptic Oil—I could just holler. Why—you'd think I never got sore and wet in my folds and creases! And the germs! Am I supposed to stand off all the germs in the world all by myself? Why should I—when I might be getting the help of this Mennen Oil that's antiseptic? It does the germ-fightin' automatically and it's swell for the skin. Most all the hospitals* use it—so won't somebody please tell Mummy I want this antiseptic protection and comfort, too? I sure am the feller that needs a friend!"

Mildred encourages him in all of his outside interests. They have a playroom that is equipped for all sorts of indoor games, ping-pong, backgammon, bowling—anything you can think of. Mildred says she won't play backgammon with Harold because he always wins, and that isn't much fun for the loser.

They have a wonderful pool and the children are all expert swimmers and spend most of their time in it when the weather is good. Mildred doesn't swim very expertly but she is unbeatable at tennis and spends a lot of her time on the courts with Harold and their friends.

When they have nothing else to do, she and Harold tuck the children in bed and run down to the beach and ride the roller coasters and eat hot dogs with lots of mustard, like they used to do, when they were a couple of kids out for a lark.

THE manner in which Mildred and Harold became acquainted makes one of the most romantic stories in Hollywood. Mildred spent the summer in Hollywood trying to get into pictures. She met with some success and played a couple of leads in Western pictures. Then she returned to Seattle and entered her senior year in High School. Meanwhile Bebe Daniels, who was Harold's leading lady, accepted a contract with DeMille to star in feature productions. Harold tried to find someone to fill her place. Quite by accident, he saw a picture in which Mildred appeared. He knew that she was the girl he wanted. After a diligent search he learned that she had returned to school in Washington and he wired her an offer of a year's contract to appear as his leading lady at one hundred dollars a week. Mildred says she has never had a thrill to compare with the one she experienced when she got that telegram. She returned to Hollywood immediately and the pictures which they made together were highly successful. They began "keeping company."

Mildred's mother was as strict with her in Hollywood as she had been in Washington. She made it a hard and fast rule that she had to be in by ten o'clock every night.

Mildred says she often suspected Harold of going to parties with another girl after he had taken her home, because the fun doesn't begin in Hollywood until after ten. However, they had only a brief engagement. They married and have found success and happiness in their lives together.

Like Chaplin, Harold is inclined to be pessimistic. Two or three times in the course of every production, he reaches a point where he feels that the whole thing is a failure. Then Mildred gets busy and shows him why it isn't or if anything is wrong she helps him discover how to remedy it.

Unexpected delays and disappointments mark almost every big Hollywood production. Harold's comedies are no exception although he spends at least four months in preparation—and like Chaplin, years between picture releases—before he ever allows a single foot of film to be shot. In "The Milky Way" he mixes with a heavyweight prize fighter. Their sequences are as funny as any he has ever done, for Harold pretends to know nothing about fighting. It is difficult for him to feign ignorance of fighting because he has always been proficient in the art of boxing. When he was fifteen years old he was being groomed for an amateur championship fight in Colorado. His mother found out about it and promptly put a stop to his ambitions for a ring career, but Harold has never lost interest in pugilism.

woman took my hand, looked at the palm, then looked up at me: 'My! You are masculine!' she said. The womanish fellow was standing just in back of her. 'I should sa-ay!' he said."

There was a broad grin on the irregular featured, likable face of Ross Alexander, whom you've seen and remembered in "Flirtation Walk," "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Captain Blood," and more recently in "Brides Are Like That."

ALTHOUGH it may please his rapidly growing feminine fan contingent to see him in frequent pictures, Alexander is not sure it's so much fun to be rushed immediately from one film into another, finishing one on Monday and scramming into another on Wednesday. He hasn't time to do anything but sleep. He comes in from the studio dog-tired, eats his dinner, goes to bed at nine o'clock every night, and is up with the California mocking birds at dawn. It doesn't give him a chance to get to the Stadium for the Friday night fights or to play with his electric trains (he's a nut about them). But what can a guy do when Success seizes him?

Life, however, has always been that way for Alexander, as it was for the first great world conqueror. He's probably the luckiest actor alive, for he has never had to look for a job. When he left Erasmus Hall High School, with the imprint of the boot showing on the seat of his youthful breeches, he literally walked onto the stage. He's been walking on (and off) for twelve years—that makes him twenty-eight years old—and he's never had to worry about sitting around agents' offices. If one stellar light didn't give him a part in his new play, another one did. Blanche Yurka gave him his first chance in "Enter Madame." He's played with Philip Merivale, Francine Larrimore, Frank Craven, et cetera, in sundry plays, including "After Tomorrow," "That's Gratitude," "The Stork Is Dead," "Let Us Be Gay," and many others. In Boston he appeared in stock. He did the same thing in Louisville, Kentucky.

It is not commonly known that Hollywood is old news to Alexander. On two occasions he has come hopefully West, with a song on his lips and joy in his heart, to sit out studio contracts. The first one was for Paramount. The second for Fox. Or maybe it was the other way around. Sad though it may be, Alexander never had a chance, under either contract, to appear before a camera. His personal observation is that they were afraid to tell him that he looked like "the west end of a horse going east."

He then would have had ample time to play with his electrical trains because he didn't have to report to the studio. But when he was in Hollywood before, he had not yet become enamored of electric trains with yards of metal tracks, switches and sidings. Four years ago, Christmas, he conceived the train idea. "What do you want for Christmas?" his friends asked Alexander. When he answered, with direct simplicity, "An electric train," they laughed, like they do in the advertisements when a fellow sits down to the piano. Just a bit of Alexander foolery, they thought.

But Christmas morning they came crowding in, their little cheeks red as apples from the cold, cheering and chattering and calling out "Merry Yuletide!" and what do you suppose they saw? The floor of Ross Alexander's living-room strewn with tracks and an elegant electric engine careening around the curves. The bravest stepped hurriedly to the window, Ross says, and peered out to see if the "wagon"—the barred and padlocked one that is presumed to lug lunatics off to safe-keeping—was at the door. It wasn't, and his friends probably stayed to help Ross play with his toys. He still has them, the toys. He had to rent the studio across the road from his Hollywood home to accommodate them when they arrived by express from New York the other day.

JUVENILE as may be his favorite hobby, Alexander is far from being childlike. He is a self-reliant, fundamentally solid young fellow who happens to want to be an actor more than anything else. He is the only child of a New York leather merchant, and while he laments with his father that the day of synthetic fabrics has ruined the hide and pelt industry, he feels no longing to take a hand in his father's business to try and right it. Alexander's favorite occupation is that of "tearing a passion to tatters," even if he doesn't care much about the other works by the guy who wrote that phrase.

After a sojourn as Shakespeare's "Demetrius," flouncing around in a tunic ("At least I have pants on in my next picture," he says), mouthing the immortal lines of "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Ross is ready to tackle any part. It has been a proven conclusion, as far as he is concerned, that Alexander and Shakespeare don't mix. "I'd go home screwy after a day with those lines," he said, irreverently, for piety is not an Alexander attribute. He has the post post-war generation's healthy cynicism, yet when accused of being a cynic he is genuinely affected. He considers himself a realist. And undoubtedly he is that, too, for he believes not at all in Santa Claus nor the Easter Bunny, but has intense admiration for the "ghost" that walks weekly on Wednesdays in the Warner Brothers' cashier's office.

He has absolute faith in one person, himself, and upon himself he relies with complete confidence. The ease with which he has taken to a theatrical career shows that. He declares he has a sense of humor (which is obvious), that all his friends think so; then says, in the next breath, that he has but few friends, proceeding to enumerate about five or six.

With fragrant, penetrating words, he enlivens any conversation; refers to actors—including himself—as "slobs"; drinks tea instead of coffee; eats sparingly because food doesn't interest him; and gave the names of two of the country's leading columnists as his "pet aversions" in filling out the studio's questionnaire. You can imagine what the studio did to that care-free confidence.

Incidentally, he established a new low in dull screen personalities when he filled out the conventional studio blank upon which the publicity department's press biographies are based. It appears he thought the whole thing pretty silly, and filled it in accordingly. Parts of it read like this: "He has no 'suppressed desires,' no economies that he practices, no favorite extravagances, no hobbies and only one or two aversions. . . . Neither politics nor religion have an interest for him, he isn't superstitious . . ." et cetera.

"I guess that biography is the nadir in dullness," he said with a grin. Then, lest we think his speech too elegant for a two-fisted guy, he added: "I learned that word from a play that I was in on Broadway."

Nadir or no, the fellow is attractive. You'll see more of him in films . . . which is all right with us girls.

Bob Taylor—Big Rave

THERE, ladies and gentlemen, is a pretty clear picture of Robert Taylor, how he feels about being called "promising," and why his sudden success hasn't changed him.

I first met Bob almost two years ago, and I swear to you that he is no different today than he was then. He's still without an "act," still modest and straightforward, looking things and people right in the eye. He lives in a little better house, has more clothes, drives a more expensive automobile. But these are superficial changes only, which have not affected Bob's attitude toward the world or toward himself.

It was almost two years ago that Bob started going around with Irene Hervey. They still go around together, despite rumors of other romances now and then. And Bob's behavior in this respect is almost without precedent. Whether you realize it or not, it has been an old Hollywood custom for a star to step up his romances along with his salary. And according to all traditions, Bob should, by now, be going around with only the biggest stars! And always to the Trocadero! But more often he is seen at the movies, or at a chop suey joint, or window shopping at night along Hollywood Boulevard, and usually with Irene Hervey. And that, in spite of the fact that all the glamor girls in town are casting eyes on him, too!

"It do beat all," as they say. "You'd think a handsome fellow like that would step out with all the stars—Lombard, Dietrich, Kay Francis, Miriam Hopkins, and so on down the list." But "they" only say that, because they don't know their Bob Taylor.

In spite of his good looks and his charming manners, Bob is no ladies' man, as a look into his past will show. He dates Irene because he knows her better and likes her better than any girl he knows—and a friendship like that is more important to him than being a social male butterfly. They are not engaged. Both of them are free as the winds.

"I've always been like that—even when I was at college," he told me. "I never had a lot of girls. I was too bashful for that. It was all I could do to get to know one well. I couldn't just walk up to a girl I didn't know, and walk off with a date—like a lot of the fellows could. I've always been slow at that kind of thing, kind of backward.

"Why, I remember the worst evening I ever spent in my life was once when I had to get a date with a girl I didn't know. It was just after I arrived at Pomona—at one of those get-together dances. The rule was that you went to the dance alone but you had to leave with a girl! And there were about 60 seniors standing around to see that you did—or else! Or else they'd paddle the pants off you the next day.

"Well, I arrived at the dance, and my heart fell to my boots. I took one look at the way they danced at Pomona, and I knew I was sunk. Back in Nebraska, where I came from, the dancing was dignified. But here they hopped, skipped and jumped all over the place. Not my style at all—none of these girls would be able to follow me. So, since I didn't even dare ask a girl to dance with me, how could I ask one to let me take her home?

"I gave up. About an hour later, I was still standing around on the sidelines, wondering what kind of paddles they'd use, when one of my classmates asked me what the trouble was. I told him. Then he said that if I could find a girl from San Francisco, she'd probably be used to dancing the way I danced because they danced funny up there, too! That was a good tip, but how was I supposed to recognize a girl from San Francisco when I saw one? 'Ask 'em!' said my friend. So I did. I asked about fifteen girls altogether, and as each one said, 'No, I'm from Pomona, why?' I'd move on as if she had the plague.

"But finally I found one. I grabbed her and off we went. Sure enough she danced just like I did. That was swell but even then I still couldn't get around to asking her to let me take her home. As a matter of fact, I never did ask her. But I danced with her all the rest of the evening, whether she liked it or not, and then, when they began playing "Home, Sweet Home," I just danced her right out the door. Oh yes, we got to be good friends after that, and I saw a lot of her all through college."

Much, I might add, to the disgust of the other co-eds. I know that's the case, because I happen to know one who was there at the time Bob was. Like the others, she too set her cap for him, but got nowhere.

His history is repeating itself in Hollywood.

Once, recently, Irene said, "I should think you'd like to go out with someone else for a change. Why don't you?"

"You wouldn't mind?"

"Not a bit," she replied.

"Well, it might be a good idea."

"Sure, go ahead."

A week passed, and they didn't see each other, or talk on the phone. Then Bob called her. "What are you doing?"

"Nothing. Why don't you come over?"

"Okay, I'd like to," he answered.

"Did you have a big time?" Irene asked him later.

"No, I didn't."

"Funny," said Irene. "Neither did I."

And, strange as it seems, they were both telling the truth!

She was somewhat plump, wore very little make-up, her skin was country-clear and she had a wide smile. Her rose street dress was fashionably scalloped off at the knees, and could have come from the budget department of any Thirty-fourth Street shop or been made by loving hands at home. It was one of those dresses. Her pumps were blonde kid and stubby-toed and her rolled stockings matched them. And contrary to all my preconceived ideas about night club ladies, her grammar was flawless and devoid of slang.

She said her name was Grace Moore, and that she hadn't been in New York very long. I guess we talked together twenty minutes and when we parted I was to tell Betty hello for her and come to "The Black Cat" sometime.

HOW little I guessed that I had met a great star in embryo! That some day I would piece together a greatly publicized life story and discover that Grace Moore was singing in Greenwich Village's Black Cat for a third-rate salary, singing snappy four-four rhythms when she yearned to trill arias, spending her daytime hours endlessly trudging from one theatrical agency to another. Back in Jellico, Tennessee, they'd liked her voice in the Baptist Church choir. She was just ambitious, brave and headstrong enough to run away to New York to seek the musical training she wanted.

There was something else that was going to make me remember the night club singer in the park, too. Three years later I went to college with Grace's younger sister, Virginia Huff Moore.

By that time people were beginning to read about Grace Moore. She'd understudied Julia Sanderson in "Hitchy-Koo" and advanced to the lead in Irving Berlin's "Music Box Revue." And then she'd gone abroad to study for opera.

Huff was a lot like Grace in the family resemblance way, only she was taller and darker and her talents were more literary than musical. We lived in the same "dorm" and ran around with the same crowd and, of course, all of us followed Grace's career through her kid sister's intimate and oh-so-thrilling details.

Grace was living in the be-satinned villa of Mary Garden at Cannes. Grace was studying under some of the most expensive teachers in Europe. Grace was in love. Grace wasn't in love anymore. Grace had three fur coats, a summer in Switzerland, her hair bobbed. Grace said Huff could be her travelling companion after she finished college. Grace was going to make her debut at the Metropolitan in 1928. Grace had her own be-satinned villa at Cannes.

Huff got a stack of new clothes, a week's vacation from school, and went to New York for the big doings at the Met. Half of Jellico and most of Tennessee's Big Names chartered a Memphis Special to make the trip, and we all went to the station (feeling like we'd been colossally gypped on sisters) to see the vast line of cars grind to a stop to pick up a member of the Moore family.

The tales she brought back furnished delectable fodder for many a choice session, and determined half the student body, temporarily anyway, on operatic careers. Huff had a suitcase full of clippings, photographs and souvenirs. We made her tell us everything until the story grew to gargantuan proportions. Mountains of orchids. Tons of applause. Zillions of famous people. Barrels of caviar. Roomsful of the most gorgeous clothes for Grace's wardrobe.

And men! Such men! Grace had scores of them at her feet. Millionaires, great artists and statesmen and writers, members of the nobility, actors, singers.

IN 1929, Grace Moore was the most glamorous figure in the world of song. You couldn't pick up a magazine without reading of her flashing career, her gowns and jewels and gay parties, her friendships with some of the outstanding names in society, her comings and goings at her Park Avenue apartment. Pictures of her blonde beauty smiled at you from everywhere.

It was during that year that she came to visit at our school. Perhaps you know the story, how right in the middle of a triumphant concert tour through Spain, she suddenly became homesick for Tennessee, and in absolute defiance of managerial pleas and threats, cancelled her engagements and sailed for the United States. We were having exams at school, which prevented Huff's going home, so Grace stopped over in Virginia for a day and a night and stayed on campus in our dormitory.

She came alone, without any of the retinue of personal chef, maid, butler, chauffeur and secretary she maintained in New York. We liked that, but it was a disappointment to our schoolgirl curiosities that she'd travelled in a plain old Pullman instead of her private car. We wanted to see if the inside of that private car was as sumptuous as Huff had described it to us.

She hadn't changed in seven years except that she was beautifully thinner and her hair was a lustrous yellow-blonde. She remembered me and the gumdrops in Washington Square. Our natural standoffishness, on suddenly being piled into the same taxi with a world famous diva, lasted about five minutes, for Grace is the sort of person who makes you feel like it's Old Home Week the moment she grasps your hand in introduction.

Did she promenade around campus swishing silver fox and gardenias under the adoring noses of twelve hundred girls? Heck, no! An hour after her bag was unpacked she was down on the athletic field in a borrowed gym suit wielding a hockey stick with us like an old-timer. She got banged into and knocked, and broke off a cherished long fingernail and cussed about it like any girl would. She came off the field muddy and dishevelled and insisted on waiting her turn in the shower room and taped the hockey stick she'd splintered.

And because the last supper gong rang before she was fully dressed, she dashed down into the dining-room with a shiny nose and no stockings and a bump swelling on her forehead and did a brief, beautiful job when she was called upon to say grace and then dived into our regular Thursday night pink ham and potato salad as though it were blinchiki or crepes suzette.

That night, a gang of us huddled in Huff's room to get Grace into the bull-session we'd anticipated for weeks. She was swell. She let us try on all the clothes in her suitcases. She propped her feet up on the table and rubbed cold cream into her face and told us fantastic stories about the things she'd done and the people she knew. And finally, inevitably, the conversation got around to men and dates and we wanted to know how she'd made herself so popular.

"You all ask me that," she laughed, "when every one of you have a Southern 'line' that would probably make mine sound amateur! Use it, darlings. Sweet, flattering nonsense is nectar to men's ears. And," she added, "do they love it!"

One of the girls wanted to know how she'd resisted the proposals of so many fascinating men.

Grace was frank in her answer. "I just haven't found the love I'm looking for yet and I'll never marry until I do. He hasn't come along, somehow."

If we wondered what she was doing while we attended chapel the next morning, she was rummaging under our beds getting shoe sizes. She sent several of us darling white fur mules when she returned to New York, and some of her newest victrola records. Frequently, after that, she'd send packages of used costumes and clothes she was through with. There was a leopard jacket, almost new, and Parisian labels in twice-worn evening gowns, and a gold cloth Japanese outfit she'd had designed for a masquerade ball. Many a pinned and basted Grace Moore dress went to nearby proms and house parties, or moved about on the stage of our campus plays.

I've seen Grace many times during the five years since then. There was her gala entry into Hollywood in 1930, her two flop pictures, "A Lady's Morals" and "New Moon," and consequently her galling and bitter defeat in exit from pictures.

"I'm going back to Hollywood and show them what I can do, one of these days," she said to me not long after. "At first I was angry and hurt, but now I'm only determined. I've the same determined feeling I had when the Metropolitan turned me down the first time."

Grace kept that promise to herself with the terrific success of "One Night of Love." But in the meantime there came to her the greatest success, she calls it, that she can ever know. She found the love she was looking for. She married Valentin Parera after a whirlwind courtship aboard the Ile de France.

They're the happiest pair you ever saw, Grace and Val. You think of two adjectives when you first meet him, and you don't change them even after years. They're

Every woman should make this "Armhole Odor" Test

If you deodorize only—because it is easy and quick—you will always have an unpleasant, stale "armhole odor"—test yourself tonight by smelling your dress at the armhole

The more fastidious you are, the more surprised and shocked you may be when you realize that you cannot prevent "armhole odor" unless your underarm is kept dry as well as sweet.

Tonight, as soon as you take off your dress, smell the fabric under the arm. No matter how careful you are about deodorizing your underarm, you may find that your dress carries the embarrassing odor of stale perspiration.

This is bound to happen if you merely deodorize. Creams and sticks are not made to stop perspiration. They do not keep the underarm dry, so perspiration collects and dries on the fabric of your dress.

And the very next time you wear that dress, the warmth of your body brings out an unpleasant, stale odor.

Only one way to be SURE

Women who care deeply about good grooming know that there is no short cut to true underarm daintiness. They insist on the complete protection of Liquid Odorono.

With Odorono, not even the slightest drop of moisture can collect on your dress to spoil the pleasant impression that you would otherwise make.

Odorono's action is entirely safe . . . ask your doctor. It works by gently closing the pores in that little hollow of the underarm. Perspiration is merely diverted to less confined parts of the body where it may evaporate freely and inoffensively.

No more ruined frocks

It takes a little longer to use Odorono, but it is well worth your while. In the end you save, not only embarrassment but your lovely clothes as well! You do away forever with those horrible underarm stains that even the cleaner cannot remove, that can ruin expensive frocks and coat linings in just one day's wearing. And there is no grease to stick to your clothes and make them messy.

Odorono comes in two strengths. Regular Odorono (Ruby colored) need be used only twice a week. Instant Odorono (Colorless) is for especially sensitive skin or emergency use—to be used daily or every other day. On sale at all toilet-goods counters.

If you want to feel the utter security and poise that Odorono brings, send for the two sample vials and leaflet on complete underarm dryness offered below.

THE TIME OF MONTH CAN'T DICTATE TO MODERN GIRLS:

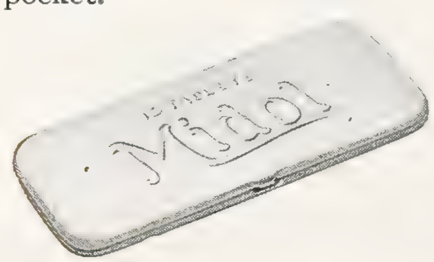
The modern girl doesn't decline an invitation just because of the time of month! She knows how to keep going, and keep comfortable — with Midol. For relief from painful periods, this is all you have to do:

Watch the calendar. At the very first sign of approaching pain, take a Midol tablet and drink a glass of water, and you may escape the expected pain altogether. If not, a second tablet should check it within a few minutes.

Midol's relief is lasting; two tablets should see you through your worst day. Yet Midol contains no narcotic and it forms no habit. But don't be misled by ordinary pain tablets sold as a specific for menstrual pain! Midol is a special medicine, offered for this particular purpose.

You will find Midol in any drug store, it is usually right out on the counter.

So, look for those trim, aluminum boxes that make these useful tablets easy to carry in the thinnest purse or pocket.



suave and sweet. He has the small feet and sensitive long fingers of the Latins and he's very Continental and witty. Grace is so unaffectedly crazy about her husband, it's refreshing, and neither Hollywood nor the Opera nor any added glory, something tells me, will ever change that.

And "Is she very much like a movie star?" people ask. Yes, but mostly no. Off-screen beauty being the debatable subject it is, I'd simply call her darn good-looking and feel like I'd said the honest thing. Her eyes and skin are particularly nice. Her lashes curly, but far from long. Like the rest of us she has certain beauty problems that must be constantly attended to or they lapse into unattractiveness—her hips, off diet, refuse to stay slender—and Grace is too lusty a fried-chicken-and-hot-rolls devotee to remain on diet all the time. Frequently her hair needs a coiffeuse for several days before she has time for one. She eats her lipstick off at meals and usually forgets to renew it for hours. But I've never seen her without an impeccable manicure. She always does her nails herself.

She still gesticulates, broadly and incessantly, no matter what she's telling about. It's the hardest habit she's had to overcome before the camera, keeping those energetic arms of hers at a sophisticated standstill. But you like it when she's talking to you. It's part of her.

She doesn't spend the money you'd expect her to on clothes. Consistently, that is. She'll greet you at tea time in a sweeping something M. Patou threw together, then turn right around, as I have seen her do, and attend an opening night in a thirty-nine-fifty model. She never looks all-dressed-up in her clothes. She looks comfortable.

I couldn't help contrasting a recent meeting with Grace with the one in the park that day. She was triumphantly returning to the United States after her command performance of "La Boheme" for Queen Mary at Covent Garden, and as the Rex steamed up the Hudson and docked she was given a welcome that recalled the Lindbergh reception.

Airplanes dragged "Welcome Home" streamers through the air as the ship moved into the harbor. Sky-writing planes wrote her name in the clouds. Crowds shouted greetings from boats and at the pier, while at City Hall Mayor LaGuardia was readying some lovely phrases for an official reception. The ship's band played "Dixie" twenty times and Grace's regal suite was jammed with celebrities, newspapermen, orchids and Valentin Parera.

"It's been so wonderful," she said to me, telling how the Britishers cried for "Gracie" in the streets the night she gave her command performance. "I never had anyone call me Gracie since the days of my old black mammy down in Jellico." Then she told me how she hid a 76-year-old Welsh woman, who had seen "One Night of Love" seventy-six times, near the royal box during the show. "That," she said characteristically, "was more fun than stealin' watermelons!" Which wasn't exactly the ultimate in sophisticated phraseology, but then, thank heaven, Grace hasn't outgrown her back-home way of talking.

She posed for as many kodaks as cameras, once with her arm on the shoulder of the 'P' section customs official—who was fifty, red-headed and snaggle-toothed, and grinning like an ape with delight. She shook hands with every proffered paw and got warm doing it and still didn't stop, despite the fact that in a few minutes she was scheduled to ride down Broadway, looking her best, to pick up an enormous key to the city. And she didn't import the ten trunkfuls of Parisian frou-frou that are sort of expected when movie stars disembark in a great big way. There was declared on her papers the glamorous total of one percolator, eight gramophone records, six dozen Irish linen handkerchiefs.

And a case of champagne.

No, Grace Moore hasn't changed a bit. Because the customs official broke open the crate of bottles for investigation and looked startled and remarked, "Miss Moore, this ain't champagne you got here—it's mineral water!" and held up a label for her to stare at in complete amazement.

She could have done the casual, movie-starrish thing at a time like that. She could have raised an eyebrow, uttered a bright saccharine "How too, too amusing!" and donated the vile old stuff to some nearby, suitably crotchety fan.

But Grace was too much her straightforward, natural self for that. She'd paid perfectly good money for what she understood was champagne, and furthermore she'd lugged it all the way from France for a very, very special occasion. And she was as disappointed and put out about it as you'd be, too, if you had been so apparently gypped.

So she stood right there in full view of the public and the press and stuck her thumb-nail between her teeth and commented, none too softly, "Things like that make me so mad!" and stamped her foot and turned to Val in utter exasperation, "Oh, it wasn't what we paid for it, darling, it's—the principle of the thing that gets me—"

And I recalled a ten-cent bag of stale gumdrops.

amicable separation. He won't talk at all if you ask him about his efforts to obtain a divorce.

"I can't figure women out," he said cryptically. And it is a bit confusing when you consider that for several years he has been separated from his wife, during which time he has supported her and their son in a manner consistent with the money he has earned. He is denied the privileges of both bachelorhood and marriage.

"I want a home," he told me. "I want things other men have. I've worked hard all my life. Now I want happiness and contentment. I think I'm entitled to it."

For two years he and Virginia have been the center of one of Hollywood's sweetest romances, but they are denied the satisfaction of marriage, the joys of making a home together. George refuses to fight the woman who bears his name, the mother of his child, preferring to wait in the hope that some day soon she may volunteer to give him his freedom.

"I never quarrel with girls," he will tell you. And his friends will tell you that he never quarrels with anyone.

How does it happen, you may well wonder, that this boy of the tenements, a boy whose career has embraced many and varied activities, including selling newspapers, working as assistant to an electrician, ushering in a theatre, professional boxing, dancing in vaudeville and night clubs, a boy who ran away from home at the age of fourteen because he didn't want to go to school—that a boy with this background has a respect for women that amounts almost to a religion?

There is nothing strange about it to George. The strange thing, he feels, is that all men don't have the same regard for women that he has. Because his parents were poor doesn't mean that they were not respectable, hard-working, honest people. Because he was born in a poor district of New York doesn't necessarily mean that he came from the slums, for he didn't.

"My mother taught me to respect women," he said simply. "When I was a little kid, the girl next door would ask to take me out because she thought I was cute. My mother would dress me up and I can remember that her parting admonition always was to be a good boy, not to forget to tip my hat and to be polite.

"My mother is the sweetest woman that ever lived," he continued. "I don't know how she managed all of us—there were eleven of us kids, you know—without losing her temper sometimes, but she did. She was always sweet. We're all alone now. All the others are gone, God rest their souls."

About a year ago George brought his mother out to California to live. He secured an apartment for her and provided her with a car and chauffeur. But she didn't like it here any more than George does. He thought the climate would be fine for her, but she missed her friends and preferred the lights of the city to the California sunshine, just as George does, and she asked to go back home.

"She's always lived there, you know," George said. "She likes to live where she can knock on her neighbor's door and offer to share a pot of tea or borrow an egg. And where she can talk about me, her darling Georgie," he added with a grin. "She drives me nuts talking about me and fussing over me. I can't stand being fussed over. I worship my mother, but if I tell her I love her, I mean it and I can't keep on telling her over again every five minutes."

Wisely, George figures that the career of an actor is short, that the big money is to be gathered in quickly. Consequently he is trying to be a contented citizen and is experiencing the joys of a home of his own for the first time in his life. And, although no home in Hollywood could compensate for the noise and hum, the rush and clamor of Broadway, he is more than a little proud of his penthouse apartment. He chose its furnishings personally and in every detail it reflects his quiet, good taste and love of comfort. He misses New York with an intensity that has not lessened during the five years he has been in Hollywood. "I'm losing a lot of friends by staying out here," he complained. But he finds a quiet game of bridge a passable substitute for New York's night life and philosophically makes the most of it. You rarely see George at a night club.

"I got my fill of night clubs when I worked in them," he explained. And asked if it wasn't embarrassing to always be the one of the boys who orders milk or orange juice when the others are having cocktails, he replied: "It isn't as embarrassing as getting drunk would be. I never drink because I've seen what liquor does to the other guys. Anyway I don't think it is any fun to drink. Your best friend pours you into a taxi and sends you home while he takes care of your girl. That's not my idea of a big night."

He doesn't drink coffee, either, because he doesn't think it is good for him. Nothing, to his way of thinking, is as important as health. "If I have a strong, healthy body, no one can take it away from me. Money doesn't worry me. If I have health and can't earn a living, then I don't deserve to live. I've earned my way since I was fourteen. I've always been able to buy everything I actually needed. I can get along any place if I have my health."

No one was more surprised than George when he made a hit in his first picture. "I'm not an actor," he said at the time, and how he laughed when the critics said he did a powerful bit of acting in a scene when he stood on a corner and played with a couple of coins—a habit of years. The success he had attained in other ventures—boxing and dancing—had required years of hard work and application. Without any effort he was a sensation in pictures. It is no wonder he was puzzled. And when Hollywood, characteristically, built up a reputation for him to correspond with his first screen role, that of a gangster, he was even more bewildered.

"Do I have to be a gangster off the screen just because I played one in the picture?" he protested. But his protests weren't even heard. The fact that he had been born in what is charmingly referred to as "Hell's Kitchen," in New York, was played up to the last drop of publicity value. Perhaps inspired by jealousy, perhaps by habit, Hollywood put on one of the most vicious whispering campaigns ever to go over the grapevine about George's past activities. The stories that were whispered about the studios, at parties and wherever the film crowd gathered were

GRAND! POND'S VANISHING CREAM FIXES THAT
BEDTIME
OVERNIGHT, TOO—FOR EXTRA SOFTNESS

"POWDER CATCHERS"

Miss Geraldine Spreckels
of California: "My skin is constantly exposed to wind and sun. But Pond's Vanishing Cream smooths it in a second!"

See skin smooth—in one application

SKIN smooth—or all flaky? Each flake catching your powder! Each roughness standing out . . . clinging no matter what you do!

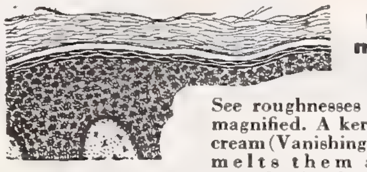
Yet it's simple to melt off those "powder catchers." They're just dead cells. The top of your skin that's old, dried-out . . . Melt them away with a keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream)!

A prominent dermatologist says: "When a keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream) is applied, old dried-out cells on surface skin melt away. This brings into view the new supple cells beneath. The skin is immediately smoother—texture finer, coloring improved."

It's plain to see, Pond's Vanishing Cream is more than a powder base. It actually brings skin beauty! Even the first time you use it, flaky places smooth out. Skin is softened all over!

For a smooth make-up—Use Pond's Vanishing Cream. Powder-catching roughnesses melt into nothing. Your face shows only the smoothest, softest skin. Make-up goes on evenly!

Overnight for lasting softness—After your regular cleansing, apply Pond's Vanishing Cream. It leaves your skin soft, not a bit greasy. Won't smear the pillowcase. Yet it softens your skin all night long!



What melting does

fantastic. It would have been a physical impossibility for one person ever to have had half the experiences that were attributed to George.

Whatever these whispers did to him will never be known, even to his most intimate friends, for George is painfully inarticulate. This reserve is not born of a lack of ability to express himself, for with his friends and people he trusts, he is at ease and talks freely.

"I don't talk much," he said. "What's the use? You learn more listening."

George's friends were loud in his defense, but George never uttered a protest. He didn't need to, for regardless of what Hollywood thought of him, the public clamored for more of his pictures. He was enormously popular. He worked in picture after picture. He took what was offered in the way of roles and also in the publicity necessarily attached to his success. He posed for hats and shirts, shoes and socks, suspenders and soap. He endorsed everything from cigarettes to cereal.

"I always coöperated," he said, "but I never got as much as a handkerchief for all the posing I did. I did anything I was asked to do. I played any part they gave me. I realized I wasn't an actor, I thought other people knew more about this business than I did, so I did what I was told."

THAT is, up to a certain point. When he was assigned the role of Trigger in "The Story of Temple Drake," he refused to play it. He refused to the point of walking out of the studio and heading for points east. He jeopardized his entire career for what he considered a principle. If you remember the picture you will recall that Trigger didn't know how a gentleman should treat a lady.

"When people walk out of the theatre thinking I'm a heel because I've played so many of them, I'm through," he argued.

So someone else played Trigger and George, having tasted the exhilarating sensation of independence, began to exercise his new-found authority. It became a habit with him to refuse to do things he thought would hurt his career. If a dance routine didn't look right to him, he refused to do it. Surely his reputation as a professional dancer entitled him to this privilege.

But he really went to town on his "no" campaign, when he walked out in high dudgeon after a brief but effective physical encounter with a studio executive, during the making of "Bolero," because he was asked to speak a line of dialogue which he found particularly distasteful and which he thought would be offensive to the public. The line was: "And let's use those pictures I had taken at my mother's grave for publicity."

"I've always been taught to respect graves," was his only explanation for refusing to speak the line. He didn't think it necessary to tell the world that within a few years he had buried every one of his ten brothers and sisters, that only a few months prior to the time of this incident he had lost his father, whom he worshipped.

"I was my father's favorite," he told me. "He idolized me and always took my part. We were much closer than most fathers and sons."

To speak such a line, even acting, made him absolutely sick. After the argument was settled in George's favor, he established an all-time high for an apology with reservations. "If I'm wrong, I'm sorry," he said.

When George says "no" he means just that and neither threats nor promises can make him change his mind. Recently he was suspended from the studio for ten weeks because he refused to do something he didn't think would be a good idea, but suspensions and the loss of a salary that is not to be sniffed at, don't worry George.

"No one is going to look after me but me," he explained. "No one cares what happens to me but me and I do care. I'm nervous. This business is a million headaches a day. I was never nervous when I was a dancer, but now I've got the shakes half the time. This business does it to everyone."

He refuses to work more than twelve or fourteen hours a day.

"No," George said. "I'm up at five in the morning in order to get made up and on the set at eight. It's eight o'clock when I get home at night and I'm tired."

He was suspended again when he refused to work in a Mae West picture. "Mae and I are very good friends," George said, "but I explained to her that it wouldn't do me any good to be kicked around in her picture. If you let yourself be kicked around in a picture, people get the impression you can be kicked around off the screen, too.

"Other stars fight for stories and parts and even cameramen. I've always taken just what was given me, but I've learned that if I don't fight for myself no one else is going to."

And, as anyone who has had the bad fortune to come up against one of his handy fists will testify, George doesn't need anyone to do his fighting for him. He doesn't need a bodyguard, as Hollywood facetiously calls his friend, the mild, naïve Mack Grey.

He is neat to a fanatical point. He can't stand a spot of dirt on himself or anyone else. He can't stand a disorderly apartment, his idea of such a state being a place where the ash trays aren't clean. If there is no servant around to empty them, George'll do it rather than look at a tray full of cigarette stubs.

He can't stand to see his friends want for anything and will take off his shirt, hat or tie and pass it on to anyone he thinks needs it. He takes great pride in his personal appearance and always dresses neatly and in the very latest style.

Consistent with his pride in appearance is his preference for pretty girls. He likes to take a girl out who adds to the picture. He likes to feel that everyone is admiring his girl. And his present choice of companion, Virginia Pine, is everything any chap could ask for, both in appearance and character. Cultured, sweet and charming, she also has exquisite taste in clothes and is strictly feminine. A sun-tanned beauty or a girl who wears mannish clothes doesn't fit on George's private pedestal for women.

He was leaving for the race track when I caught him in his dressing-room at the studio, a few days ago. In a stunning, well-tailored sack suit he was a picture of what the well-dressed young man should wear to the races.

"Wait!" I screamed, with a wicked gleam in my eye. "You've forgotten your shoes!"

Glancing nonchalantly at his smart, tan bedroom slippers, he said, "Oh, no, I'll wear these. No one will notice them."

He picked up his overcoat and I understood. Of softest wool in brown and tan plaid, it was beautiful. But loud? Definitely! It could be heard from here to St. Moritz. It was a Jack Oakie dream. George was right. No one would notice his feet because they couldn't see past that coat!

George's recent roles will testify that he is able to depict other than gangsters on the screen and his friends will swear that neither screen roles nor clothes are an infallible guide to character.

but they would rather she did not go out quite so much with Mr. Ruggles. Not that he wasn't worthy of her. He was an upright man. But if she were seen too often with the same man it might prove harmful to her career.

Arline listened attentively. She neither agreed nor disagreed. Later, however, she discussed this momentous conversation with Mr. Ruggles. What did he think about it? Ruggles was open-minded. What did she think? Arline wasn't sure. Suppose they kept the date they had that night and then not see each other socially for a week or so. Ruggles consented. Perhaps it might be a good idea. They'd soon know how much they did or did not mean to each other by not being together so often.

It didn't take them long to know the answer, nor did it take Arline, in her short, decisive way, long to announce one day:

"I'm not going to let a studio run my life. If I can't live the way I want and have a career, too, then I'll know the reason why!"

Up to the head office she marched, chin up, war-clouds all around her. She let the executive, behind the flat-topped desk, have the war-clouds:

"I just want to tell you," she declared in so many words, "that I'm going out with Wes Ruggles when and as much as I want to. If that's harmful to my career, it's just too bad."

"That was in February, 1931. In October, 1931, Arline and Ruggles were married. She seems to have done all right in pictures since.

A decision not generally known is that which enables Edwin Arnold today to earn around one hundred thousand dollars a year instead of being just a good actor uncertain of a job. Several years ago, when Arnold was playing in a Broadway stage play called "Whistling in the Dark," he received three hundred and fifty dollars a week for his efforts. The show reached the end of its run and the management called Arnold in to inform him:

"Look here, Edwin, we're going to send a 'Whistling in the Dark' company to Hollywood. How would you like to go with it?"

NOW the Coast, with motion pictures the ultimate, had always been a pet dream of Edwin Arnold. So much so, that some years before he had accepted a vaudeville engagement with Viola Dana, erstwhile picture star, in the hope that it would lead him to a movie contract. All it led to, however, when he played in Hollywood, was a casual invitation from former friends to visit the studios. Mr. Arnold remembered this. It wasn't a particularly inspiring memory. But a job was a job, so:

"What's the salary for the Coast show?" he inquired.

"One hundred and eighty-five dollars a week," he was told.

Arnold glowered. He had been receiving three hundred and fifty dollars a week for the New York run of the play. To go to the Coast meant a cut of a hundred and seventy-five. He rejected the offer.

That night, however, he mentioned the incident to his wife.

"Take their offer," she advised.

"What! Take that much of a salary cut?"

The arrival of Fred Astaire, Jr., resulted in a real family get-together. Here are Fred's mother and his sister and brother-in-law, Lord and Lady Cavendish, who came all the way from England.

"Take it," she repeated. "I've a feeling it will bring you something in pictures."

"I played Hollywood once before and it didn't happen," he reminded her.

"But this is different," she insisted. "I've a good feeling about it."

Arnold considered. A "feeling" certainly was too problematic to stake any hopes on. Still, he followed his wife's advice, made it a decision, and signed for the Coast production of "Whistling in the Dark."

The Edwin Arnolds went to Hollywood. The play opened. Hollywood turned out for the premiere. Among those who turned out were three producers who, before the evening was over, offered Arnold very attractive picture contracts.

Mr. Arnold's residence is now California and, thanks to Mrs. Arnold's hunch and his yielding to it, he is now in the six-figures-a-year earning class.

It was rather a tragic occurrence that prompted Gloria Stuart to reach a decision so far as her career and life were concerned. Gloria, while attending the University of California in Berkeley, met and fell in love with Gordon Blair Newell, also a student at the University with hopeful dreams of becoming a successful sculptor. The road to success in that art field, however, is a slow and an arduous one. But Gloria and Newell were young and, though the exchequer was slim, they believed in their dreams—and their love. They were married.

Some twenty miles from San Francisco, on the highway to Los Angeles, there is a beautiful little seaside town called Carmel-by-the-Sea. Many well known artists, and others not so well known, live in this colorful spot on the Pacific. It was here that Gloria and her husband settled down—she, to keeping house; he, to sculpturing. But Gloria was not a personality to be submerged in domesticity. She had a keen desire to go into dramatic work. As there was an amateur company in Carmel, she decided to join with them.

She learned much through her activities with this group. But married life, instead of becoming easier, became increasingly difficult. Newell's artistic endeavors did not win the recognition necessary to make existence cozier. Gloria did her best to make the short end of their monetary earnings meet the longer end of expenses. She was in love, and love does survive in humbleness—for a little time, anyway.

Carmel is quite a rendezvous for some of the motion picture players, and Gloria either met them or came to know them by sight. She also knew about the Pasadena Playhouse, that up-to-the-minute amateur group from which many a talented actor has graduated to a lucrative picture career. She knew, too, that Gilmor Brown, director of the Pasadena Playhouse, was a man willing to give any likely applicant a chance.

BUT Gloria refused to think too seriously of people or a career that would mean separation from her husband. That is, she did until after a certain sad event had occurred to precipitate the need of a decision. That event was the coming of her baby. The baby did not live. Gloria, broken-hearted, half mad with grief, knew she could not go on as she had been going. The memory of the baby, in the midst of all else, was more than she could face in utter monotony of routine. She realized, possibly, that any decision taking her away from her husband might mean estrangement—perhaps eventual divorce, for it is a far cry from the fast, pounding tempo of the theatre and pictures to the quiet, introspective tempo of Carmel.

The future, Gloria finally decided, would have to take care of itself. It was the despair of the past and the present that she had to get freedom from.

She left Carmel and her husband and went to Pasadena, there to seek and get a job with the Playhouse. The rest—her picture offer and success; her divorcing her sculptor-husband after trying unsuccessfully to live on a separation basis; her marriage to Arthur Sheekman, scenario writer—all this is known. But it only happened because of the tragedy of her baby's death and her striking out by herself to find release from suffering through the activity of work. In such darkness was rooted the reason for Gloria Stuart's decision to embark upon an acting career.

Five years ago, Ricardo Cortez also made a decision. He decided to give up motion pictures. He figured, perhaps, that in a way it wasn't exactly a decision inasmuch as motion pictures had apparently given him up. Certainly Ricky, who had formerly had more roles offered him than he had time to fill, now found he had little more than time—and nothing in a picture way to embellish it with. It was one of those dull "breaks" that sometimes happen in the careers of players and for which there seems no good reason.

It became too much for Ricky. He decided he was through and was wondering if it wouldn't be a logical thing to go into some sort of business, when a friend called him up and said:

"Say, Rick, go over to the RKO lot and see if you can land the lead in 'Symphony of Six Millions.' They're having a hard time getting just the right man for the part."

Ricky knew about this Fannie Hurst story which was to star Irene Dunne. He hadn't given any thought to the studio's difficulties in finding a leading man, however. But he did now. His decision to give up pictures could wait a day or so. He went over to RKO and, like many others, made a test and like these others he was told:

"Sorry, you're not the type."

Unlike these others, however, Ricky accepted that dismissal as answering his own uncertainties. Now, he was through. He'd go into a business of some sort.

AS he walked across the lot on his way to the street, Bernard Shubert, a writer associated with the production of "Symphony of Six Millions," espied him and called:

"Hi, Rick."

Cortez turned, smiled faintly, and stopped. His stopping to talk to Shubert was the turning point in his career.

"How did your test turn out?" Shubert asked.

"It didn't," Cortez said, and added, wryly, "This washes me up. I'm through."

"Oh, no you aren't," Shubert disagreed. "I think you're the man we're looking for. What say we make another test and keep it quiet until it's ready to show?"

"What's the use?" Ricky shrugged.

"Plenty," Shubert declared. "We'll make this test my way. Are you game?"

Ricky consented. Shubert telephoned Irene Dunne, explained the story of Cortez's test to her and asked if she would appear with him in the secret test he was going to make. She said she'd be very happy to. So the test was made, developed, shown to the studio executives who declared to a man:

"Cortez is just the actor for this part that we've been looking for!"

That picture put Ricky on top again and he has stayed there ever since. Perhaps it isn't often that a discouraged player meets a man of Bernard Shubert's energetic ingenuity, but who can tell how often often is!

Wynne Gibson made a decision that nobody would sympathize with—if it had not worked out successfully. This was when Wynne was living in New York trying to get a stage job and just about as flat, financially, as the proverbial pancake. At the time of this story, Wynne had just one dollar and seventy-five cents in her purse and nothing in sight. It looked bad.

Then came a fateful telephone call from a friend inviting her to make a fourth at bridge that night. Wynne hesitated. She certainly couldn't—or rather wouldn't—let her friend know how broke she was. And if she accepted that bridge bid she stood to lose her whole dollar seventy-five capital, and more, as against the dubious possibility of winning a few cents. On the other hand, if she stayed at home and thought about things—well, that wasn't worth doing.

"I'll be there," Wynne accepted, and she was. She walked to her friend's house to save carfare. The bridge game got under way, but Wynne's luck didn't. Now anybody who will play bridge for money when all they have in the world is a dollar seventy-five, and no prospect of more, isn't a person to be sympathized with when she loses all but a few cents of that amount. Which Wynne did. She had fifteen cents between her and nothing when she got home.

As it happened, however, there was a man in that bridge game who had an interest in a musical comedy then being cast called "Little Jessie James." There was a leading part in it still to be cast.

The morning after the bridge game, Wynne's telephone jingled. The voice at the other end belonged to the man who had won part of her dollar seventy-five cents. He wanted to know:

"Will you come down to the Cort Theatre to try out for 'Little Jessie James'?"

"I'm on my way down now," Wynne announced.

She repeated that trip for more than a year, for she landed the part and the show was a hit which led her to stardom in pictures. But heaven help her if her decision to "shoot" the dollar seventy-five had ended disastrously! Those, however, are the gambles that make decisions so contrarily intriguing.

ROBERT YOUNG might have been a sedate and successful young banker today, instead of a popular leading man earning a superlatively respectable salary, had he not talked to a woman who helped him to make a decision by refusing to help him. Bob, at that time, was a bright, up-and-coming lad with a big loan and banking business in Los Angeles. The head of the business had an approving eye focussed on him and had visions of Bob becoming a high-powered executive. Bob, however, had only his head in his work, not his heart. His heart was in the amateur theatrical jobs he enacted on occasion at the Pasadena Playhouse. Banking was something he knew how to do, but acting was what he wanted to do.

Perhaps he would have continued as an employee in that loan and banking house if Gilmor Brown of the Playhouse had not innocently precipitated him into a crossroad decision by offering him the lead in a company that was going on a road tour. Bob saw that he couldn't go on the road and keep his banking job, too. It was a case of having your cake versus eating it. He couldn't decide what to do. As against a regular job and certain promotion, here was a limited job at much less money and no definite future once the road show closed.

What to do?

Now in the company he was with was the aforementioned frank, terse-spoken woman. She liked Bob, he liked her. She respected his judgment, he respected hers. He went to her to talk over his decision difficulty. She listened. When he was all through, she asked:

"What do you care what I think? You're going to do what you want to do anyway."

"That isn't the point," he answered. "The point is, what is the right thing to do?"

"What you want to do is right," she stated.

"But is it right to give up a good job with a future for something I like but that's insecure?"

"It's right," she said, "if you have the courage to think so."

Bob nodded. "That settles it. I'm chucking this job."

He took the right turn at the crossroads despite the apparent foolhardiness of his decision. And destiny awaited him, in a small town on the road, in the guise of a talent scout for one of the Hollywood studios. This scout saw Bob's performance, wired his studio that the boy was a sure bet, and paved the way to the movie contract that helped celebrate his arrival home from the tour. With Bob, it was a case of jumping from one lap of luxury to another—but he didn't know that until the jump was made.

What would have happened to these players had they made different decisions from what they did? Perhaps what has happened to others who knew what they wanted to do but, faced at the crossroads with the need of an answer, hesitated and then, either took the wrong road or lost out through indecision. The lucky actor knows when and how to make a decision. How does he know that? You ask him that!

'There's no use your denying it,' he said. 'I couldn't be mistaken in that hair!' That's the way it goes. Some redhead that looks a little like Ginger gets off the train in Nevada or turns up in a divorce court, or is seen dancing with somebody and another rumor is off. I tell you, the cards are stacked against young couples in Hollywood. Ginger is happy. She and Lew are working to make a success of their marriage. They will make a success of it if people will only let them."

Opportunity knocks once, the postman knocks twice, but the public keeps knocking all the time. Listen to them now! Ginger Rogers took a vacation trip to New York without Lew, didn't she? She brought her mother with her instead of her husband, I suppose you noticed! Lew wasn't working on a picture, was he? And yet they've never had a regular honeymoon, have they? Well, it certainly looks funny, my dear, doesn't it? I've said all along, haven't I—and so on and so forth.

"The reason Lew didn't come," Ginger sighed, looking wistfully at the big pile of fat letters on the desk, "is that he's still under contract to an independent company, His last picture for them is finished, but —well, you know Hollywood! Let them decide that a scene needs to be retaken, and if you're not at the other end of the telephone, you've broken the contract. We talked about it, but at the last minute we decided Lew had better not risk it. Mother didn't even know she was coming with me instead of Lew till the day before we started!"

"Lew and Ginger have never been free at the same time since they were married," Mrs. Rogers added. "Just week-end vacations. They took one of those recently when Ginger finished 'Follow the Fleet.' Called me up and told me they were on their way, with the pup and a tent and their old clothes. But that Honolulu honeymoon they planned seems out of the question. I told you the cards were stacked against young couples in the movies. They fall in love with each other because they're different from other boys and girls—glamorous, exciting, famous. In other words, because they're movie stars. And then they come up against the fact that they aren't like other people's husbands and wives, can't be home in time for dinner, have to spend their evenings working, aren't able to do things together.

"I can see it happening to a young couple we know right now. The girl played a part in Ginger's latest picture. She and her husband have been an inseparable radio team. Now that she has had this chance in Hollywood, he's in the depths of gloom. As a fellow artist, he knows it's best for her future to leave him in the East and go three thousand miles away to make a name for herself on the screen. As an adoring young husband, he just can't be reconciled to it. I tried to reason with him when he wept on my shoulder, but I understand their situation only too well. Some morning he'll open his paper to see a news photograph of some movie hero dancing with his lovely wife, or read some squib in a gossip column and another real romance will be in danger."

"And yet she won't be to blame for the picture," Ginger said. "There was the photographer at the party the other day who kept following Howard Hughes and me around the dance floor with his camera pointed at us. Howard is always news, but right now after that record flight of his, he's more so, and every girl who's mentioned as being seen with him is a matter for the columnists. I said to the photographer, 'Please don't take us!' I couldn't explain why. Movie stars aren't supposed to object to publicity. So I said, 'I always look awful in these catch-as-catch-can pictures.' But he wouldn't be discouraged. Finally when we danced out into the open, there he was before us, down on his knees pointing the camera up. Howard was swell. He said, 'Here, give me that plate.' The fellow only grinned and ran out of the room. He'd have got away, but by mistake he opened the wrong door and ran into a telephone room. So Howard's bodyguard caught him. Then he pretended he didn't know which plate it was. 'All right,' said Howard, 'smash 'em all, then! He began to whine that they were all his day's work and he'd be fired and Howard said, 'Okay. I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll send my man with you to your office lab. You develop all the plates and he'll bring back the one of Ginger with me.' And he did. That was one rumor that didn't start!"

Lew Ayres is sensitive, and interviewers know better than to ask him whether his marriage is successful. The chances are that he would knock a man down and turn on his heel and walk away if the questioner were of the unfair sex. And yet an actor who turned down an offer to play opposite his wife, as Lew did recently, and who has even refused to sign a contract on the same lot cares, rather terribly, what people say of him.

While in New York, Ginger's room was crammed with flowers from Lew. Every day the telephone rang and Lew's voice was on the other end, three thousand miles away. On the table were piled the presents that Ginger was bringing back to him.

Frail proofs against the testimony of those great democratic institutions—freedom of speech and press. And yet . . .

I remember talking with Lew and Ginger before they were married. They had such wonderful plans. They would both work hard for a few years and live quietly and save their money until they could build their Dream Home with a special room for Lew's books and telescopes and—maybe a nursery in a quiet wing. They had something, those two. They have it still. They stand a good chance of keeping it if you will let them alone.

Maureen Exposes Miss O'Sullivan

they weren't hesitant about saying so!

"The show-down, the pay-off was when I played 'The Princess and the Plumber' with Charles Farrell. That was the test of my 'box office power' and—the last picture (but one) that I did for Fox. Which gives you the dimensions of my box office 'power'!

"Then the studio let me go.

"I did independents. And I became so tired that once I had hysterics on the set, from sheer lack of sleep.

"Then—I woke up! I was down, all right, so I began to work. I thought, 'I'll show 'em!' It was a fight for fair. I hadn't saved any money and I was broke. I was too proud to cable home for help, after my high hat attitude before. I was homesick, friendless, alone and depressed. So, the fight was on. I didn't sit down and 'take it.' I didn't mope.

"I bought hats! I always buy hats when I am depressed. It has some strange psychological effect upon me. I bought new dresses, too, after the hat-buying orgy. When things are going well for me I'll go around, for months, in sweaters and slacks and think nothing of it. The moment things go wrong for me I invest in a wardrobe fit to knock your eyes out. Whenever you see me looking very toppy and all brand new, you can bet your life I've had a bad slump of some sort.

"Well, thanks to some friendly intervention, I finally got a test for 'Tarzan.' The test was okay. I got the part of Jane. For the second time I was a 'success'—due entirely to the monkeys and to Tarzan, of course. But never willing to learn, it seemed, it wasn't long before I lay down on the job again. For a different reason than before. At Fox I was considered very important—at M-G-M I wasn't. I had a little part in 'Strange Interlude' with Norma Shearer and Clark Gable. I had an uninteresting part in 'Tugboat Annie' with Marie Dressler. And I soon lost all interest in my career. I heard that they were making a Western at another studio and, as I had never done a Western and wanted to see Arizona, I asked if I could do it. Which is, you know, very bad professionally—for some obscure reason. Once again I was well on the road to oblivion.

"When I fully and acutely realized that I was once more a nobody I set to work again. And this time with a reason—for John had returned after two years abroad and I started seeing him again. When I first met him I'd been riding high at Fox. I must have felt rather ashamed of my low ebb this time, I think. Anyhow, I took stock of myself, in every way.

I HAD a new haircut. I bought a lot of new clothes. Hats and hats and HATS! I stopped wearing pajamas around the studio. I realized that it is more important to look nice in front of the people who employ you than to look nice at somebody's party. I made it a point to be nice to people—not insincerely—but for the first time I tried to be interested in others and to show it. I made myself do at least a few of the things I should do . . . such as publicity pictures, having my hair done smartly, wearing make-up before being photographed and trying to think of things to talk about before being interviewed.

This sounds very trivial. It isn't. For if you bring law and order to external things, you are very apt to bring it to internal things, too. Which is just what it did for me. Into my thoughts, my way of living, came some kind of system—and until that comes you can do nothing. And so, with a kind of new strength and firmness of purpose, I asked producers for parts I felt I could do. I went to the mat and fought my own battles. Finally I got the part in 'The Barretts' and then one in 'David Copperfield,' and now in 'The Voice of Bugle Ann'—so I feel 'up' again!

"Somehow I think that, with John's return and my consequent awareness of my own deficiencies, I reached—and passed—a turning-point in my life. Of course, I am about due for another relapse but this time I'm going to—to keep on buying hats!

"You see," said Maureen, vivid and fresh looking in her scarlet jersey frock, "I have a peculiar battle to fight with myself. One part of it is that success doesn't stimulate me as it does most people. It sort of lulls me to sleep instead. And when I'm unsuccessful and about as far down as I can get, I begin to gnash my teeth and thrash about. But you can't keep on being down, you know . . . for one of these times the count will be down and out!

"But I think that underlying even this truth about myself is my feeling that I will never be a really big star. My feeling that I am not 'star material.' I'm not different enough . . ."

I interrupted at this point to say, with honesty and not flattery, that that's just what I think Maureen is—different. She is the one screen personality I can think of who is utterly unspoiled and completely natural, fresh, honest, unbedaubed with "glamor."

"But that's it," said Maureen, "it's nice of you but I'm not different in the right way, you see. I haven't the mystery of Garbo. I haven't the seductiveness of Jean Harlow. I haven't the enigmatic beauty of a Dietrich, nor the extraordinariness of a Hepburn. I'm just me—and that's not star-stuff.

"I don't do anything to myself. I've never touched my hair. I don't use make-up. I don't dress in an unusual way. I don't swank about in opulent cars. I don't play the game at all—and what's worse, I don't want to. I don't go about to parties and meet the 'right people.' I don't entertain them. I don't think that I'm really an actress at all. I'm really just a little Irish girl who happened to come to Hollywood . . . and who doesn't belong here . . ."

And again the blue eyes of Maureen strayed to John Farrow and that blush, which always rises to her face when she looks at him, suffused it again.

"I'll give it all up one day," she said, "if it doesn't give me up first. I'll say good-bye to Hollywood . . . a last good-bye. We'll travel, John and I, when we can be married. We'll do interesting things together and settle in England where we can have our home and children.

"For the one thing I never 'lie down' about is being in love. There are some girls who, when the man they care about is the most devoted, the most tender, sort of get careless and take it for granted. I don't. Perhaps I've grown suspicious but I always wonder, 'Now, why all the devotion? Why this attack of attentiveness?' And so, when things are going most beautifully between John and me I'm always most on my toes. Perhaps because I care more . . .

"I'd like to make good in pictures, of course. For it's in line with what I've been saying. I'll feel down until I can prove to myself that I'm really up. And I can prove that only by doing at least one picture that really satisfies me—only by getting some parts that are really big and important.

"I may not be an actress. I'm sure I'm not. But I am an 'Irishman' and you can't keep a good Irishman down . . . not a fighting Irishman . . ."

never adopted the Valentino mannerisms. His career paralleled Rudolph Valentino's only in that they both danced for what they probably both laughingly called a living.

"I've been down to my last nickel so many times in New York that I couldn't begin to count them," says Romero. "I've lived in hall bedrooms and cooked over a gas flame.

ROMERO is a New Yorker, of Cuban descent, as American as buckwheat cakes, and hasn't visited the West Indies for twenty-one years. He'd like to make a trip there now, he says, despite the chance of running into a bullet-popping revolution.

Cesar is a distinct contradiction. On the screen, because he is slightly sinister, you expect villainy. Certainly neither "Rendezvous" nor "Show Them No Mercy" whitewashed his mortal soul. When you meet him, the illusion is immediately dispelled. You expect to find a Latin, reeking of lure, and you find a Latin, all right, but one full of American inclinations.

He is all-Yankee in his fondness for tennis, swimming, riding, sports clothes, fast cars, cute girls. And then, suddenly, when you have tabbed him as a Yankee, the Latin in him crops up and he goes reverent over Jose Marti, Cuba's nineteenth century liberator and his mother's godfather.

There is one thing about Romero, Yankee or Latin, his life is built on heroic principles. Living nicely but modestly in his Hollywood duplex, with a Filipino houseman as valet, cook and major domo, Romero is supporting his mother, father, two sisters, and one brother, in Asbury

What makes a girl "Click"?

JOAN is pretty. She is smart. And she is asked everywhere.

Barbara looks at Joan with secret envy. For Barbara, too, is pretty. And she is smart. But evening after evening, she is left at home alone.

Why? What makes one girl "click" socially and another fail, when both are equally good-looking?

The truth is, Barbara could be just as popular as Joan if it were not that she is careless—careless about something no girl can afford to overlook.

You can't blame people for avoiding the girl or woman who is careless about underarm perspiration odor. It's too unpleasant to tolerate in anyone, no matter how pretty she may be.

There's really no excuse for it these days when Mum makes it so easy to keep the underarms fresh, free from every trace of odor.

Just half a minute is all you need to use Mum. Then you're safe for the whole day!

Use it any time—after dressing, as well as before. It's harmless to clothing. It's soothing to the skin, too—so soothing you can use it right after shaving your underarms.

Depend upon Mum to prevent all unpleasant perspiration odor, without preventing perspiration itself. Use it daily, and no one will ever have this reason to avoid you! Bristol-Myers, Inc., 630 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Park, New Jersey. Supporting them? Doing it as a labor of love, with that expansive Latin spirit that makes such things a privilege instead of a burden.

"It seems that as my father's career gradually declines," he says with typical philosophy, "that my career is in the ascent. At one time in our lives, my father had money. He was an exporter of machinery in use in the Cuban sugar fields. But the sugar industry is ruined. So is his business. He had property in America, but first one house, then another, was lost. I am glad that if his career had to fade, mine can help him."

Romero's career has been built, largely, on luck. He says so himself. He has bluffed his way into two theatrical fields. After the collapse of his dancing career, he tried the stage. Rather, the stage tried him. Tullio Carminati left the Broadway cast of "Strictly Dishonorable" to go to Europe. Without theatrical experience, Romero stepped into the leading male role and thereby became an actor. For three years he enjoyed a stage career.

Then 1934 found him in Hollywood, inexperienced in films, anxious to make good at them. After a few brief picture appearances, luck placed him as the lead opposite the luscious Marlene Dietrich, in "The Devil Is a Woman." He had never played a screen lead before. Romero acquitted himself so well that he overheard the director telling someone that "Romero is the best leading man Dietrich ever had." The news made him feel pretty good.

SOON Romero will enjoy the rare pleasure of having a woman in his house. It will not be a bride, because he does not feel that he can afford a wife, yet. The woman will be Graciela, his eldest sister, one year older than the twenty-eight-year-old Cesar. Grace has been teaching school, and needs the rest and chance to recuperate that a visit to California will give her.

Although finances will make marriage at the moment an impossibility, Cesar is not immune to Hollywood beauties. He divides his attentions between Betty Furness, who wears those giddy hats, and blonde, statuesque Virginia Bruce. Romero insists, although each is individually lovely, that he is not in love with the girls you see him with around town. Nor has he been.

At the moment, he is all enthusiasm for Carole Lombard whom he characterizes as the grandest sport in the film business. She fusses around helping the prop man when he has too much to do, holds lights for the busy electricians, lets fifty-five gallons of water at a time be dowsed over herself and Romero for a "Love Before Breakfast" scene, and refuses to have a double. Generous, impulsive, she gave Romero two Christmas gifts. One wasn't enough. The first was a leather-encased breast-pocket watch that fastens to his lapel with a thong, and the second was a pair of gold-fitted garters.

However, there is no romance here. Merely friendship. As for Romero, he has been in love, once, he says, and isn't now. Cesar's love affair took place in New York when he was devoted to the prima donna of a theatrical troupe he was with. And, we gather, the singer returned the emotion. If she didn't, she was foolish. This Romero is a nice guy.

leaving Hollywood for awhile, couldn't find a D'orsay anywhere else. Many stormy sessions in shops about the country must have resulted in some bright person's deciding that the D'orsay cut must be a darn good one. So, this spring the Hollywood-beloved D'orsay cut shoe makes its debut in many pedal guises! In case you aren't familiar with this particular style, this is what it looks like. It's a short vamp shoe with a sharp downward cut to its side line. The heel is high. In line with the general feeling for dressier shoes, the plain pump of this type is almost overshadowed by a number of straps, ties and step-ins that use the same cut in their design. It's a young shoe, as you can guess, for Hollywood likes its feet to look dainty, feminine and young.

And a word about heel heights, too. So many of you write in to me with shoe problems—big feet, for instance—or being tall, you wonder if you have to stick to the more conservative arch-saver styles, etc. Well, heels are as varied in height as all of you! They range all the way from flats to three inches. The built-up, rather sensible walking heel is popular for tailored daytime use and this is a little less than two inches high. This is a popular style all over the country. For formal afternoon and evening use, high heels are 'way in the lead of all others. Yet the very tall girl finds consolation in the fact that she can wear almost heelless dancing sandals and still be fashionably shod. In fact, you can choose your heel height to suit your figure, your taste or your costume, just as you would any other item in your wardrobe. And isn't it grand to know that clothes and accessories at last are developed to a point of individuality where you can be yourself and not just a carbon copy of eight other people!

Cute Margo, of the dancing feet and dramatic moods, attributes her graceful carriage to the fact that she wore flat heeled shoes during her Mexican childhood. And Jean Muir emphatically states that she would never wear a high heel, regardless of future dictates of style. She finds the almost flat heel ideal for her tallness and it gives her a sense of grace she cannot feel in higher heels. So there is the long and the short of the heel question as exemplified by two charming Hollywood stars.

NOW to our pictures. Madge Evans likes the tailored alligator pump for her daytime costumes. She wears this with two typical spring costumes. One is a three-piece suit, shown on page 64. The topcoat and suit jacket of this trio are gray tweed overplaided in deep wine red. The skirt is gray flannel and Madge wears a simple tailored blouse in silk of a shade to match the wine of the plaid. Her pumps are black as is her handbag.

Capes, as I told you last month, appear again and again to form attractive ensembles. One of Madge's, not illustrated, is particularly interesting in the way it combines two fabrics. Gray, white and blue for the plaid of the skirt and the trimming of the cape. The tunic is blue wool and buttons trimly from collar to hem. The cape is designed with a jaunty swing to its lines and combined with a tunic, makes a very different sort of fashion alliance. Again Madge, with this costume, wears her alligator pumps but this time they are in blue to match the predominating color of her costume. Her large handbag is made of the tunic material, a nice matching accessory idea.

Now, as an alternate to Madge's alligator pump, I suggest a trim oxford of contrasting color and leather. The shoes pictured are brown alligator with beige suede. But it could well be navy alligator with grey suede to tie up with Madge's blue costume. This is typical of the oxfords with moderately high heel which are suited to tailored suits and other simple daytime costumes.

Still tailored, but more feminine and dressy, is the sabot strap slipper of blue kid which is shown as an alternative to Lucille Ball's charming silk and wool ensemble. It has the new detail of the square toe and it also has an innovation in its high square heel. The first square heels shown were on the low, peasant shoe type. The large buckle and the tailored stitching add a special fillip to this design. It's a perfect example of the "dressmaker" type of tailored shoe. Also, this shoe has a special high "arch curve" feature.

Lucille designed her charming costume —and what a grand job, don't you think?

ONLY YOU AND RIT KNOW IT'S AN OLD DRESS!

SPARKLING with new color (thanks to Rit)—last year's dress becomes truly a new dress in everything except cost! And it's so easy and carefree now with Rit, that women who remember old-fashioned dyeing can't believe their eyes.

First, Rit has eliminated the harsh boiling that's so hard on both your clothes and you. Second, Rit contains a penetrating ingredient (patented) that makes the color soak in quickly, deeply, evenly—without fear of spots and streaks.

Rit brings the charm of color (and a saving) to many, many things in your wardrobe and your home—curtains and draperies —luncheon and bridge linens—fabric gloves to match your dress —lingerie or stockings that need fresh tones —blouses—bedspreads—and many others that will suggest themselves when you see how easy this new dyeing really is.

SKIN Beauty WITH Mercolized Wax

● Any complexion can be made clearer, smoother, younger with Mercolized Wax. This single cream is a complete beauty treatment.

Mercolized Wax absorbs the discolored blemished outer skin in tiny, invisible particles. Brings out the young, beautiful skin hidden beneath.

Just pat Mercolized Wax on your skin every night like cold cream. It beautifies while you sleep. Mercolized Wax brings out your hidden beauty.

USE Saxolite Astringent — a refreshing, stimulating skin tonic. Smooths out wrinkles and age lines. Refines coarse pores, eliminates oiliness. Dissolve Saxolite in one-half pint witch hazel.

TRY Phelactine—the "different" depilatory. Removes superfluous hair quickly and gently. Simple to use. Odorless.

At drug and department stores everywhere.

Here is the favorite Hollywood stocking which is only Knee-High. Stars wear these under evening gowns and also for general daytime use. The closely woven band fits snugly under the knee.

The dress is navy blue sprinkled over with white snow crystals. The peasant influence is evident in the front gathered fullness of the skirt, the soft, high necked blouse and the full sleeves bloused below the elbow. Her ribbed navy blue wool coat has the same bloused sleeve as the dress. As you can see, Lucille chose the popular opera pump with stitched detail as the shoe to suit this admirably.

Ann Harding's ensemble of dress and short flared coat is in natural color with bright splashes of flamingo red in the tricky lacings and the bindings. A matching bag is trimmed with the red and Ann's gloves are red, too. This is one of the best looking outfits I've seen Ann wearing in a long while. It was designed for a picture by Bernard Newman, who seems to have had imagination enough to give Ann the bit of dash and youth she has needed in her costumes for some time. It's obvious that he wasn't thrown by her long blonde hair, nor by her general air of mature dignity. He has made her youthful looking without appearing too giddy. In fact Ann went into raptures of praise over what Newman can do with a few yards of cloth and some accessories. She thinks he's God's gift to clothes-harassed screen stars!

Back to the feet. Ann wears broad-strapped alligator with hers. And I offer a third shoe suggestion in the form of a neat Cabana step-in in such a slick combination as chamois with brown calf! Both perforations, which are a big item in summer footwear, and stitching dominate the trimming of this smart all 'round shoe. This same shoe comes in such grand color schemes, besides the one shown, as gray suede with gray calf trim, brown and white, blue calf with blue patent. And a word about gray, you'll find it creeping steadily into costumes and accessories—gray suits are very smart and shoe people are keeping step with gray shoes to harmonize or match. However, don't try to make your gray costume a monotone, it's much smarter to wear gray and a color contrast.

JULIE HAYDON, in a charming black and white print with unusual white collar and cuff trim, chooses plain pumps in kid. But I suggest as a change, a charming afternoon sandal of shiny patent leather with the bright accent of gold buckles and trim. It's new and so feminine.

Lucille Ball's black cocktail gown, printed in bright flowers, is a perfect spring dress for everyone's wardrobe. The high neckline has a low cut in back. The sleeves are long and the skirt is voluminous. It's a charming gown.

I've been so busy talking shoes that I haven't had a chance to mention hosiery. Silk stockings tend to dress up to the general air of quality and fineness of all fashions. Sheerness is an important detail—and dullness. There's a coppery overtone to most of the popular spring colors, the rich, coppery suntan that you acquire as the season progresses. There's a vast range of the beige and tan tones, and a definite feeling for gray.

I don't know whether or not you are familiar with the knee-length silk stocking that is so popular with Hollywood. It's a perfect boon for evening and when warm weather comes, it's the answer to keeping comfortable. Knee-High, shown on this page, comes in all weights from the very sheer, with sandal foot for evening, to the heavier, more serviceable weights for daytime. The band, that holds it firmly to your leg, is woven elastic so that it can't sag or stretch after repeated laundering. This is a stocking darling of the stars and a grand item for your spring stocking chest.

The attractive sandal shown with this stocking is typical of the very feminine, open-design sandals for spring and summer evening wear. The Grecian type sandal is still important, and as I mentioned before, the almost heeless one is still very popular.

I know how much you all like to hear about new fads from Hollywood, so look on page 66 where Kay Linaker is sporting a silver mesh tie with one of the new dinner suits that the stars are so keen about. Kay's dinner suit consists of a mannish white satin blouse, instep-length white skirt and a tailored jacket of white taffeta pin-checked in silver and chenille dotted. The mesh tie, in a small armor design, is knotted in the manner of a silk four-in-hand. A very amusing and different accessory trick.

Jean Muir totes about a small notebook of this same armor mesh in her evening bag. It's very handy for keeping track of those dates that are made of an evening and often forgotten unless some written reminder is made on the spot.

I have a grand new leaflet for you to send for this month. It's all about what you can do to enhance your smartness without spending a dime extra of your allowance! Just send a stamped, self-addressed envelope for "Making the Most of Myself." Write to me, Adelia Bird, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, New York.

ALL of this wouldn't be so extraordinary if Alice weren't always the life of the party. Among Hollywood's younger set, she's the one who suggests that she and her friends go places and do things. You'd expect a wallflower to wax philosophical on the "more important side of life," but hardly the girl whose toes are always tapping and who is invariably surrounded by an adoring court of young Adonises. She has only to express the wish for anything and one of 'em runs and fetches it for her.

And that's what's wrong.

"I don't want a man to wait on me," Alice says. "I want to wait on him. I want to worship at the shrine a bit instead of being always the shrine worshipped at, if you know what I mean."

So far Alice hasn't the faintest idea who he will be. Many men have "rushed" her since she came to Hollywood, but he hasn't shown up yet. She goes here with this one, there with that one, friendly to all but faithful to none. She has only the vaguest idea what he'll look like. She just knows he'll be "nice."

"I think all that tall, dark and handsome business is a lot of stuff," she said frankly. "All I know is that there'll be something about him that will appeal to me. A real man, with the quiet courtesy and courage that goes with real manhood. Not the artificial, theatrical kind."

Offhand, Alice can rattle off quite a lot of specifications about this husband-to-be of hers. Here are some of them:

"He must know more than I do, because I've got to admire and respect him.

The Wrong Shade of Face Powder Will Make You Look Years Older Than You Really Are!

BY Lady Esther

Are you using the right shade of face powder for you?

That sounds like a rather needless question, doesn't it? For there is nothing a woman selects more confidently than her color of face powder. Yet, it is an actual fact, as artists and make-up experts will tell you, that many women use altogether the wrong shade of face powder.

The shade they so fondly believe makes them look their youngest and most attractive does just the opposite and makes them look years older than they really are!

Brunettes think that because they are brunettes they should use a dark shade. Blondes think they should use a light shade. Titians think they should use something else.

Choose by Trying

The fact is, you shouldn't choose a face powder shade according to your "type" or coloring, but according to which one is the most becoming for you. After all, a brunette may have a very fair skin while a blonde may have a dark or olive skin or any shade between. The only way to tell, therefore, is to try all five shades which, experts agree, accommodate all colorings.

So fundamentally sound is this principle that I want you to prove it to yourself at my expense. I will therefore send you all five shades of my Lady Esther Face Powder free of charge and obligation. When you get the five shades, try all five on. Don't think that your choice must be confined to any one or two shades. As I say, try on all five. Maybe the very shade you think least suited to you is really your most becoming, your most flattering.

Stays on for 4 Hours

When you make the shade test of Lady Esther Face Powder, I want you to notice, too, how smooth this face powder is — how evenly it goes on and long it holds. By actual test, you will find this face powder adheres for four hours or more.

Write today for all five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder which I offer free. With the five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder I will also send you a 7-day tube of Lady Esther Face Cream. The coupon brings both the powder and cream.

(You can paste this on a penny postcard.) (22) FREE

Please send me by return mail a liberal supply of all five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder; also a 7-day supply of your Lady Esther Four-purpose Face Cream.

GRAY HAIR

Now, without any risk, you can tint those streaks or patches of gray or faded hair to lustrous shades of blonde, brown or black. A small brush and Brownatone does it. Prove it—by applying a little of this famous tint to a lock of your own hair.

Used and approved—for over twenty-four years by thousands of women. BROWNATONE is safe. Guaranteed harmless for tinting gray hair. Active coloring agent is purely vegetable. Cannot affect waving of hair. Is economical and lasting—will not wash out. Simply retouch as the new gray appears. Imparts rich, beautiful color with amazing speed. Just brush or comb it in. Shades: "Blonde to Medium Brown" and "Dark Brown to Black" cover every need.

BROWNATONE is only 50c—at all drug and toilet counters—always on a money-back guarantee.

"He must be sympathetic without being sentimental; kind, without spoiling me.

"He must be utterly helpless about the house, completely incapable of looking after his own socks and shirts so that I can look after them for him.

"He must have a good sense of humor and be able to laugh me out of it when I get too serious over inconsequential things."

THAT'S enough, and if you read between the lines you'll see that if Alice appears to be asking quite a lot in a mere man she's asking most of those things because they make her ask more of herself. You'll notice that she doesn't say he has to be rich and have a yacht so that she can go week-ending in luxury. No. She'd rather have him like potatoes so that she can peel 'em.

Above everything else, Alice is sure that her husband will not be an actor.

"Everybody I know is connected in some way with the theatre," she explained, "and although I like them, still I don't think that I'll find the man I shall really love there. You see, the theatre is the factory for simulated emotion, and so theatrical people can't seem to help getting emotional about everything they do. They get all wrapped up in themselves—just as I am now. So I'm sure the greatest thing in my life won't be found in the theatre."

"Even when people were saying that I might marry Rudy Vallee," she reminisced, "I felt that. I've always been grateful to Rudy for the chance he gave me with his orchestra, but I have never been in love with him. I've always said I would never marry anyone in the profession."

Alice has no idea of giving up her own profession at present. Nevertheless, you feel with every word she says that if it were a case of that or her happiness she'd tear up her movie contract at the drop of the hat. "Love, honor and obey" is her idea of the ultimate in contracts.

Meanwhile, until Prince Charming comes along, Alice is going right on up the ladder with those twinkling feet of hers, doing each role as it comes to her to the best of her ability.

And that's this Alice's idea of Wonderland. The big movie contract is merely the frosting on the cake she wants to bake.

Between You and Me

geous spirit, she stands today as one of the most remarkable actresses in motion pictures.

This intense personality has journeyed far along the road to screen success since "A Bill of Divorcement." Her sparkling performance in that film immediately attracted attention. From then on she was the major topic of discussion. Some fans tried to label her a "one-picture star," but she eliminated that viewpoint by skyrocketing to greater fame with her memorable Jo in "Little Women." In "Alice Adams" she presented a true portrait of a sensitive girl in the midst of small-town life and this performance was heralded as one of the best of 1935. In "Sylvia Scarlett" Katharine Hepburn proves conclusively that her ability as a versatile dramatic star has made her one of the most outstanding screen artists of all time.—Albert Manski, Boston, Mass.

$1 PRIZE LETTER

Awe-Struck Crowd

I have never seen a more awe-struck theatre crowd than that at "The Magnificent Obsession." It seemed as if the clean, inspiring story enveloped itself into the hearts and minds of many weary, downhearted folks.

Our city is an industrial one, depending on the textile trade primarily, and a large percentage of the population is of the working class who have suffered during the last few years. We need more pictures like the aforementioned to bolster up our mental attitude and give us inspiration and hope for the future.

We don't know for the most part and don't care about the technical features of the picture or the acting flaws or the adaptation. It is enough to be able to leave the theatre and know that a charming interlude has passed and that a little more beauty has been added to our outlook.—Mrs. I. Balis, Reading, Pa.

A Line or Two from Lots of Letters

Hollywood seems to be producing pictures for a new audience—i.e. for persons under five years of age. Someone should gently break the news to the film moguls that a huge majority of the people who attend their products are (at least physically) much older. Then perhaps such babyish entertainment known as cartoons would be eliminated from the program.

If our cinema geniuses cannot produce anything other than this boring nonsense, let's have five or ten minutes of silence and inactivity which would indeed prove a blessing to our tormented nerves.—Raymond Nichols, Philadelphia, Pa.

Radio Stars Taboo in Movies

Give us the good old days when screen stars were screen stars, stage stars were stage stars and radio stars . . . well, they were yet to be born. Jack Benny, Fred Allen, Amos 'n' Andy, Burns and Allen and the others are perfect when heard and not seen, and the "air" is sufficient for us to receive their entertainment. They may thrill through the microphone, but, oh, what stupidity they display on the screen. So, let's vote to stop borrowing carpenters to do bricklayers' work. Give us more he-man pictures with he-man actors, not baby-faced tenors or tender-toed soft-shoers.—Judy Gray, Gloucester City, N. J.

Potpourri

Loretta Young's starry-wide-eyed expression reminds me of someone who is taking a correspondence course in "How to Act." She acts as an interference and does not add any more glamor to a film than one of the extras.—L. Glazier, Camden, N. J. Will it never go out of fashion among the fans to look upon actors as heroes or villains rather than as artists? They idolize the star, and either ignore the fine work done by some character actor, or detest him all the more for playing his part consummately well in an unsympathetic role.—L. G. T., Asheville, N. C. Rosalind Russell is sophisticated but not to the degree where sophistication becomes too obvious. Her slight accent is unaffected and utterly charming.—D. Black, Winnipeg, Canada. Every month I buy movie magazines and what do I find?

Stories about the same stars all the time. We know all about the adopted children, polo ponies, and redecorated rooms to suit one's personality and mood, so let's hear something we haven't heard about for the umpteenth time. How about giving the younger, unpublicized stars a break?—H. Seifton, Buffalo, N. Y. Brian Donlevy is a welcome change from the sugar-sweet faces and villainous bad men. —M. Rosenbloum, Cleveland, Tenn. Why do the movie moguls insist on giving us new stars who look, talk and act exactly like some well-known one whom the public already loves? I can never interest myself in a plot with Rosalind Russell emoting, for I keep thinking how much better Myrna Loy would be and that spoils it for me. It's just like shopping for some product you like and going home with something "just as good," which you find out later isn't!—E. Redman, Long Beach, Calif. Franchot Tone is so average looking that no one would be expected to rave over his facial perfection, but what he lacks there, he more than makes up for in the perfect interpretation of whatever character he is cast as. I'm so glad that they have stopped posing Joan Crawford in the silly simpering poses used so much in her publicity pictures in the years she was Mrs. Fairbanks, Jr.—N. C. Tate, Appalachia, Virginia. Very clear enunciation and careful pronunciation are as much a requisite to perfect enjoyment of our pictures as well-modulated voices, pleasing personalities and genuine acting ability on the part of our admired actors and actresses. This is a friendly tip.—A. Benson, Chicago, Ill. If the producers of mystery films would only devote such painstaking efforts to the endings of their mysteries as they do to their beginnings, they would be doing us a great favor.—H. Foster, New York, N. Y. I say down with Gable, Cagney and the rest of the leading-lady wreckers of the screen. I think it is about time we threw out some of the roughnecks and put a few gentlemen on the screen.—W. Zahauer, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Cut Shirley Publicity!

I suggest that newspapermen start a strike on publishing anything further about Shirley Temple, allowing this space for praise of Sybil Jason and her superb acting. No child actress's efforts could ever hope to surpass those of Miss J. in "The Little Big Shot."

Of course, Shirley is adorable and sweet, her acting is excellent. So are Sybil, Jane Withers and Freddie Bartholomew. Why direct all the orchids to one personality and slight others who entertain and satisfy the public as well, if not better?—O. Wood, Batavia, Ohio.

Scallions, Hepburn!

Bore me not with "Sylvia Scarlett"! Much too reminiscent of Barrymore is this film not to have a John or two springing about here and there!

Really, Katharine Hepburn, you're much lovelier, much more magnetic as a "softie," fr'instance "Alice Adams." We showered a florist shop on you for so beautifully doing that delightful yarn of Booth Tarkington's but this—well, I smell only scallions!

A thousand cheers for Katharine Hepburn, but nary a one for Sylvester Scarlett nor his haircut. Forgive me, Katie, but the picture had it coming.—Rubye Chapman, 802 So. Perry St., Montgomery, Ala.

DOCTORS NOW KNOW THOUSANDS NEEDN'T BE SKINNY

1 Rich red blood, necessary to properly nourish and build up every part of the body, is especially promoted by this new discovery where iron is needed.

2 A healthy digestion which gets ALL the good out of your food requires an adequate supply of Vitamin B. This new discovery supplies this precious element.

3 Normal, regular elimination to remove poisonous waste and thereby promote health and growth calls for adequate Vitamin B. This is the third purpose.

Posed by professional models

THOUSANDS GAIN 10 TO 25 LBS. QUICK—WITH NEW 3-WAY TREATMENT

AMAZING gains in weight are reported all over the country with this sensational new 3-way discovery. Even if you never could gain an ounce before, remember thousands have put on solid, naturally attractive flesh this new, easy way—in just a few weeks!

And not only has this new triple-acting treatment brought normal, good-looking pounds, but also naturally clear skin, freedom from indigestion and constipation, glorious new pep.

New body-building discovery

Scientists recently discovered that thousands of people are thin and rundown for the single reason that they do not get enough digestion-strengthening Vitamin B and blood-enriching iron in their daily food. Now the richest known source of body-building Vitamin B is cultured ale yeast. By a new process the finest imported cultured ale yeast is now concentrated 7 times, making it 7 times more powerful. Then it is combined with 3 kinds of blood-building iron in pleasant little tablets known as Ironized Yeast tablets.

If you, too, need these vital elements to build you up, get these new triple-acting Ironized Yeast tablets from your druggist today. Then, day after day as you take them, watch flat chest develop and skinny limbs round out to natural attractiveness. Constipation and indigestion from the same cause vanish, skin clears to normal beauty, new health comes—you're a new person.

Try it—guaranteed

No matter how skinny and rundown you may be from lack of sufficient Vitamin B and iron, these new 3-way Ironized Yeast tablets should build you up in just a few weeks, as they have thousands of others. If not delighted with the benefits of the very first package, your money instantly refunded.

Only don't be deceived by the many cheaply prepared "Yeast and Iron" tablets sold in imitation of Ironized Yeast. These cheap counterfeits usually contain only the lowest grade of ordinary yeast and iron, and cannot possibly give the same results. Be sure you get the genuine Ironized Yeast. Look for "IY" stamped on each tablet.

Special FREE offer!

To start you building up your health right away, we make this absolutely FREE offer. Purchase a package of Ironized Yeast tablets at once, cut out the seal on the box and mail it to us with a clipping of this paragraph. We will send you a fascinating new book on health, "New Facts About Your Body." Remember, results guaranteed with the very first package—or money refunded. At all druggists. Ironized Yeast Co., Inc., Dept. 35, Atlanta, Ga.

Superset stays SET!

SLEEP tossed heads quickly ruin the effects of ordinary waving lotions. But Superset sets hair as it should be set and keeps it that way. With Superset, your hair is always manageable—sleek, burnished and well groomed. Superset dries quickly and leaves absolutely no flaky deposit. Use Superset and be proud of your lasting, natural, lustrous waves. 10c at all 5 and 10 cent stores. In two formulas—regular and No. 2 (Faster Drying).

lished! Writing to the stars is an unsatisfactory flyer into space that I rarely attempt.

But recently I sent a letter, far from my best effort, being just a vote concerning Jean Harlow's lovely hair, and received an unsolicited response, a courtesy which I found a delightful surprise.

And this Christmas brought a fine white greeting card!

Such a secretarial staff must cost her a pretty penny. But what a pretty gesture! If "Beauty is, as beauty does," then more than her hair is lovely.—Beulah Barker, Chicago, Ill.

Disappointed!

I can't imagine Leslie Howard in the role of Romeo! The only thing he has is perfect diction. If I were Juliet, and all my lover could boast of was speaking well, I should be highly disappointed in the balcony scene.

Give me a dashing romantic fellow who can make love. Leslie is too staidly English ever to be a great lover, which Romeo certainly was!—Mary L. Torok, Youngstown, Ohio.

A Pat on the Back

Some movie magazines seem to get a great deal of pleasure out of printing ridiculous stories about the stars. Every slight excuse for a scandal is immediately written up in big headlines. No rumor is ignored, no matter how absurd. It gives the unsuspecting public a bad impression of Hollywood.

MODERN SCREEN'S articles are always interesting, never offensive, and the reader knows they must have truthful foundations by the intelligent way they are presented. I've acquired more movie favorites by reading MODERN SCREEN'S human articles and becoming acquainted with the stars' true personalities, learning they are as real and have the same trials and problems as our next door neighbor.—B. B. Everett, Washington, D. C.

Irene Dunne—Friend

Being an Irene Dunne fan has its advantages. As such, I have a minimum of adverse criticism to read about my star, and the many very fine tributes, paid in recognition of exceptional talent, are, to me, sources of unending satisfaction and pride.

If "seeing is believing," I can't help but wish that the host of Irene Dunne fans could meet her, just as I have, and be convinced, beyond a doubt, that Miss Dunne is equally as beautiful off screen as on, and a thoroughly delightful person. I deem it an honor and a privilege to be able to call Irene Dunne "friend."—E. Shotwell, Saranac Lake, N. Y.

And How Do You Feel About This Question?

It is about time something was said about the mediocre "quickies" that are being shown to make up the second picture of the double-feature program that most of the picture houses have been showing. I am sure that most picture patrons would rather omit such poor pictures and enjoy one good feature with a number of short subjects.

With the showing of "David Copperfield" and "Mutiny on the Bounty" the second feature made the program entirely too long, and by the end of the show everyone was restless and really could not enjoy the picture even though it was well produced and interesting.

In these second-rate pictures, which have all the earmarks of being made for the express purpose of filling the double-feature bill, the dialogue is stilted and the whole picture gives the impression of jerky and unconnected sequences. The stories are flat and even if there is a really good player he has a job to hold up a poor story.—Elsie Douglas, Chula Vista, Calif.

of "Captain Blood." Nobody recognized the actor, for his first picture was yet to be released. He was just another handsome gent—and there are many of them in this town—insofar as other patrons were concerned. A week after the premiere, I saw him there again. Errol was being mobbed by autograph-seekers and proprietors who insisted that he have "one on the house." Some fun—fame!

UNA MERKEL was making a hit for herself at the same place that evening, and so was the stunning Rosalind Russell. Clark Gable, of course, was so nearly killed in the crush that a solicitous friend sat him facing the orchestra with his back to the patrons. Even then, Gable was recognized by some and I'm sure that both he and the management had few regrets when he finally left and the club was restored to a semblance of order.

Radio City—and the radio—quite naturally attracts movie stars. The latter offers them oodles of extra money for making a single broadcast. Margaret Sullavan, Irene Dunne and John Boles recently made more than their expenses while visiting this most expensive city, by appearing on a popular program just once. John can always warble one of his most successful tunes and walk off with the honors and the cash. Clark Gable, too, was a great success at Radio City.

The various program players who support movie stars are pleased but not impressed to do it. They never "crowd" a celebrity and Gable received more attention from the waitress in the lunch room and the hat check boy than he did from his large radio supporting cast.

Since Repeal, the cocktail hour has taken on great importance in New York. The Plaza, the Gotham and the Ritz are the places to go—that is, if you would see movie stars—and who of us would not? Yep, five o'clock's the time they turn out in sartorial splendor—Dolores Del Rio a vision in black, Gladys Swarthout done up in mink and gardenias, Sylvia Sidney, pert in leopard skin, all with the handsome males who escort them. Yes, it is very important to be seen in the "right" places and let it never be said that a movie star fails to lay stress on importance.

Although the Plaza offers an excellent dance floor, few picture players ever trip the light fantastic. It is considered much smarter to book oneself at a ringside table to see and be seen. Billie Burke and her daughter, Patricia Ziegfeld, recently had tea each afternoon at the Gotham and Carl Brisson seldom missed a cocktail hour at the Savoy-Plaza.

THE Rainbow Room, a swanky night spot on the sixty-fifth floor—yep, honest—of the RKO Building is, of course, a magnet for celebrities, although both Robert Young and Jean Parker confessed it floored them. Both had always wanted to visit New York and this particular place was the memory of wonderland they carried away with them. A beautiful dance floor, lilting music, smart entertainers of the highly sophisticated type are a few of the high points featured in this pleasure penthouse. Anyone who has seen it is not likely to forget it soon.

It would seem that most celebrities who come to town do little but play. That, of course, is true, for New York to them means vacation. And such a gay, stimulating one that it usually takes a week at Palm Springs, on returning to California, to rest up in order to be ready for the next production.

When they step off the train in Los Angeles, their trunks are weighed down with clothes and souvenirs of the big city. And when friends gather 'round, the returned traveller invariably says, "I've never had such a wonderfully hectic time in my life. I'm exhausted. I couldn't do it often. But, oh, those plays, those shops, those night clubs! The brisk walk up Fifth Avenue and into Central Park in the mornings and the stroll down dazzling Broadway at night! Oh, it's wonderful. But, as I said, I wouldn't want to do it soon again. It's too exhausting. That is, I wouldn't want to until my next vacation. By the way, when is that? Not for three months? Well, maybe I could hop a plane between pictures. They couldn't miss me at the studio if I stayed in New York for only four days!" So said Kay Francis, who loves the big town like all who visit it do.

Beauty Headliners for Spring

wear round necks or choker beads, or have your lips too over-rouged.

If you have a short face, and want height, an adorable top cluster of curls on the crest of your head will give it to you. Take the curls away from the sides and put them on top—that's "tops" in style.

Now suppose, on the other hand, that you have a squarish sort of face with a determined chin. Well, I want you to live up to that chin when you go to the hairdressers, or to the hat shop. Browbeat the attendants into selecting styles for you that are softening. Don't, whatever you do, wear a hat with a square crown. Forget all about sturdy, practical, rugged little hats—go in for saucy, softly curved numbers, with enough brim not to make your face jut out farther than your hat. Fetching nosegays of flowers make nice millinery touches.

Your coiffure problem is a bit more difficult than some, because you can't wear your hair fluffed out around your cheeks on account of the broadening effect such an arrangement would have, and yet, you must get softness into the general contour. Usually an off-the-face hairdress is best for you, but with soft, smooth (not fluffy) waves at the sides, and then a surprise feature of feathery curls at your temples or high over your ears. Don't have end ringlets that curl up around your jaw-bone!

Wear oval or round necklines—never square ones—and softening lingerie touches. It's splendid to have a chin with a mind of its own, but don't forget that men don't want too much leading done with the chin. Wear nice soft frivolous colors, too, such as lemon yellow or spicy old rose. Be generous with your lipstick, and make your lip curves full.

If you're one of those oval-faced, smooth-browed creatures like Pat Ellis, in fact, if you're very young and your forehead is very nice—whatever may be the shape of your face—you generally can wear an off-the-face hat, the kind that makes you look like an angel with an up-turned halo.

Now for the long thin-faced individual! Don't go high-hat on us just because we have left you until the last. Your hats and your coiffures should be the exact opposite of high-hat, and instead should dip down over your brow. The crown of your hat should be round and close fitting, the brim should shoot downward, or flare out very wide (if there is a brim) and all the trimmings should go sidewards, never up. Your coiffure should follow much the same lines, with a wave, a bang or curls partly concealing your forehead, and with the fullness toward the sides.

And now if you're a bit weary of shopping and have reached the point where the saleswoman says, not too helpfully as she adjusts another hat on your tiring head, "Of course you can get the effect a little better when your make-up and hair are freshened up a bit" . . . it's time to do just that!

Let's stop at the cosmetic counter first to see what's new in the way of make-up. There's a delightful new cucumber lotion, for example, that will soothe your hat-troubled brow, cleanse the grime and make-up from your face, and act as a powder base . . . all this triple action in double-quick time. It's a refreshing pick-me-up cleanser, and is just the kind of an emollient lotion your skin needs after its long winter of being dried out by hot-house radiators.

Eyes have been called the windows of the soul, but so far as I know they haven't heretofore been called the "shopping windows." Well, if you can believe your eyes, here is a make-up kit for you, complete with powder, rouge, lipstick, mascara, and eye shadow, at a price that you generally pay for a box of powder. But more exciting than the price, is the fact that you don't have to hang over the cosmetic case with your nose pressed to the glass wondering what shade of this or that you should take. No, the eyes have it. You just say to the clerk, "I have brown (or blue or gray or green) eyes," and the clerk hands you the make-up kit that is styled for brown (or blue or gray or green) eyes.

Make-up, styled to the color of your eyes, is eminently more practical than it sounds at first. A famous cosmetic house has spent months in research work to perfect this make-up idea, and artists, style authorities, and theatrical directors have all been consulted in the process. You see it's like this. At least, every woman knows the color of her eyes. (We hope some young man has told her with the proper compliments.) But I have found through your letters to me that a lot of you don't know exactly how to describe your complexion—"It's sort of medium, I guess"—and some of you are even a bit puzzled by your hair—"It's between a dark blonde and a medium brown, I think" . . . etc. So, make-up styled to the color of the eyes, does away with that kind of guess-work. It does not pretend to be an exact science. The color conclusions naturally had to be arrived at "for the good of the majority." But in this confusing world of color and cosmetics, a great many women will find these authoritative color conclusions far superior to any that they could work out for themselves.

And now, I'm going to talk for the moment to those unhappy girls to whom a new make-up or a new hat may mean only so much more grief, perhaps, because they dread looking into a mirror that seems to say, "You might be a pretty girl, if it weren't for those ugly skin blemishes." Just recently, I am grateful to say, I have run across a new acne treatment which, for the first time in my experience, honestly seems to justify a mention in this column. Numerous acne products have been put on the market from time to time, and exaggerated claims made for them. I have had considerable difficulty in separating "the wheat from the chaff," and have always hesitated to recommend any product for so touchy a skin problem. Certainly, so long as there was any possible doubt in my mind as to the merit of the product. This new preparation is a volatized sulphur cream which has been used by leading American and French skin specialists for many years.

BECAUSE of its scientific background, I was interested in making further investigation regarding it. I was particularly impressed by the fact that no claims are made to the effect that pimples will vanish "on a moment's notice," only that they will steadily fade from the skin if the cream is applied over a reasonable period of time. The length of time necessary for treatment naturally depends on the severity of the case. This cream is definitely not a cure-all for serious cases of acne, which belong in the province of the physician and skin specialist. It has, however, brought very definite results in a large percentage of acne cases.

As a rule, this cream is used at night, but as it is important to carry the treatment on during the day also, a special prescription powder containing the same curative properties in a milder form has been developed. The powder is, of course, to be used instead of ordinary make-up powder. It comes in two popular shades and is without odor. Both the cream and the powder are sold in a small purse size, so it is possible to start the treatments for a very low cost. I shall be very happy to send you the names of these products and where they may be obtained.

After all this shopping and discussion, I suppose you're "dead tired." Shopping does that to some people. The best thing I know for curing that tired feeling is a hot bath with a good dose of Epsom Salts dumped into the tub. You'll soak out all your aches. Then give yourself a grand shower of the finest, smoothest, most fragrant talcum you can find. (I have a free sample for you!) There is as much difference between talcum powders as there is between face powders, in case you didn't know it. Talcum powder is needed to absorb the moisture which even a good towel leaves on your skin, and more important, it is needed to give you that feeling of luxury without which no bath is complete. Now prop your feet on a pillow, shut your eyes for ten deep dark minutes, and dream of the sensation you're going to make tomorrow. If you have any problems that are troubling you, or you want further information about the things we discussed in our shopping tour, write me in the morning.

important step toward his present hundred thousand per picture was quitting his job with the J. Warren Kerrigan films, some fifteen years ago, because his daily wage was cut from five to three dollars. Lloyd signed up with Hal Roach the same day for five dollars a week, then worked up to a hundred per week with his "Lonesome Luke" characterizations. This is Lloyd's first picture in twelve years not produced by himself. He liked the story so much that he consented to do it for Paramount Pictures . . . Adolphe Menjou had his troubles during the filming of this picture, too. He had to chew gum every time the camera turned on him. Five to fifteen packages a day were consumed by the indomitable Adolphe, before he had the stomach attack which sent him to the hospital. Verree Teasdale, also working on this film, was so worried that she collapsed and was removed to the same hospital. Production was held up three weeks awaiting the return of the Menjous' health . . . Paramount found a use for that silver which is sloughed off film at the rate of three ounces for every 1000 feet. They painted the inside of milk bottles with it to resemble milk.

★★★★ Follow the Fleet
(RKO-Radio)

This latest Fred Astaire-Ginger Rogers musical measures up to the standards of "Roberta" and "Top Hat." The story is a routine business which falls into familiar patterns, but it snaps out of its lethargy whenever the two stars slip into their dancing shoes. As you probably have surmised from its title, the picture is concerned with the navy. By happy chance, two of its less illustrious members turn out to be Fred Astaire and Randolph Scott. Opposite them are Ginger Rogers and Harriet Hilliard, with Betty Grable hovering in the background as a first-class menace. At least two of the Astaire-Rogers dances are tops for comedy and class, the song numbers are effective, Harriet Hilliard is the new season's best screen possibility, and Lucille Ball does nicely in a minor role.

Pedestrians in front of the RKO Studios were amazed to see the hull of a ship blocking their way, projecting from the wall surrounding the studio lot. The battleship constructed for use on this picture was discovered, a bit too late, to be rather large for the lot. Nothing could be done but knock down some wall and continue the construction out in the street. The picture show, after all, must go on . . . 250 sailors, but the genuine article, were used in this film. Most of them were former gobs, while some were on vacation from different boats . . . The couples in the dime-a-dance sequence are the real thing, too. Dance director Hermes Pan decided it would be easier to pick up some good bowery dancers than train his own. So he hied himself down to a beach dance hall, watched the goings-on, and finally asked some of the best performers if they'd like to be in a picture with Astaire and Rogers. It took the rest of the night to convince them it was all straight goods. Thirteen couples were sent next day to the studio for trial, with the intention of choosing six or seven. But the eager faces on the girls and men, mostly dishwashers and waiters, was too much for Pan. He hired them all . . . Harriet Hilliard is RKO's Big News. This role is the result of sheer accident, since Mark Sandrich accidentally happened to see her screen test, taken for an inferior role. The astute gentleman promptly signed her for the second lead in this. Harriet's from Des Moines and her family are all stage people. Ozzie Nelson spotted her in a chorus, trained her singing voice, featured her with his orchestra and married her three days before her contract for celluloiders took effect. They're the delight of the United Airlines now, holding rendezvous in New York this week and Hollywood that.

★★★ Wife Versus Secretary
(M-G-M)

With names like Jean Harlow, Myrna Loy and Clark Gable to lure you to the box-office, it seems of little purpose to impart the information that the plot of the picture is contained entirely in its title, and that it offers no deviations from the age-old formula which Faith Baldwin and her readers have come to know and to love so well. Since there is nothing about the story that you haven't known for years, let's leave that department and report that the performances of the three stars are ingratiating, vigorous and attractive. No one need be told that Miss Loy portrays the wife in the proceedings, nor that the role of secretary falls to Miss Harlow. It is also hardly necessary to add that, while relations between Mr. Gable and his secretary are purely professional, people are talking. People are always talking, and Miss Loy's suspicions are aroused to such an extent that she leaves Mr. Gable, until a few words of warning from Miss Harlow send her scurrying back. As a matter of fact, choosing between Loy and Harlow would be a problem even for a man of Mr. Gable's discernment, since Myrna is her most charming screen self and the brownette Jean is lovelier than any secretary has a right to be.

★★★ The Country Doctor

This is, as you probably know, the first full-length film to feature those amazing young ladies from Canada, the Dionne Quintuplets. In their initial starring picture these five ravishing beauties prove themselves more charming before a camera than many of their more experienced fellow artists from Hollywood. Each of the gals is a diminutive Duse in her own right, a miniature picture stealer, a screen siren and a wow. Our personal choice for the Academy Award is Cecile, who seems to have a curl or two and a smile or two more than her sisters, but in the case of five such lovely little ladies it is perhaps more discreet to state that each of them is the French-Canadian word for terrific. In the supporting cast Jean Hersholt as Dr. Dafoe performs with a simplicity and a sincerity which places him next to the Dionnes in the acting department. No doubt everyone who sees the picture will envy him the scene in which he is the center of attention of all five of them. As for the story itself, the less said of it the better. You won't notice it, anyway; you'll be looking at the quints.

One of the season's better pictures, "These Three," with Merle Oberon and Miriam Hopkins.

★★ Next Time We Love
(Universal)

An elaborate production and two excellent performances cover up an artificial and inconsequential story sufficiently to make this an interesting photoplay. Ursula Parrott's tale of a young married couple and their careers is much too familiar to bear retelling, but Margaret Sullavan and James Stewart succeed in making the conflict of the pair seem much more important than it actually is. La Sullavan is an actress, Stewart is a newspaperman and all is serene in their married life until his paper transfers him to Rome. Margaret chooses to remain in New York to further her career on the stage. Later Stewart returns, without a job, to find her at the top of her profession. Love takes a holiday, and the young husband goes to Russia, where the picture ends on a note of promise that in some future world their romance will be given a better chance to flower. Sullavan's performance is up to her standard, and young Mr. Stewart is the first screen reporter we've seen who actually looks and acts like a newspaperman. Robert McWade is especially effective in a supporting role, as is Ray Milland in the second lead.

"One newspaper office in a movie without a flaw" was the boast of Director Edward Griffith, himself a former news-sleuth, concerning the elaborate editorial room set on this picture. Denny Morrison, long a foreign correspondent, was technical adviser and all thirty "extras" used in the scene were newspapermen, out of work at the present . . . James Stewart had to be asked four times to play the lead opposite Margaret Sullavan in this picture. And he's only been in two other pictures in his life, "Murder Man" and "Rose Marie." Nope, not conceit—he just didn't believe the telegrams sent him from the studio to Lake Tahoe where he was vacationing. Stewart has had little stage experience, having just recently graduated from Princeton. But what he's had has been top-notch. He was stage manager for "Camille" for Jane Cowl, played in "Goodbye Again" on Broadway and had small roles in other Broadway plays. With this picture, he reached stardom, which is going some in a short time . . . Anna Demetrio is one of Hollywood's favorites. She's a leading character woman, specializing in portraying Italian women, and has appeared in too many pictures to even begin remembering. Born in Italy, she was educated in a convent, but always harbored the desire to go on the stage. The opportunity came to take a trip to New York; she signed up with the Morosco Company for a paltry sum, proved her worth and has made a comfortable living ever since . . . Ray Milland isn't quite an American citizen, but he intends to be, having taken out his first papers. Born in Wales, he realized a long-felt desire to go to sea when he was eighteen. From sailor on a potato boat to dancer in a London musical show is somewhat of a change, but that's where he landed in less than a year.

★★★ The Prisoner of Shark Island (20th Century-Fox)

John Ford, who directed "The Informer," has another pictorial triumph in "The Prisoner of Shark Island." It's the story of Dr. Samuel Mudd, a country doctor who was accused of setting the broken leg of John Wilkes Booth, Lincoln's assassin, and was sentenced to life imprisonment on an American Devil's Island off the coast of Florida. After an attempted escape is thwarted, Dr. Mudd becomes a hero by ridding the prison island of a siege of yellow fever and receiving, for his bravery, a pardon from the government. Several scenes in the picture are as grippingly dramatic as anything you'll see all season, and Mr. Ford's camera never once loses its eye for beauty and composition. In the title role, Warner Baxter turns in one of his finest screen performances; Gloria Stuart is lovely and capable as his wife; Claude Gillingwater stands out as an irate old southern gentleman, and a young man named John Carradine is the year's meanest menace.

This is one of the four-million-dollar productions which Darryl F. Zanuck is contributing to the current craze for epics. Mr. Z. picked the idea out of a paragraph in "Time" and turned the whole thing over to Nunnally Johnson to scenarize. The story is basically historical, for Mudd was actually sentenced to Shark Island, otherwise known as Fort Jefferson . . . John Ford, director, has the enviable reputation of never having made a bad picture in his twenty years' experience. He prefers to regard himself as a comedy director, and resents the prevailing feeling that he is exceedingly good at making tragedy entertaining. Ford is extremely nervous during production, but the legend about his chewing up forty handkerchiefs per week on the set is not founded on fact. It's just a measly twenty.

★★★★ These Three (Samuel Goldwyn)

When Samuel Goldwyn purchased rights to the Broadway smash hit, "The Children's Hour," there was considerable eyebrow raising and wondering how its dangerous theme could be handled by the most sanctimonious of dramatic media, the screen. It is to Mr. Goldwyn's credit that he hired Lillian Hellman, who wrote the play, to adapt it for the films. Miss Hellman has written a fine, intelligent script, and Director William Wyler brings to the screen a vigorous and powerful photoplay which should certainly rank among the year's Ten Best. Dropping the homosexual theme of the play, the author has built her story around the love of two women for a man, and a schoolgirl's malicious lie which almost wrecks three lives. In the principal adult roles, Merle Oberon, Joel McCrea and Miriam Hopkins deliver the finest performances of their careers. And Bonita Granville, as the young villainess, and Marcia Mae Jones, as her frightened schoolmate, are superb in the two most difficult characterizations in the picture. In supporting roles, Catherine Doucet and Margaret Hamilton are outstanding. "These Three," in a word or two, is truly a dramatic event and one of the finest screenplays you'll see all season.

It's cheaper to build a city than to bother going there, according to the conservative Sam Goldwyn. So he had the whole New England town of "Lancet" built on the outskirts of Hollywood. Although the expense of sending a hundred players, technicians and crew members for a two-month's location trip to a real New England town would have cost considerably less than building a town of his own, Goldwyn's civic spirit could not be denied. Richard Day, designer of all the Goldwyn sets, commissioned a Boston photographer to obtain hundreds of pictures of typical New England homes and other structures. Then with a site chosen in Santa Monica canyon, Day launched the building of the city. For five weeks a crew of three hundred carpenters, bricklayers, masons and other technicians constructed the town. After the necessary "shots" had been completed the town was "struck"—in studio lingo that means the place was wrecked in one fell swoop, except for two of the homes which were needed for interior scenes. These were carefully taken apart, each board and brick individually marked, brought to the studio and there, on one of the giant sound stages, put together again exactly as they had been before. All "inside" scenes were then made right in the studio in the same buildings that had recently stood some fifty miles away.

★★★ Colleen (Warners)

Here is the latest in the Dick Powell-Ruby Keeler series, which makes it needless to report that "Colleen" is a musical film with songs by Mr. Powell and dances by Miss Keeler. In addition to that, due to the fortunate presence of three of the screen's better comics, "Colleen" is funny. Since the picture will probably owe its success to its lighter moments, let us come right out and say that the three responsible for those moments are Hugh Herbert, Joan Blondell and Jack Oakie. Herbert portrays an eccentric millionaire whose hobbies are dictaphones and Miss Blondell. Head of a large corporation, he knows nothing about the business, but he likes to come to the office so he can play flute solos into the dictaphone. Oakie and Blondell are close seconds in the comedy department, and their song-and-dance burlesque is one of the funniest sequences the screen has offered in months. It's a number called "Boulevardier from the Bronx," and it's high-class kidding. In the romance division, Dick Powell sings ingratiatingly and Ruby Keeler proves that she still ranks with the best of the screen's dancers. Her partner, Paul Draper, is a brilliant companion in the dances.

The average girl can dance the average man to death, according to Bobby Connelly, who created the dance numbers for this one. So he rehearsed 120 men as prospective partners for the hundred girls, and sure enough 18 of the stronger sex folded up after a few days' exertion. After years of experience in stage and screen dancing, Bobby found that men can seldom take it . . . Those flying fish didn't come from cans. They're the real thing, caught off Catalina Islands and transported to the sound-stage "ocean" of salt-water on the studio set. Artificial waves made by electric fans and brilliant searchlights caused the fish to flit around. The music was recorded to fit the rhythm of their light fantastics.

★★ Little Lord Fauntleroy
(United Artists)

Back in the days when silence was golden, Mary Pickford put her hair in curlers, donned velvet pants and delighted her breathless public with a saccharine and highly profitable version of Frances Hodgson Burnett's familiar tome. Time marches on, and now it's Freddie Bartholomew—Little Lord Bartholomew, to be exact—who steps into the role. Although his hair is uncurled and his pants are not of velvet, young Mr. B. succeeds in making Fauntleroy the sweetest and the most annoying little boy the screen has ever known. As we recall the story, the Brooklyn lad who becomes Lord Fauntleroy is, despite his fancy garments, sort of a regular guy underneath it all. There is a certain smugness about Master Bartholomew's portrayal, which, although it may make him the darling of the dowagers in the audience, will certainly win him no friends among the younger element. He's the kind of kid you used to throw mud balls at in the days when you were young and your aim was good. All of which makes "Little Lord Fauntleroy" an unexciting portrait of a very young man who is simply too sweet to be true. On the credit side the photography is excellent and there are outstanding performances by C. Aubrey Smith and Dolores Costello Barrymore.

Five generations of theatrical life were represented by the main players on this picture, from Constance Collier who has been on the stage for fifty years to Freddie Bartholomew, the newest comer. C. Aubrey Smith, who has just passed his seventy-fifth birthday, looked with a great deal of tolerance on Guy Kibbee, Henry Stephenson and others. Henry Stephenson never appeared on a stage until 1896, while Guy is a comparative newcomer of only forty years' experience . . . The interior set of Doningsford Castle was a day's sight-seeing job out at M-G-M. It was one of the largest unit sets ever constructed at the studio, and required a total number of "props" which far exceeded anything in recent years. 8500 books alone were rounded up to fill the library shelves. Guy Kibbee's only complaint while on the set between shots was that he had nothing to read . . . This marks the return of Dolores Costello Barrymore to films after several years of being wife and mother, exclusively. Freddie Bartholomew was so enamored of Dolores that he could hardly let her out of his sight and thought she was by far the nicest screen mama he's had.

Weak, Rundown Nervous, Skinny Folks!

Without Cost—Make this Amazing IODINE TEST!

Within 1 Week Sea Plant IODINE in Kelpamalt Must Give You Tireless Energy, Strong Nerves, Pounds of "Stay-There" Flesh or the Trial is FREE. . . . It Costs You Nothing!

Kelpamalt, the new mineral concentrate from the sea, gets right down and corrects the real underlying cause of weakness, skinniness and nervous rundown conditions . . . IODINE STARVED GLANDS. When these glands don't work properly, all the food in the world can't help you. It just isn't turned into flesh. The result is, you stay weak and nervous, tired out and skinny.

The most important gland—the one which actually controls the body weight—needs a definite ration of iodine all the time—NATURAL ASSIMILABLE IODINE—not to be confused with chemical iodides which often prove toxic. Only when the system gets an adequate supply of iodine can you regulate metabolism—the body's process of converting digested foods into firm flesh, new strength and energy.

To get this vital mineral in convenient concentrated and assimilable form, take Kelpamalt—now recognized as the world's richest source of this precious substance. It contains 1300 times more iodine than oysters, once considered the best source. 6 tablets alone contain more NATURAL IODINE than 486 lbs. of spinach or 1387 lbs. of lettuce.

Make this test with Kelpamalt. First weigh yourself and see how long you can work or how far you can walk without tiring. Then take 3 Kelpamalt Tablets with each meal for 1 week and again weigh yourself and notice how much longer you can work without tiring, how much farther you can walk. Notice how much better you feel, sleep and eat. Watch flattering extra lbs. appear in place of scrawny hollows. And if you don't gain 5 lbs this very first week the trial is free. 100 jumbo size Kelpamalt tablets—four to five times the size of ordinary tablets—cost but a few cents a day to use. Laura Hope Crews in the leads; and in the third place it's all so completely ridiculous in the first place. Mr. Horton, his wife, Peggy Conklin, and his mother-in-law, Elizabeth Patterson, are just a Big Happy Family, until Edward loses his job. Then Aunt Min, Laura Hope Crews, appears on the scene. She's never liked her niece's husband, anyhow, and the fact that she has never met him doesn't cause her to like him any better. So she whisks her niece away with her, and prevails upon the jobless husband, whom she believes to be a servant in the house, to leave his worthless employer and work for her. It all sounds complicated, no doubt, but you have no idea how much, much more complicated the situation becomes. Miss Crews walks off with chief honors, and that's no small job with such competition as Mr. Horton and the rest of the able cast. Elizabeth Patterson is excellent and so, in a less important role, is Grant Mitchell. And we're willing to see Peggy Conklin anytime, anywhere, anyhow.

★★ The Trail of the Lonesome Pine (Paramount)

This is the motion picture industry's second major experiment with color in talking pictures, and it can be reported that it is much superior, technically, to its predecessor, "Becky Sharp." The colors are softer and more subdued, and faces have warmth and a certain depth. But, as far as this reviewer is concerned, natural color still remains to be achieved. Color, after all, is an exaggeration, and despite the beauty of several of the outdoor scenes one feels that there is more grandeur, and certainly more truth, in a black and white shot. Getting on to the cast, there are Sylvia Sidney, Fred MacMurray, Henry Fonda, Fred Stone, Beulah Bondi, Nigel Bruce and Spanky MacFarland, all of whom put up a brave battle against a tale that's as old as them thar hills themselves.

Walter Wanger spent over a year searching for the perfect story for color photography. Not that the color medium is for just a certain type of story, but he realized that color photography was not established in the public mind as a natural medium, therefore the story must outweigh the novelty. Sound pictures went through this stage, when the public went to the theatre to hear, rather than see, the picture, and did not expect any emotional impression. Since 80 per cent of this story is in the woods and mountains, nature could furnish her own colors. Then Wanger proceeded to concentrate on keeping color out of the picture. All the costumes for the players were done in neutral tones—dark blues, greys, browns. Except for the harmonious colorings in trees, hills and grass, other bright spots were thrown out, even to the uprooting of bright flowers on some of the sets. Thus by "throwing color away" the attention of the audience is focussed on the dramatic action of the picture . . . Make-up requirements are entirely different from the black-and-white picture. Grease-paint was never used, eye-shadow, heavy powders and lip rouges were also discarded. A light film of powder to dull the shine of lights on the players' faces was the only make-up used.

★★ Boulder Dam (Warners)

The "sets" alone on this picture are worth your time and money. For the first time, without wincing, we can describe them as colossal, magnificent and stupendous. The photography of Boulder Dam is sheer beauty in some instances and all scenes of the construction are interesting. And oh, yes! the story. Well, it's a nice little yarn that doesn't seriously interfere with the sights. Ross Alexander turns out to be the hero, though when we first meet him he has just murdered his boss. He's obsessed with the futility-of-it-all when he meets Patricia Ellis. Now Pat's papa happens to be construction boss on the Dam, so Ross finds himself with a job, much against his wishes. Of course, that's before he spots the love light in the Ellis orbs. From then on Ross is inspired to dig the whole ditch himself. Here's where Lyle Talbot steps in, since the course of true love never runs smoothly in the movies, either. Lyle cares too much about Pat and knows too much about Ross. There's considerable excitement before the fade-out. Patricia Ellis is likable, while Ross Alexander and Lyle Talbot do well in their roles.

★★ Tough Guy (M-G-M)

Here is a good old dog opera with all the same, reliable trimmings, and some new ones thrown in to give it an air of modernity. The villains this time are present-day gangsters, and the hero is Rin Tin Tin, Jr. The dog does some really remarkable stunts, and it is unfortunate that the credulity of the audience is strained at times to the giggling point by some obviously faked feats which, naturally, diminish the strength of the story and the dog's authentic work and his undeniable intelligence. Jackie Cooper is the boy who runs away from home because his father won't let him keep his dog, and hitchhikes his way right into the gangsters' nefarious doings. Joseph Calleia, the head gangster, accidentally wounds the dog, whereupon the diamond under the rough shines through and he finally dies protecting the boy and his canine pal. Mr. Calleia gives a thoroughly human and intriguing performance as the ruthless killer whose one weak point in his lawless armor—his love for the boy and his dog—finally costs him his life. Jackie Cooper's role fits him like a glove, and nowhere in the performance of Rin Tin Tin, Jr., could we find, shall we say, a faux paw.

Gene Raymond and Wendy Barrie in "Don't Bet on Love."

Preview Postscripts

This is Rin Tin Tin, Jr.'s first important picture. He has played in several small roles, but his owner, Lee Doncan, has reserved the dog's talents for this first big chance. Doncan, of course, was the owner of Rin Tin Tin, the first. He brought the puppy with him from Europe after the war. He fell for the canine while he was passing the window of a London pet shop. It was no easy matter, either, to get his pal into this country . . . Chester Franklin also directed all the older dog's pictures and now wields the megaphone on this one. Producer Harry Rapf is another from the former dog-days, as is Jean Hersholt.

★★ Every Saturday Night

Whether things are going so smoothly at home that you're bored with it all, or the family quota on trouble has hit a new high, we can recommend this picture to you. You'll be reassured about that institution, the American Family. This story strikes the happiest medium we've seen to date on home life, with Jed Prouty and Spring Byington portraying Mr. and Mrs. There's a gang of children; we're not just sure how many but among them are June Lang, Kenneth Howell, George Ernest, June Carlson and William Mahon. Then there's Gramma, played by Florence Roberts in a noteworthy manner. You will be surprised how absorbing the antics of a family on a Saturday night can be, taken from an objective standpoint. There's grief and hilarity, bickering and affection, affectations and sincerity. There's plenty of misunderstanding, too, but through it all runs the loyalty of the family. George Ernest shines the brightest as the practical member of the family, who can always be relied upon for the loan of a nickel—with interest. This is the first of a series of pictures made by this studio called "Our American Family."

It was no fun rounding up a group of actors and actresses for this series of pictures. Casting is hard enough at best, but when it's a matter of finding a family resemblance between the players, that's when real trouble sets in. Hundreds of applicants were interviewed, most of them children, but the cast was not definitely set until two days before the picture went into production. The final seal of approval on the selection came from Cameraman Joe August. He discovered that the faces of all selected required the same type of lighting . . . Jed Prouty is beginning his second fifty years in theatrical work with this role. He made his debut in Boston in 1885, and was well known on the New York stage when he signed a movie contract in 1921. He was cast in the first "Broadway Melody" some six years ago. It was a role which required him to stutter, and so convincing was the Prouty stutter that it has taken Hollywood a half dozen years to realize that he can talk straight. In the meantime, he's been "shelved" except for minor roles.

Booth Tarkington's familiar and homely story proves a natural for Jane Withers. You'll like her better than ever in this picture. She doesn't have time for any of those "cute" song-and-dance numbers. Jane is too busy being just herself—an energetic, likable, not too good-tempered small girl. "Gentle Julia," exceptionally well played by Marsha Hunt, is Jane's aunt and the most persistently pursued young lady in town. Tom Brown is the bashful swain for whom you'll be rooting, though Julia is enamored of George Meeker, as slick a city slicker as ever strolled up Main Street. She is also susceptible to the charms of his Gay Nineties flivver, which is the first one to appear in the countryside. Certainly there's nothing about the plot to recommend this as an entertaining tale, but every amusing episode is capped by a still funnier one. The climax comes with a thrilling rescue of Julia just before she says "I do" to George Meeker. Jane and Tom Brown come dashing up in a fish-wagon at the crucial moment, followed by all the town folks in shays, surreys and buckboards. The screen version has destroyed none of the charm of the original story, and you won't be able to find fault with a single member of the cast.

"Song and Dance Man," featuring Paul Kelly and Claire Trevor, two promising players.

(20th Century-Fox)

The teaming of George Raft and Rosalind Russell is not a particularly happy arrangement, despite the fact that Mr. Raft's performance is a vigorous one and Miss Russell is as charming and aristocratic as the script allows her to be. Regardless of what the scenario writers may think, and in spite of the title Raft and Russell just don't seem meant for each other. As an immigrant lad who comes to America full of ambition, George does all right for himself when, by a fortunate chain of circumstances, he becomes a political big shot and the right hand of the mayor of New York. All of this happens within the brief course of a year or so, and such a meteoric rise would appease the ambitions of most men, but George has his heart set on a higher goal. He wants Miss Russell to become Mrs. R. The charming Rosalind, as it turns out, is actually in love with George, but their romance is complicated by the fact that she already has a husband. As you can imagine, this situation exists only temporarily, and true love—the love of a haughty socialite for an immigrant boy who made good—asserts itself. As has been mentioned, both Mr. Raft and Miss Russell give creditable performances, but one has the feeling that "It Had to Happen" could never happen outside of the movies. In supporting roles, Leo Carrillo turns on his accent with nice effect, and Arline Judge capably handles a comedy role.

Four major studios contributed towards the success of this picture. At least they loaned their players—George Raft from Paramount, Rosalind Russell from M-G-M, Leo Carrillo from Columbia and Alan Dinehart from Universal . . . George Raft really made sacrifices for the sake of art this time. He relinquished all the sartorial perfection so dear to his heart and broke down to the extent of donning ditch-diggers' ensembles. And the Raft lad isn't always in the habit of making sacrifices. Not even for Carole Lombard. He flounced off her set at Paramount recently because the cameraman gave more attention to Carole's facial angles than to his.

★★ The Voice of Bugle Ann
(M-G-M)

A tale of hound dogs and tarnation varmints down in old Missouri, this is unrelieved melodrama of the old school, the sort of thing they used to like back in the days when "The Drunkard" and "Ten Nights in a Barroom" were considered powerful stuff. It seems that good old Lionel Barrymore, who claims a man's best friend is his hound dog, has bred a particular animal whose howl is as clear as a bugle. So he names her Bugle Ann and she leads the pack in pursuing the weary fox over hill and down dale while Lionel and his son, Eric Linden, and their friends sit by a warm fire extolling the pleasures of the hunt. Into this bucolic paradise comes the tarnation varmint, a mean critter in spite of the fact that he's Maureen O'Sullivan's pappy. This varmint puts up a wire fence around his property, expressly to keep out hound dogs. When Bugle Ann is missed one night Lionel calls on the mean varmint and quietly murders him. In court he gives an impassioned and homespun plea about the nobility of dogs, and the court gives him twenty years. But Maureen, who's in love with young Mr. Linden, says a few words to the governor, and Lionel is pardoned. All of which proves that the governor is no movie critic.

Most of this film was taken in Jackson County, Missouri. Four weeks were spent in that part of the country by the cast and crew. The entire company succumbed to the Missouri charms. Not that one of them admitted it could even touch California for natural scenery, but it was "swell for a change"—which is treason enough . . . Tom Bash, Kansas City sheriff, was the owner of the forty-four fox-hounds used, and genuine Missouri hounds they were. On the completion of the picture he made presents of the dogs to various people who had admired them. Clark Gable rated two, Wally Beery two, Jean Harlow one, Spencer Tracy and Ted Healy came off with three apiece, while Director Richard Thorpe was presented with fifteen of them. All in all, there's a new pooch fashion in Hollywood these days.

★★★ Desire (Paramount)

If you need more than one good reason to drag you to a show, there are four in Marlene Dietrich's new picture. Count 'em: an amusing, imaginative, exciting story; direction by Frank Borzage that is up to his standard of excellence, which is high praise, indeed; photography that is beautifully courteous to the physical and aesthetic eye; and enlivened, ingratiating performances by Dietrich, Gary Cooper, Alan Mowbray and John Halliday. Miss Dietrich, in a series of extraordinary gowns that appears to be never-ending, plays the part of a "crookess" who gets away with the most valuable pearl necklace in all Paris and who has every intention of continuing her career . . . until she meets an upright, charming young American engineer who sweeps her off her feet and onto the straight and narrow path. John Halliday is perfectly cast as the brains behind her light-fingered activities. Alan Mowbray is a psychiatrist who unwittingly aids her in escaping with the necklace. Dietrich and Cooper work well together, both showing unusual animation.

★★ Love Before Breakfast
(Universal)

Belonging to that ultra-modern school of screen drama in which the intensity of the love that exists between the two principals is gauged by the vigorousness of their verbal assault on each other, this is another pseudo-smart film patterned after the fashion of "The Bride Comes Home." In other words, it's pretty to look at, but there's not much to see. In it you'll discover Preston Foster as the screen's most overbearing millionaire, who exercises his vociferous charms on Carole Lombard in an effort to wrest her heart from Cesar Romero. Mr. R. is employed by an oil company. Preston buys the concern and transfers Cesar to Japan. Any right-thinking gal would walk out on the guy at that point, but Carole allows him to pester her with attentions until the moment comes when she finds herself in love with him. She conceals it, in the accepted screen manner of the moment, by shouting insults at him. He proves his devotion by blackening her eye. By that time we all know that poor Cesar hasn't the ghost of a chance, for he has never laid a hand on her except in gentle caress. There are moments of good light comedy in the picture, and in those moments Miss Lombard is at her best. Both Mr. Foster and Mr. Romero turn in highly creditable performances, and Janet Beecher and Betty Lawford are attractive and helpful in supporting roles.

A little number from the "show must go on" school, this is one of those pictures you run across on the other half of double feature bills. Originally a George M. Cohan stage success, the celluloid version has, unfortunately, been almost completely de-Cohanized. In it you'll find Paul Kelly and Claire Trevor playing a pair of vaudeville hoofers down on their luck until Claire is befriended by Michael Whalen, a Broadway playboy who has an eye for talent. He gets her a spot in a musical show, but there's no room for Kelly. Claire refuses to take the job without her partner, so Paul, burdened with grief and some of the season's most inept dialogue, puts on a drunk act and tells her he's through with her. It's that sort of a picture. The shapely Miss Trevor is pleasant to look upon, and Mr. Kelly is as good as his material allows him to be. In lesser roles, James Burke and Ruth Donnelly do what they can with your old friends, the dumb detective and the object of his affections. A young lady named Helen Troy has plenty to say as a gabby switchboard operator, and some of the things they have given her to say are excellent examples of bad taste.

Michael Whalen was discovered by Darryl Zanuck when he was down to his last 27 cents. That is, Michael was, and playing in a Little Theatre Group in Hollywood on an empty stomach. Claims now that living on lentil soup and oranges was well worth it . . . The woman who does the singing over the telephone in the boarding house hallway scene is Irene Franklin, familiar to many as a musical comedy star in the days before boop-boop-a-doop . . . Margaret Dumont's career has included stage experience in New York and abroad, concert work, considerable socialiting, some acting with George M. Cohan and on both stage and screen she's been the foil of the Marx Brothers . . . Paul Kelly made two discoveries while making this picture. He can dance and he can sing. Paul's another oldtimer, though still a youngish man. He started in flickers in the Vitagraph days, for his family lived across the street from the studio in Flatbush and the "moving pitcher folks" used to come over and borrow the Kelly furniture occasionally for one-reel thrillers. That vacant stare in the Kelly orbs which the camera highlights now and then isn't caused by the strain of being a song-and-dance man. It's caused by the Kelly day dreams for a new home in the San Fernando Valley, which is going to contain everything he's always wanted in life—including a croquet lawn.

Chester Morris, Lewis Stone and Walter Brennan in the M-G-M film, "Three Godfathers."

★★ Three Godfathers
(M-G-M)

There's not a buck in a broncho in this westerner. Instead we have three bad men regenerated by a babe. Sounds like a stiff dose to swallow, but surprisingly enough it's good movie fare. There are opportunities for good laughs and some tears, too, if you care for that sort of thing. Lewis Stone, Chester Morris and Walter Brennan are the three meanies who shoot up a bank and a few bankers, then set out across the desert to spend their hard-earned cash. Enroute they find a dying mother who leaves her child in their care. When their horses wander off, the men are faced with the problem of continuing across the sands loaded with money bags, a baby and one canteen, practically empty. In spite of the choice desert scenery, the outlook is pretty dreary.

Lewis Stone's portrayal of the philosophic baddie is as fine a bit of acting as you've seen from this capable actor. Brennan is excellent as the second of the trio to die in order that the child may live. That Chester Morris's characterization does not ring so true is due to the script and not Mr. M. It falls to his lot to stagger into the town, stumble to the church and stutter out the story, prior to falling dead at the altar. The picture is redeemed from pure mellerdrammer, by an intelligently selected cast who make the tale believable. And the photography is tops.

(20th Century-Fox)

The apt title on this one really should rate four stars by itself. We can't remember when the unreeling of a strip of celluloid has caused us so much trouble. Even such swell people as Paul Kelly and Arline Judge couldn't relieve our anguish. On the contrary, putting them into such a tale caused more writhings. The so-called plot has to do with jewel thieving on the high seas. It all takes place afloat a luxury liner, with much English accenting on A deck and considerable sweating and swearing below. Paul Kelly is demoted to the engine rooms just in time to stage a heroic rescue of the ship from explosion. This is no surprise to Arline Judge, the ship's manicurist, who knows Mr. Kelly is a good guy. But Mona Barrie, sassiety

"3 MINUTES AT NIGHT KEEPS ME RIGHT"

I used to take jolting "all-at-once" cathartics—because I thought I had to. But now I've found the three-minute way. And what a difference it makes. At the first sign of trouble, I chew FEEN-A-MINT, the chewing-gum laxative, for three minutes; and the next morning I feel like a new person. And, best of all, with FEEN-A-MINT there are no griping pains—no nausea—no unpleasant after-effects. It's easy, pleasant, and thoroughly satisfactory. Children love its delicious chewing-gum flavor. 15c and 25c a box.

THE CHEWING-GUM LAXATIVE

MANY NEVER SUSPECT CAUSE OF BACKACHES

This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief Of Pain

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.
The kidneys are one of Nature's chief ways of taking the acids and waste out of the blood. If they don't pass 3 pints a day and so get rid of more than 3 pounds of waste matter, your 15 miles of kidney tubes may need flushing.
If you have trouble with frequent bladder passages with scanty amount which often smart and burn, the 15 miles of kidney tubes may need flushing out. This danger signal may be the beginning of nagging backache, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes and dizziness.
Don't wait for serious trouble. Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills — used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help flush out the 15 miles of kidney tubes. Get Doan's Pills.

"The Music Goes 'Round" with Rochelle Hudson and Harry Richman in leading roles.

stuff, is sufficiently impressed to make a play for the hero. Her intentions, though we regret to say it, are strictly dishonorable for she would use him as an unsuspecting accomplice in a jewel robbery. But for the intervention of Arline and an astute monkey—yes, we said monkey—the worst would have happened.

★★★ Preview Murder Mystery (Paramount)

If Aunt Mamie didn't have a friend who had a friend who knew a man who could get her past a studio gateman when she visited Hollywood last summer, she can see this picture and be taken on a Cook's tour of the Paramount Studio. There is scarcely a nook or cranny of the entire studio that isn't shown on the screen in this original offering, which shows a picture made and previewed within the main picture. Rod LaRocque, who is co-starred with Gail Patrick in the picture which you see made, has received anonymous threats that he will never live to see his picture previewed. A novel effect is introduced when you see him watching his own picture on the screen and, as the last scene fades out, slumped in his seat —dead. Rod LaRocque brings his old charm to the screen and you wish he hadn't been murdered so early in the picture—but perhaps the murderer heard him sing! Reginald Denny is very likable and Frances Drake, who solves all her problems by the aid of astrology, has never been seen to better advantage. In addition, you will see many of your old favorites, including Ian Keith, Conway Tearle, Bryant Washburn, Jack Mulhall, Franklyn Farnum, Chester Conklin and Hank Mann.

★★ Love on a Bet (RKO-Radio)

There's neither rhyme nor reason to this celluloider. The result is a picture which can only be classified as a lot of fun. Gene Raymond starts the laughs by making a bet with his uncle that he can leave New York, clad only in his underwear, and make Los Angeles within a fortnight. Enroute he must collect a suit of clothes, one hundred dollars in cold cash and a sweetheart, or return to uncle's meat packing plant for the rest of his days. The plot, you can see, is not without possibilities, and complications are plentiful. Chief among the latter are Wendy Barrie and her aunt, Helen Broderick, who are also heading for the coast. Wendy Barrie adds much to the cross-country scenery, but Miss Broderick steals the show.

★ The Music Goes 'Round (Columbia)

The studio paid a handsome price for this title, so try to overlook it. The picture can almost be classed as entertainment, in spite of it, with Harry Richman proving a fair screen bet. Primarily a musical, the plot centers about a show-boat troupe which Richman, a stage star, brings to the Great White Way. Walter Connolly is the leader of the troupe, Rochelle Hudson is his daughter, and Henry Mollison is the show's leading man. Etienne Girardot, Victor Kilian and Dora Early are also among the emoters who are taken for a swell ride on Broadway, where they fondly believe their histrionic gifts will be regarded as Art. Giving Broadway its biggest laugh in years almost costs the Richman lad his gal, which somewhat thickens the thinning plot. The best thing about the picture is Walter Connolly's characterization of the old-time mellerdramatist. Rochelle Hudson is proving prettier and more capable with every role, so you'll like her. And perhaps you'll like some of the song numbers. But on the whole, you will find that this celluloider just misses being either a good musical or a good story.

★ F Man (Paramount)

This is a harmless little satire on the G-men films, lacking, however, the power to stir an audience either to the heights of hilarity or the depths of boredom. With the exception of a few really amusing scenes, it ambles vaguely along, claiming safety in a middle path between the two extremes—and therefore it is somewhat unimpressive. Jack Haley is a vacuous young man from a small town, whose substitution for brains is an overwhelming, all-absorbing desire to be a G-man. He goes to the Big City—this time Los Angeles—and spends the time when he is not jerking sodas in pestering William Frawley to give him a job as a G-man. Frawley, in final and complete desperation, tells him that he can be an F-man, and that his job is to keep his eyes and ears open, his mouth shut, and that he is never, under any circumstances, to come near the department. How he almost loses his girl and his life, and how he almost thwarts the capture of Public Enemy No. 1, comprise the balance of this tale. Adrienne Marden is the small-town sweetheart who comes to Los Angeles to help Haley capture criminals. Grace Bradley plays the part of Mrs. Public Enemy No. 1, and Onslow Stevens is the gangster

$60,000.00 IN CASH PRIZES

ENTER SELECTION SWEEPSTAKES TO LEGALIZE LOTTERIES!

3 MINUTES TIME MAY BRING YOU $20,000.00 IT'S EASY—NOTHING TO WRITE!

Think what you could do with so much cash! Buy a home . . . travel wherever you wish . . . have an assured income for the rest of your life . . . start in business for yourself . . . enjoy life with all the fine clothes and good times you want! Here is your big opportunity. Someone will win $20,000.00 in this Selection Sweepstakes . . . someone will win $10,000.00 . . . someone will get $5,000.00 . . . and there'll be over 280 other big cash prizes. All this money is going to somebody — and it might as well be you!

WHO'S BEHIND THIS?

This great Selection Sweepstakes is sponsored by the National Conference on Legalizing Lotteries of which the nationally-known society leader and humanitarian, Mrs. Oliver Harriman, is President — a National Organization for a National Cause. It is being conducted in order to secure additional members to aid in legalizing lotteries; to familiarize the American public with the aims of the movement; and to obtain the judgment of its members on the best uses for lotteries if legalized in this country.

The National Conference on Legalizing Lotteries has the support of many of the most influential men and women — names you respect and honor — an absolute guarantee of the integrity of this "sweepstakes". If it's good for them, it's certainly good for you. Remember, when you join them you not only give yourself a chance to win BIG MONEY but you also help a great, important national movement.

WHAT LOTTERIES HAVE DONE!

France adopted a lottery to reduce its national debt; Italy to build railroads; Denmark to advance art and music; Holland to advance the sciences; Ireland to finance the building of hospitals; Spain for charitable institutions; Germany to finance public improvements, etc. England used to support its navy by public lotteries; early American colonies permitted lotteries to build schools, churches, and public works and improvements, such as canals, bridges, roads, etc. The Revolutionary War was in part financed with the proceeds of lotteries. Early buildings of Yale, Columbia and Harvard were built with the proceeds of lotteries.

HOW YOU ENTER!

It costs you only a dollar to become a member — and your dollar contribution entitles you to enter this entirely legal "sweepstakes" contest.

Here is all you have to do to be officially entered:

1. On the entry blank are listed 16 ways in which the money raised by legalized lotteries might be used. Everybody has an opinion as to which are the best ways. Simply indicate your opinion by writing the numbers 1 to 16 in the squares—No. 1 after what you think the best way, No. 2 after the second best, and so on until you have a number in each square. We suggest before you do this, however, that you read again the paragraph above which tells how legalized lotteries have been used before for the public welfare.
2. Print your name and address plainly on the coupon.
3. Mail the entry blank and coupon together with $1 membership fee.

The entries which, in the opinion of the judges, list in the best order of importance the ways of using money raised by lotteries will be awarded the big cash prizes.

Within 10 days you will be sent your own membership certificate and acknowledgment of your entry.

ABSOLUTELY LEGAL!

Don't confuse this Selection Sweepstakes with any other kind of contest. It is sponsored by a national non-profit-making organization—an honest contest and "sweepstakes" honestly conducted. This is a contest of judgment and skill, not of chance. You don't have to write any letter or essay. You certainly can form an opinion as to how the money raised by legal lotteries should be used. Your judgment is just as good as anyone else's . . . you have just as great a chance to win as anyone. But you can't win if you don't enter.

DON'T DELAY!

Fill out the entry blank and coupon and mail them now with your dollar membership fee. Don't put it off until tomorrow — you may forget.

Think what you could do with $20,000—more than most people save in a lifetime. Someone will get it for just a few strokes of a pen. Remember that there are over 285 cash prizes . . . over 285 chances for you to win.

Do it now — don't wait until tomorrow. Remember, only those who send in the coupon and are members of the Conference are eligible to enter this contest.

LOOK! 285 BIG CASH PRIZES

1ST PRIZE	$20,000
2ND PRIZE	$10,000

CONTEST CLOSES MAY 30TH, 1936

PRIZES AWARDED BEFORE JUNE 15TH

THIS COUPON MAY BE WORTH $20,000 TO YOU!

Mrs. Oliver Harriman (on right), President of the National Conference on Legalizing Lotteries, is shown congratulating Mrs. Marie Harris, Yonkers, N. Y., winner of the $10,000 prize in the 1935 Sweepstakes Contest conducted by this organization. Second prize winner was Miss Maude King, Chicago, Ill. There were 66 other big cash prize winners. Complete list of names and addresses of winners mailed on request.

THIS IS THE OFFICIAL ENTRY BLANK

YOU CAN USE THIS AS YOUR ENTRY BLANK PUT A NUMBER IN EACH SQUARE

Below are listed the various ways in which the proceeds from legalized lotteries might be distributed. Read them carefully. Then number them in what you consider the order of their importance and merit. Write the number 1 in the square after what you consider the best way; number 2 after the second best; and so on, until you have a number in each square. Use ink or pencil.

can't shoot snowbound scenes when you're snowbound, so the crew returned to Hollywood and the good old sound stages, where, with a few tons of cornflakes, you can be just as snowbound as you like.

Just to show you how easy it is to recognize your favorite screen heroes and heroines off the screen, we'll let you in on a little something we overheard at the Trocadero the other night. An out-of-towner was pointing out the stars to his wife, or perhaps it was his lady-of-the-moment. "See that big guy over there?" he inquired, pointing to Frank Shields. "That's Errol Flynn. And that blonde girl in the ermine wrap (pointing to Alice Faye) is Jean Harlow." At that moment the gentleman nudged us, and indicating Johnny Weissmuller, asked who it was. "Johnny Weismuller," we told him. "Nuts!" said the gentleman.

When George Raft walked out of "A Princess Comes Across," the picture in which he was to have been co-starred with Carole Lombard, another touch of drama popped up when Mack Grey, George's bodyguard and constant companion, took it upon himself to walk out on a small part in "Florida Special." Mack, affectionately known as "The Killer," had his first speaking part in "Florida Special," but he considered loyalty to his boss over the furthering of his art. A short talk with George, however, convinced him that Art must come first, especially when a guy has a speaking part, so Mack walked right back into the picture. The Show Must Go On.

A single scene in a picture costs producers several thousand dollars, but one scene in "The Farmer in the Dell" at RKO-Radio was made at a personal loss to Fred Stone of $40. The scene called for Fred to toss a wallet full of stage money into a fire. Everything went perfectly, but when the shooting was over Fred discovered he had reached in the wrong pocket and tossed in his own wallet which contained $40 in decidedly genuine U. S. currency.

It may interest some of you girls to learn that Jean Harlow keeps that figure what it is by going in for two hours of exercise every day when she's not making pictures. We told that to a young lady the other day and she said: "According to Harlow's figure and your statement, the gal hasn't made a picture in years!" Outside of exercise, the only other Harlow affinity is Bill Powell, who continues to be her most constant companion, in spite of the fact that they both still insist there'll be no wedding bells.

When Clark Gable, Leo Carrillo and Director Jack Conway hied themselves to Mexico recently on a hunting trip, they ran across a tribe of disgusted Indians. The Indians were disgusted with everything, and had even agreed not to marry, preferring to let the tribe die out. Mr. G. spied a handsome young buck among the group, and tried to persuade him to come to Hollywood for a chance in pictures. But the handsome redskin shook his head. He had never heard of Hollywood, never heard of pictures, and—the blow of blows—had never heard of Gable. So the hunting party retreated, registering disgust at the Indians while the Indians registered disgust at everything.

As almost everyone at M-G-M knows, the Leslie Howard-Norma Shearer "Romeo and Juliet" set was closed to visitors almost every day during its production. But a steam shovel operator working on the lot didn't know it, and he thought to kill a leisurely noon hour by looking over a little Shakespeare. At the door of the sound stage he bumped into Leslie Howard and director George Cukor, on their way to lunch. The steam shovel man announced his intentions and Mr. Cukor gasped. "It's impossible," he said. "Miss Shearer is making closeups, and she gets nervous when people watch her." So the guy went back to his steam shovel. An hour later the returning Messrs. Howard and Cukor stopped at the edge of the excavation to watch proceedings. Suddenly the steam shovel stopped in mid-air, and a voice yelled: "I can't go on. I get nervous when anyone watches me!" It was their man, and it should be added that Howard and Cukor, gentlemen to the end, took him right over to the "Romeo and Juliet" set and gave him a good look at Norma Shearer, who wasn't nervous at all.

Celestial Note: On "The Green Pastures" set, watching a lowdown truckin' number in a cabaret sequence, stood De Lawd himself, snapping candid camera shots of the proceedings. Probably for future reference, when those sinners appear at the pearly gates to plead their cases before a dusky Saint Peter.

Katharine Hepburn once lived in a house which, according to rumors, was haunted. One room was said to be so filled with moans and sighs that the Hepburn dogs would not venture across its threshold. Eventually La Hepburn moved out, and today the house is occupied by guess whom? No fooling, it's inhabited by Boris Karloff and rumor has it that when he moved in the ghosts walked out. After the first night they were convinced the house was haunted!

Josef von Sternberg is a changed man. He even speaks to the hired help, and is known in some circles as Jovial Joe. As an example of how he speaks to anyone these days, look at this: During the shooting of a scene his attention was distracted by a man standing within the range of the camera. "Sir," said Joe, "you're in the way here. Who are you?" "I'm an electrician," replied the guy. "I work on this set." "You will do me a favor," returned Joe in his most democratic manner, "by being an electrician some place where I can't see you."

Next time Gary Cooper goes in for any Good Samaritan work, he's going to do it with gloves on. Seems he was strolling around his swimming pool one day when he noticed a half-drowned bee clinging to a floating stick. Full of good intentions, Thirteen is Walter Connolly's lucky number. His thirteenth picture, "Whom the Gods Destroy," was his first starring vehicle; he served for thirteen months in the Thirteenth Division of the Marine Corps during the war. Just now he has rented a home in Beverly Hills which has an address—616—which totals thirteen. And when his studio sees this, Walter is hoping they will immediately give him thirteen times as much money as he's getting now.

If you ever have a butler and a cook you're planning to fire, don't follow Gloria Stuart's method. Gloria and hubby Arthur Sheekman, burdened with a surly butler and his more disagreeable wife, decided to let them go. Neither was brave enough to fire them, so Gloria hit upon a swell idea. She went to the couple and told them she and her husband were leaving for Hawaii, to be gone indefinitely. That was too bad, said the butler, and what boat were they going on? Gloria named a boat and a date, and the butler and his wife said, rather suspiciously, that they would be on hand to see the Sheekmans off. Gloria grew more frantic as the date approached, and she finally rushed out and booked passage on the boat. So the Sheekmans, who didn't want to go anywhere, sailed meekly for Hawaii while the butler and his wife looked on. They say it was a grand trip.

Many honors have been bestowed on Grace Moore during her varied career in the concert halls and on the stage, but she claims her greatest compliment to date is the contented moo of the cow she milked while singing Kreisler's "Love's Joy" in "The King Steps Out." How about that, Gladys Swarthout, Lily Pons and Jeanette MacDonald? Do cows moo for you, or don't you care?

"Appalling!"

SAYS DOWAGER

A DOWAGER AND A DENTIST BATTLE ABOUT A TURKEY LEG

"Sensible!"

SAYS DENTIST

(But the civilized way to build firm gums is IPANA and MASSAGE)

You know any matron would say: "That picture is disgraceful. I see no excuse for such outrageous manners." And she's right. There is no excuse—socially.

But your dentist will retort: "Excuse?—The picture needs no excuse! I hope everyone sees it. More vigorous, energetic chewing like that, and a lot of gum troubles would vanish completely."

Dental science points out this fact—our gums need work, activity, exercise... and our modern soft-food diet does not give it to them. It's our creamy, well-cooked foods that are primarily to blame for sensitive, ailing gums—for the more frequent appearance of that dental warning—"pink tooth brush."

"Pink Tooth Brush" is a warning

"Pink tooth brush" is simply a distress signal! When you see it—see your dentist. The chances are relatively small that you are in for a serious gum disorder — but your dentist should make the decision. Usually, however, it only means gums that have grown tender and flabby under our modern soft food diet—gums that need more exercise, more stimulation—and as your dentist will so often advise—gums that need the help of Ipana and massage.

Ipana is especially designed to benefit your gums as well as clean your teeth. Rub a little extra Ipana into your gums every time you brush your teeth. You'll feel those lazy gums quicken. You'll feel new circulation waken the tissues and soon you'll feel a new healthy firmness in the gum walls themselves ... So improve your good looks. Heighten the charm of your smile. Make a definite start toward complete oral health ... Change to Ipana and massage today.

YESTERDAY
NERVOUS...
BILIOUS...

TODAY—
FRESH, RESTED,
FEELING FINE

HERE'S HOW I DID IT

"A friend told me how to clear up that logy, bilious, 'all-run-down' condition caused by constipation. Before I went to bed last night, I chewed delicious FEEN-A-MINT for 3 minutes.* It's this chewing, they tell me, that makes FEEN-A-MINT so much more effective. Well, it worked wonders for me. Today I'm fresh and rested—feel like a new person. This easy 3-minute way is so much nicer than taking harsh, griping, 'gulped' cathartics."

FEEN-A-MINT is fine for children too. No urging necessary to make them take FEEN-A-MINT, because they love its cool, fresh, minty chewing-gum flavor. And it's not habit-forming. Go to your druggist today and get a generous family-sized supply of delicious FEEN-A-MINT. Only 15c or 25c. Slightly higher in Canada.

*Longer if you wish.

They were BORN to play these roles

You never saw two stars more perfectly suited to portray the "male-and-female" of this great drama of San Francisco's bravest days! Clark Gable, owner of a gambling hell and Jeanette MacDonald as the innocent girl, stranded in a wicked city! Their first time together on the screen . . . and it's an electrifying thrill!

HERE'S A LOVE SONG FOR YOU!

It's called "WOULD YOU"

The composers of "Alone" (Brown and Freed) have written a new one called "WOULD YOU". Try it on YOUR sweetheart for exciting results . . . but first hear Jeanette MacDonald sing it. The screen's beautiful songbird also sings a thrilling number . . . "SAN FRANCISCO" in addition to "THE JEWEL SONG" and "MANON".

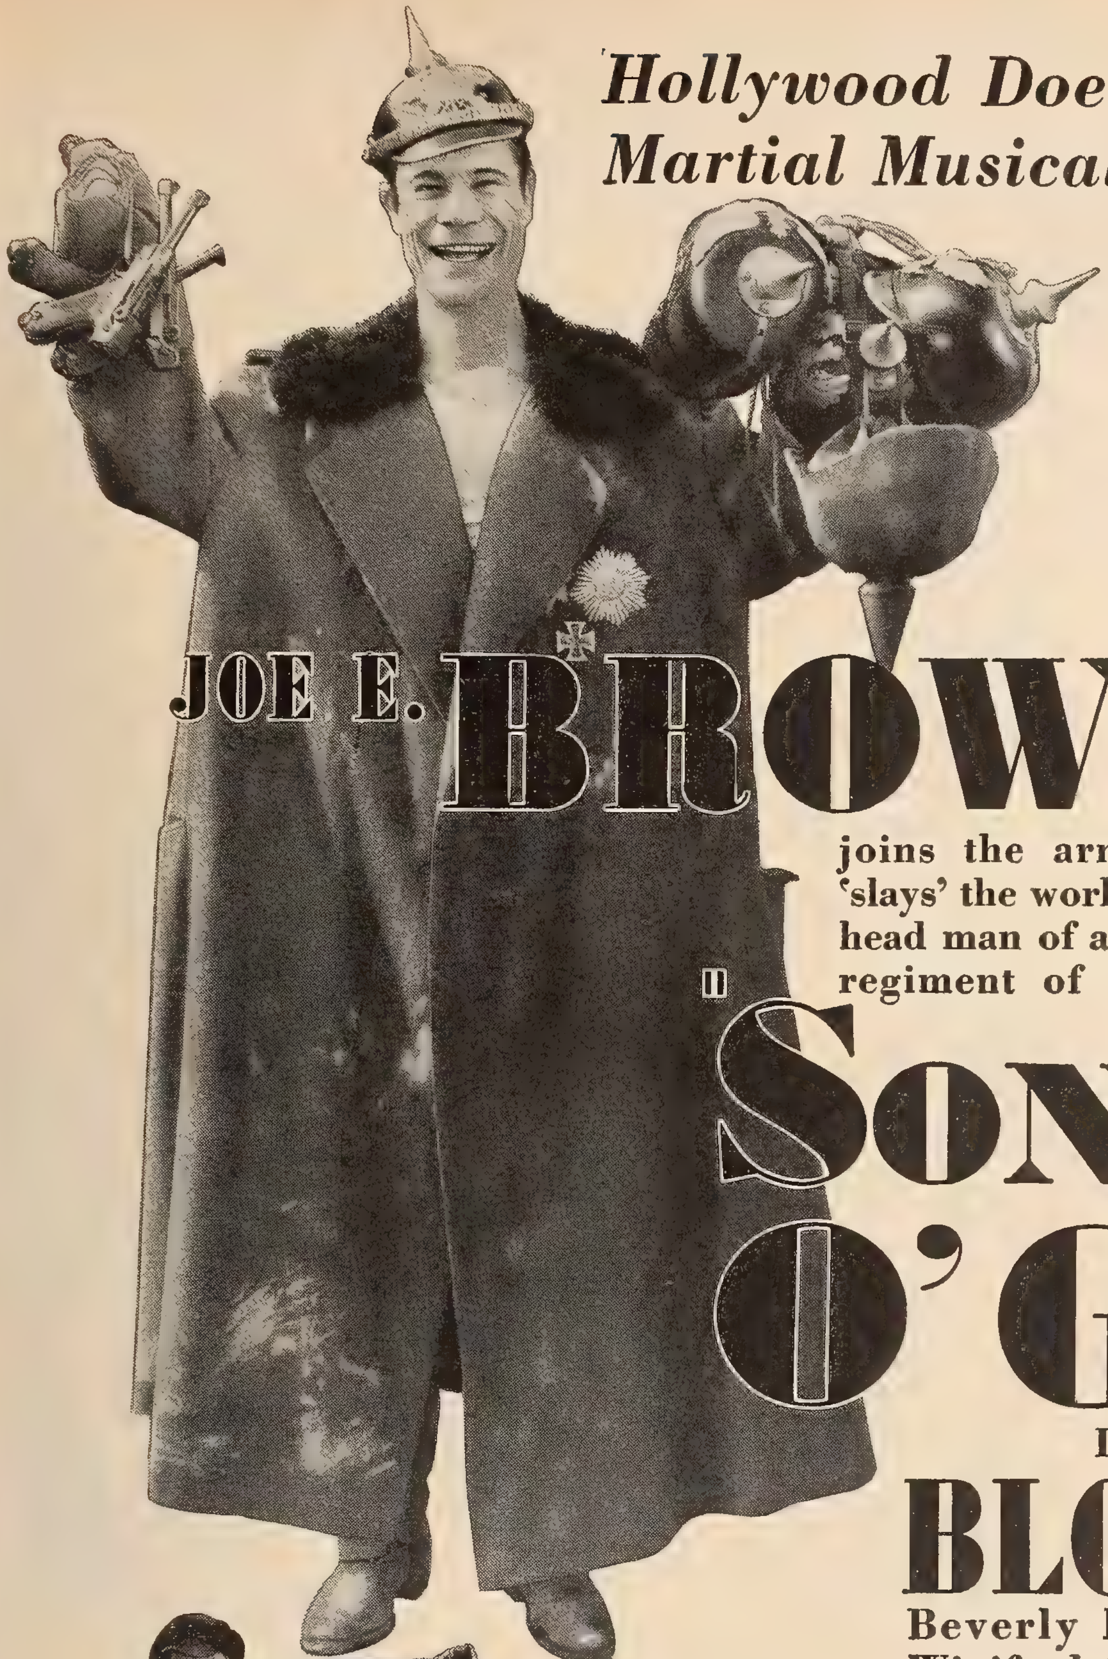
Hollywood Does A Mirthful Martial Musical Up 'Brown'



JOE E. BROWN

joins the army and 'slays' the world as the head man of a riotous regiment of singing

"SONS O' GUNS"

Including Joan

BLONDELL

Beverly Roberts, Eric Blore, Winifred Shaw, Craig Reynolds, Joseph King, Robert Barrat

Those thousands of "Bright Lights" audiences who demanded another song-and-dance show for Joe have had their way! Warner Bros. went right out and bought that famous stage musical 'Sons O' Guns,' equipped it with an uproarious cast and all modern conveniences including new Warren and Dubin songs, and a passionate apache dance number by Joe that stops the show. The riotous results emerge as the month's top entertainment.

REVIEWS

A Tour of Today's Talkies

By Leo Townsend

A love scene from "Petticoat Fever," co-starring Robert Montgomery and Myrna Loy, two of the screen's most popular stars.

"The Singing Kid," with Claire Dodd, Jolson and Allen Jenkins. Top, Grace Bradley, Fred MacMurray and Joan Bennett in "13 Hours by Air."

★★★ Captain January (20th Century-Fox)

There's no use saying anything derogatory about a Shirley Temple picture. Whenever you start wishing they'd furnish Shirley with a less antiquated story to back up her talents, you come around to the conclusion that the little lady is so good she doesn't need a story. Certainly, she proves it in "Captain January," for it's the old tale about the nice elderly gent, acting as guardian to the nice little girl and how the nasty truant officer wants to take her away and put her in an institution. With that as her vehicle, Shirley manages to sing, dance and turn on the personality so that when the picture is over you think you've seen something good. What you've actually seen is a child lift ordinary screenfare into the realm of good entertainment by the magic of her presence. As the ward of Guy Kibbee, an aging lighthouse keeper, her best friends are Slim Summerville and Buddy Ebsen. With Summerville and Kibbee, she does a swell burlesque on the Sextet from Lucia, and with Buddy Ebsen she swings into a couple of dance numbers that practically remind you of Eleanor Powell. The antics of Kibbee and Summerville as rivals for the young lady's attentions are often amusing, and the dancing and the comic pan of Buddy Ebsen help things considerably. But it's Shirley who makes the picture what it is.

Preview Postscript

The new Will Rogers Memorial Stage was used for the first time in filming this story. The problem of devising a waterfront which could be used throughout the picture was finally solved by the art and construction department. A tank, 80 feet square, four feet deep, containing 143,616 gallons of water was finally designed within the huge sound-stage. Its weight of 1,197,216 pounds required special underpinning beneath the floor. Two full-rigged fishing boats and a coast-guard cutter floated upon the artificial sea during the filming. Agitators on three sides, manned by crews of husky workmen, created realistic waves, while vaporized mineral oil, cooled over dry ice, provided fog which clung close to the water. The only accident which occurred was when Shirley Temple became seasick . . . This is Shirley's eighth film and she has yet to see her eighth birthday. Recently a group of learned gents from all over the world came up to the studio to study this little girl's amazing mental make-up. They discovered that Shirley is a bright child, but not a child prodigy—comforting to those who have seen a few of the latter.

★★★ 13 Hours by Air (Paramount)

A competent cast, and the outstanding performance of young Benny Bartlett provide seventy minutes of good entertainment. There's a bold and bad killer, one of Uncle Sam's sleuths, a fortune hunter, a jewel thief, a prospective kidnapper and just about everything else you can imagine aboard the de luxe air-liner, including young love. You get interesting slants on commercial flying, too, for most of the action takes place while flitting across country by air. Fred MacMurray is the handsome pilot and Joan Bennett is one of the passengers. With only thirteen hours in which to get acquainted, Fred and Joan seem to waste a lot of time, but that little matter is taken care of, for the ship is forced down by a blizzard in a remote and rugged section of the country. Others in the cast are Brian Donlevy, as the detective, Ruth Donnelly as the air-hostess and ZaSu Pitts as the harassed guardian of young Benny Bartlett. Alan Baxter, Adrienne Marden, Jack Mulhall and Fred Keating are also aboard.

Ten million dollars worth of equipment, and 1500 employees, were donated to Paramount Studios for the purpose of making this picture outstanding. W. A. Patterson, president of the United Airlines was the donater, who put the entire line at the studio's disposal . . . Benny Bartlett is nine years old and the sole support of his father, mother, and three small sisters. His father's in a veterans' hospital and until last August when Benny marched into the studio and announced he'd come for a job—and a good one—the Bartletts didn't quite know what to do to keep the family going. Benny's been in four pictures since, and it looks as if he'll be kept busy. (Continued on page 12)

NO, MRS. WHITE - I HAVEN'T HAD ANY LUCK. I CAN'T SEEM TO PUT MYSELF ACROSS. I WISH I KNEW WHAT-MY DEAR, I'M GOING TO BE VERY PERSONAL. I THINK THE TROUBLE MAY BE YOUR SKIN. HAVE YOU EVER TRIED EATING FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST TO CLEAR UP THOSE PIMPLES?
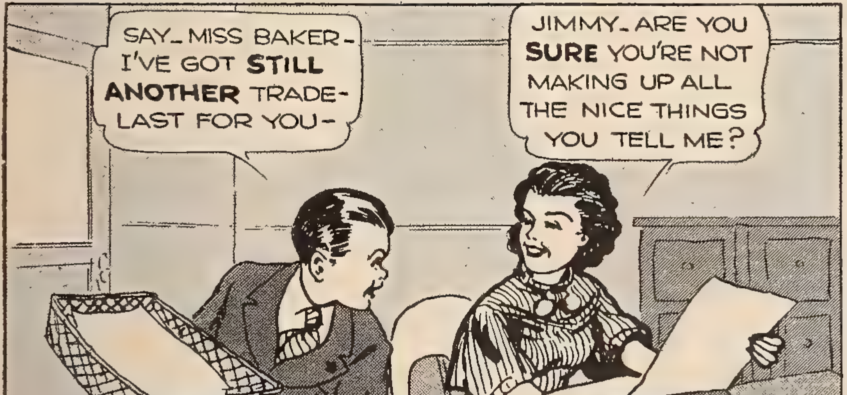
LATER
MOTHER - I'VE GOT A JOB! IT'S WHERE ALICE WORKS - AND SHE SAYS ONE REASON THEY TOOK ME WAS BECAUSE THEY LIKED MY LOOKS! I MUST TELL MRS. WHITE!!
AND BE SURE TO THANK HER AGAIN FOR TELLING YOU ABOUT FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST!



SAY - MISS BAKER - I'VE GOT STILL ANOTHER TRADE-LAST FOR YOU-
JIMMY - ARE YOU SURE YOU'RE NOT MAKING UP ALL THE NICE THINGS YOU TELL ME?

Don't let Adolescent Pimples be a handicap to YOU

AFTER the beginning of adolescence—from about 13 to 25, or even longer—many young people are troubled by pimples.

During these years, important glands develop and final growth takes place. This causes disturbances throughout the body. The skin gets oversensitive. Waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin and pimples break out.

Fleischmann's fresh Yeast is often prescribed to help get rid of adolescent pimples. It clears these skin irritants out of the blood. Then—pimples go!

Eat 3 cakes daily—one about ½ hour before each meal. Eat it regularly—plain, or in a little water—until your skin clears. Start today!

★★ A Message to Garcia (20th Century-Fox)

Carrying that missive from Washington, D. C., to inland Cuba is a task which includes fighting one's way through miles of swampland and hundreds of treacherous Spaniards, but John Boles, as the handsome U. S. Army Lieutenant, manages to go through all that and meet Wallace Beery and Barbara Stanwyck, besides. According to history that message, when it was handed to General Garcia, led to victory in the Spanish-American fracas in 1898. On the screen its actual delivery is prefaced by such unexciting episodes that one almost wishes it could have been phoned to the good general. Mr. Boles' long trek through the swamps with Miss Stanwyck and Mr. Beery as his companions becomes a trifle monotonous, but the situation brightens when he falls into the hands of the opposition, for you get the idea that something is about to happen. What happens is that the U. S. Army swoops down on the enemy and rescues Mr. Boles, who hands over the message to the General. You'd probably call it Wallace Beery's picture, for he has more audience appeal with his stock "lovable villain" character than have Boles and Stanwyck with nothing to do but carry on a rather phlegmatic romance.

This picture was based on Elbert Hubbard's essay, which was inspired by the message sent to General Garcia by President McKinley, and dwelt on the moral of initiative and devotion to duty. Gene Fowler and W. P. Lipscomb did a real job of script-writing in making a scenario from such meager material . . . Most of the picture was filmed in a studio-built jungle and swamp. Part of this, together with a Cuban village, was built as an exterior set on the back lot, occupying 10 acres of the 110-acre studio. Much of it was also built on sound stages where a swamp was filled with a dozen live alligators through which Wally Beery and John Boles had to wade. The alligators were in a hibernating stage when brought to the studio and were made active by being placed in warm water. Two tons of ice were kept close at hand to cool the water should they become dangerously active . . . The role that John Boles plays in this picture parallels his war-time career in the U. S. Secret Service in France. On his return from the war, having no money with which to continue his studies, he took up singing to make a living. The hardest part of his career, though, came during the filming of this picture. He had to go into solitary confinement for three months during the shooting on account of the stubble blooming on his chin . . . To insure realism in the picture, Francois De Valdes, Cuban technical director, had the shirts, machetes, dried tobacco leaf and even the bread which is eaten imported from Cuba.

★★ The Singing Kid (Warners)

Done in the typical Al Jolson manner, it presents the country's Number One mammy shouter in a manner which should meet with the approval of every one of his followers. This time he's a famous musical comedy and radio star, in love with Claire Dodd, who does him in by running off with Lyle Talbot, Al's crooked attorney. Things like that go straight to the heart of a mammy singer, so Al suffers a complete breakdown and is forced to sojourn in the woods for a rest. Here, of course, he meets a simple country girl (Beverly Roberts) and her niece, Miss Sybil Jason. The country life seems to be the life for Al, for it is no time before he has recovered his voice and is back on his knees again in a Broadway musical. With, of course, the girl of his bucolic interlude. The comedy in "The Singing Kid" is the type you hear on the average radio program—in other words, it's not very good. The song numbers are much bettter, and the real stars of the picture are The Yacht Club Boys. The picture's high point, in fact, is a number called "I Love to Singa," in which the Yacht Clubbers and Jolson hand the mammy and Dixie numbers a terrific kidding. Another Yacht Club gem is "My, How This Country Has Changed." Beverly Roberts is a welcome addition to the ranks of the new screen players, and Sybil Jason is effective in a song number.

Al Jolson's secret of success, for lo these many years, will make you blush. He's found that an audience mustn't be outsmarted in the matter of wisecracks. If that is done the spectators in the paid seats will squirm and mutter, "This guy's not so hot after all." But if you play the part of a normally blundering human being, says Al, they'll think, "Poor dope, let's give him a hand." In short, just give your audience a superiority complex and they'll give you a fortune . . . The day when the star surrounded himself with mediocre and negative talent is a thing of the past.

This picture's a good example of changing times, as witness radio and stage rivals which Jolson is mixed up with. There are The Yacht Club Boys—tops on radio in this country and in England; Cab Calloway, best known cullud band leader in the world; Mitchell and Durant, and a host of others . . . Frank Mitchell and Jack Durant were both amateur champion boxers when they formed an acting partnership twelve years ago. Finding themselves pitted against each other on a fight program one night in New York City, the pair mutually agreed to clown instead of swap punches. The "act" was such a success with cash customers that Mitchell and Durant decided then and there to book it on the vaudeville circuit. Recently the pair dissolved partnership and entered the movies—only to be teamed again in their first celluloid appearance.

★★★★ Mr. Deeds Goes to Town (Columbia)

There should be more pictures like this. Everything you're looking for in good entertainment is packed into "Mr. Deeds Goes To Town." There's rich humor, stark tragedy, sentiment, satire and all the elements that make a picture a "natural," including one of the most unusual love angles you've seen. Gary Cooper, as Longfellow Deeds, the pride of Mandrake Falls, has his best role to date and handles it with a deftness that should send his cinema stock soaring. Although he'd never been outside of Mandrake Falls in his life, there's no happier man in the world than Mr. Deeds. That is, until he falls heir to twenty millions and goes to town. From then on he is the victim of a series of heart-breaking events, since everyone with whom he comes in contact tries to take him for a ride. The girl of his dreams, Jean Arthur, New York's ablest sob-sister, is using him for copy as the "Cinderella Man." Jean Arthur's performance is entirely convincing, with her courtroom plea one of the high spots of the picture. But then, there are so many high spots in this flicker that practically every actor can take credit for a few. John Wray's plea for the half-starved men in the country is an outstanding bit, while Lionel Stander, H. B. Warner, Raymond Walburn, George Bancroft and Ruth Donnelly all give excellent accounts of themselves.

This is the fourth picture made by Hollywood's Brain Boys—Frank Capra and Robert Riskin, the outstanding example of a successful writer-director combine. "Lady for a Day," "It Happened One Night" and "Broadway Bill" are the other three, in case you don't believe us. And the next is "Lost Horizon." . . . George Bancroft has had his ups and downs in celluloid. But he will never be broke. Some years ago George and George M. Cohan tore hundred-dollar bills in two, with both keeping one-half of each as souvenirs. Thus if there's ever a question of financial embarrassment among the two Georges, it's just a matter of getting together to put the pieces together . . . Raymond Walburn came to Hollywood from the New York stage, not because he felt the screen offered a better medium for expressing his pent-up emotions, nor for the better checking account.

THEY LOVE TO SAVE !

Stars may not hoard string or tin foil, but they have their souvenirs

The blond wig Myrna Loy wore in her first picture, "What Price Beauty?" is seldom removed from her safety deposit box.

By Whitney Williams

THE WORLD'S a small place, after all. No habit finds such universal response among people as saving . . . and in a mutual regard for this trait Hollywood and the rest of the globe lie closely akin.

From star down through the ranks to extra, there's scarcely a player who doesn't keep something cherished, something very dear to his heart, in his safety deposit box.

Every manner of chattel may be found in these strong-boxes of the stars . . . some of great monetary value, but the majority are kept only for sentimental reasons. The blond wig she wore in her first picture, Mrs. Rudolph Valentino's "What Price Beauty?" lies in Myrna Loy's, more cherished than the deed to her home. Nothing could ever persuade Myrna to part with this personal "prop" that figured so importantly in her cinema debut.

Seldom removed from the vault because of the high value attached to it, Kay Francis' most treasured possession is a ring, more than two thousand years old, which her great-grandmother found in the Catacombs in Rome.

When she had reached the ripe old age of five years, Evelyn Venable was taken backstage to meet Walter Hampden, the Shakespearean actor and her father's closest friend. He presented her with a pomegranate.

"Who knows," said Hampden, "but what someday you may be an actress with me?"

Some twelve years later, Evelyn did appear with Hampden as his leading lady in Shakespearean repertoire. And in memory of that early childhood day, the day she first decided to go on the stage, Evelyn has kept the pomegranate. It reposes now, its dried and shriveled shell packed carefully in cotton, in a bank vault.

Safeguarded in the hidden recesses of her safety deposit box are the funny little Mary Jane pumps that Janet Gaynor wore in "Seventh Heaven," the film that sky-rocketed her to lasting fame. They're only a plain pair of battered shoes, but rather than permanently be separated from them Janet would sacrifice anything she possesses. Once in every picture the popular actress dons them for a scene. Then back to the box they go.

NORMA SHEARER owns one of the most gorgeous diamond bracelets in Hollywood, an engagement present from her husband, Irving Thalberg. Very infrequently does she take it from its resting place at the bank. And therein lies a tale.

A number of years ago while visiting New York, the publicity office of M-G-M requested her to make a photographic sitting. A young man by the name of Hubert Voight accompanied her to the photographer's.

While she changed her costume, she asked Voight to hold the bracelet for her. He slipped it into his pocket and instantly dismissed the incident from his mind. Apparently, Miss Shearer did likewise, for not until that evening while dressing for dinner did she think of the bracelet.

A frenzied search was made to locate Mr. Voight. Metro officials, newspaper reporters, even the police were called in by the frantic Miss Shearer. Not that she considered for an instant the possibility that the publicity man had absconded with the bracelet . . . it was to satisfy her peace of

NO PICTURE!

Impossible to print a picture that would make its point and still stay within the bounds of good taste

WE'D LIKE to take some person who had just taken a harsh, over-acting cathartic . . . and turn on the X-ray camera.

We'd like to print micro-photographs, too, of the tissues of the alimentary tract. We'd like to show you just what happens within you when you take so drastic a purge.

If you could see those pictures, you wouldn't be likely to take such medicine again. You would be super-careful to take only a laxative that is correctly timed. A laxative like Ex-Lax.

WHY HARSH CATHARTICS ARE BAD FOR YOU

When you take a cathartic that over-acts, it throws your entire system out of rhythm. It hurries unassimilated food through your body, causing violent muscular action in your alimentary tract. You have pains and griping. You feel weak afterwards . . . all worn out!

Authorities agree that strong purgatives and cathartics should never be taken except upon the advice of a physician.

WHY CORRECT TIMING IS VITAL

Now, what happens when you take a correctly timed laxative like Ex-Lax?

Well, except for the relief you get, you hardly know that you've even taken a laxative. And that's as it should be . . . You take a little Ex-Lax tablet, preferably at night. It tastes just like delicious chocolate. It works gently, taking 6 to 8 hours to be effective! You will have no stomach pains. You won't be nauseated. You'll experience no unpleasant after-taste.

In the morning your constipation will be completely relieved. You'll feel fine!

30 YEARS' PROOF

New laxatives constantly appear with miraculous promises. But, remember this . . . for over 30 years, Ex-Lax has been the approved family laxative. More people use it than any other laxative in the world. You can count on it for mildness, gentleness, thoroughness, correct timing. A box costs only 10c at any drug store. Or 25c for the economical, family size.

THAT SCORE A GRAND SLAM

By Marjorie Deen

ALMOST EVERYBODY in Hollywood is playing that fascinating new game "Monopoly"—buying and selling imaginary "property," mortgaging and foreclosing and cornering parcels of land to "build on." But the members of one afternoon bridge club I know of are not going to let this new real estate game muscle in on their weekly (film work permitting, naturally) bridge bouts which provide such fun.

The attractive foursome of which I speak consists of Arline Judge, Marsha Hunt, Paula Stone and Wynne Gibson. And many's the pack of cards they've cut between them, many's the score they've totalled and many's the cup of tea and piece of cake they've consumed.

This particular afternoon was Arline Judge's turn to have "the gang" at her place, so I found them in her garden, the table set up beside the swimming pool where they could acquire an early coat of summer tan as they played. They were deeply engrossed, when I arrived, in "positively the very last rubber game before refreshments!" It all looked so jolly and sounded so amusing that although I had only stopped in for a short chat I stayed for what developed into a long and delightful tea party.

It was not an elaborate tea party, by any means, for bridge was the first consideration and when it was time to eat, the cards were simply pushed aside and the "eats" brought on, with the hope that there would be time to resume the game after eating.

BUT THE girls, you see, didn't figure on me or on Scotty, our omnipresent photographer. For between the two of us we took up hours of their time, wrecked their game, drank gallons of Judge tea, ate pounds of Judge cake and altogether made ourselves at home and them miserable! But all in a good cause, of course! And since the end is said to justify the means, I walked off without one little twinge of conscience—proudly aware of the fact that there were pictures in Scotty's camera and a raft of notes in my bag.

It has been ages since I've written one little word about afternoon entertaining and I was beginning to think it was high time that I said something about the way it is done in Hollywood. Then this golden opportunity presented itself, enabling me to get some first hand information on the subject from four different sources instead of the usual one. And such charming sources—if I may be permitted to use that unromantic term to describe such attractive screen hostesses.

"What do you serve when the charming members of this bridge club meet at your house?" I asked Wynne Gibson when Arline had excused herself to go in and see about the tea.

"I'm the sandwich maker-upper of this crowd," mumbled Wynne, biting her pencil thoughtfully as she tried to make the scores balance. "I like variety, and you can get plenty of it with sandwiches," she continued. "We've made a rule, you know, that only one particular food shall be served with the tea—a salad, sandwiches, cake or cookies—any one dish, but not several different ones."

"We had to make that rule," interrupted Paula. "Why it was getting to be funny—and fattening," she declared, eyes twinkling. "It became a sort of friendly rivalry to see which of us could serve the most elaborate concoctions, the largest number of delicacies! The result was that we upset the entire kitchen department! And for what? So that we (Continued on page 88)

"My mother does—and goodbye!"

"Heavens above, who bit you, Son?"
"My girl did! I made a crack about her father's dingy shirts—then I said her mother didn't wash 'em right—and now I've got the gate!"

"Pshaw, we'll patch that up. My own washes used to have tattle-tale gray—and it wasn't my fault. The trouble was left-over dirt. Tell your girl her mother ought to change to Fels-Naptha as I did. That golden soap is so full of naptha that every bit of dirt goes."

ABSENT-MINDED LIZ

Yet Miss Allan's not light-headed when it comes to work

By Dora Albert

I'VE LOST the receipts to my trunks," said the young woman with the green eyes, "and my boat is sailing in a few hours. There was one brown trunk and one black trunk, and they were sent out either under the name of Elizabeth Allan (that's my stage name) or under the name of Mrs. William O'Bryan, my married name."

The official at the dock, whose business it is to take care of such matters, glared up at Elizabeth Allan. Was this young woman trying to josh him when he was so busy? But Elizabeth's eyes were very solemn under their long lashes. She looked demure, appealing and completely helpless.

"Sometimes I use one name and sometimes the other," she explained, "and I never can remember which I've used."

"For heaven's sake," the clerk said, "don't you know receipts are given you for a reason? Why didn't you take care of yours?"

At that Elizabeth looked so downcast and unhappy that the grim lines on the official's face softened. "All right," he said, "I'll see if I can find your trunks." But he couldn't. Elizabeth had to sail without them. Several weeks later, to be sure, they arrived in England, but that was just a happy accident.

To complicate things still further, Elizabeth lost her passport.

Telling me about this recently, she said, waving her hands helplessly, "I'm a completely irresponsible person. I always was that way. My mother, who's very sane and practical, did everything she could to cure me. She's still trying. But it has never helped.

"I was irresponsible even when I was a youngster going to school in England. When we were supposed to be having our silent study period, I'd sneak out and play tennis. I did this innumerable times but I never got away with it. Always I was found out. I cut many classes in the same way. And when I did go to class, I nearly always came late, not because I wanted to, but because I haven't the remotest idea of time. I dawdle, even now. I don't mean to come late for all my appointments, but I inevitably do.

"At school I had great difficulty in passing exams—and no wonder! I was so completely befuddled. When I was supposed to sweat up for a geography exam (you call it cramming) I'd sweat up for a history exam instead.

"My parents hoped that I'd be a school mistress, but the only thing I wanted to do was to go on the stage. I used to sneak out of the house and watch Pierrot shows, or drape myself in spangles and a scarf of mother's, lock my bedroom door and emote for the sole edification of Elizabeth Allan. I played Juliet, on the edge of my bed, without a Romeo in sight for miles.

"At first my parents were horrified at the idea of my going on the stage. Finally my father weakened and said that, since I was too young to take my final degree as a school teacher, I could play Shakespearian roles at the old Vic Theatre."

"So you'll get this stage idea out of your system," he told Elizabeth, shaking a warning finger at her. "But mind you confine yourself to Shakespearian roles."

And she did just that for several years. But she didn't get the stage bug out of her system. Instead it flourished and grew worse until finally she decided to go out on her own, and got herself a job in her first London play, "Michael and Mary," with Edna Best and Herbert Marshall. The play was a hit, and Elizabeth was a hit along with it.

IT WAS then that she demonstrated once again that streak of impracticality that amounts almost to genius in her. An American manager came to her, offering her a glittering contract. He had his own repertory theatre, he said, and he would like to star her in a series of plays in the United States. While he couldn't pay her a large salary, she would have the advantage of an assured income over a period of at least a year. Delighted at the idea of getting a chance in America, Elizabeth signed the contract.

Several London managers were offering her contracts, but she turned them all down airily, saying, "I'm going to America."

THAT BEAUTY CALLED Smooth

Paulette Goddard's natural look and Madge Evans' sleek appearance are perfection points to shoot at!

THERE'S a one-word description, popular with all you young things, which puts a finger right on our whole beauty set-up for this spring. It's a current bit of slang and an apt one—"She's smooth!"

Now a "smooth" look isn't just a matter of clothes or make-up or hair. It takes in a gal from her head to her toes and puts a general stamp of fresh good looks upon her. And when you are described as "smooth" looking by the young-blades-about-town, you can give yourself a good congratulatory pat, because it means that you've achieved real attractiveness without letting on about any of the artful dodges of modern beauty routines. And this spring beauty of yours will look natural, just as it should. Nothing is less to be desired than a studied look of either prettiness or beauty.

You can't look "smooth" unless you are up on all the latest news from the beauty purveyors, those hard-working people who go into painstaking research to bring forth the latest improvements in both cosmetics and hairdressing.

Here are some of the discoveries I've just made and I want to pass them on to you in time to put a finishing touch to your springtime good looks.

The Vitamins are popping up in beauty talk these days. It seems that you need Vitamin D to give you a really knockout complexion. D is the sunshine vitamin, in case you get them mixed up, too, and you can have it all done up in one cake of soap! Use with water, and there you are, cleansed with speed and your skin all pepped up with filtered sunshine. Really, this new soap is grand and there is no spoofing about its actually containing this healthy, invigorating vitamin.

In place of, or to aid and abet the healthy glow of this tonic soap, don't forget the cooling, soothing touch of Eau de Cologne. I came across one that has a delightful spring bouquet scent and a large bottle of it makes a very small dent in your pocket money. I like Eau de Cologne to splash on prodigally right after my bath. And in hot weather it is so refreshing, you can't get along without it.

THERE'S NOTHING better than a pick-up beauty treatment before you set forth for evening gaieties. However, heretofore, it's been hard to find a simple one that could be done in a jiffy and still have all the beautifying effect of a more protracted one. Now you can have a "mock facial" while you dress. This "five o'clock" beauty cocktail is a delightful new cream that you smooth on your face after cleansing. Leave it on for fifteen or twenty minutes—meanwhile you will see it bring a rosy tingle to your face. After you remove the cream, there's a skin tonic or lotion which is made to go with it and which you pat on your face. There isn't much more to the whole beautifying routine than there would be to powdering your nose carefully.

Want to know a new trick about applying lipstick smoothly? It's clever as the deuce and just as simple. Powder your lips first. Aren't you amazed? This dusting of powder leaves your lips dry and ready (Continued on page 105)

Like most women, I've tried many beauty aids. But for a smooth, soft skin—give me Camay.

Sincerely,

(Signed) Viano Tobey

(Mrs. George E. Tobey)

December 7, 1935

NEW ENGLAND can well be proud of Viano Tobey—she has that wonderful pale gold hair . . . smiling hazel eyes—and her skin . . . well, she's proud of it herself and gives Camay most of the credit.

Mrs. Tobey keeps her skin soft, smooth and attractive with Camay. Camay can do this for you, too, you know. It cleanses thoroughly, but ever so gently . . . that's because it is made milder, far milder!

Just try Camay. Then see for yourself whether your skin isn't softer, smoother—lovelier to look at! And Camay's price is so very low you should get at least half a dozen cakes today.

Let Camay bring your loveliness to light.

It Happens in Hollywood

It is amusing to watch Hollywood trying to portray a poverty-stricken family on the screen. The people themselves are so accustomed to elaborate settings, what can they know of need in a town of plenty? Granted that many extras are practically starving, still one always sees them well-clothed and putting on the well known dog even though their belt has been taken in a few notches.

In "Riffraff" Jean Harlow plays the daughter of a drunken pauper living in a squalid section of town. Her uniform for the job in the fishery, alone, is well tailored. When she rises from bed, a beautiful satin nightie drapes her lovely form. On her wedding day she wears a satin gown that is entirely too elaborate. Which reminds me of "The White Parade," with Loretta Young, a few years back. Loretta is a nurse—a student, at that. Everyone knows that nurses receive scarcely any pay at all. Yet, when she steps out with the boy-friend, she wears a lovely frock—too lovely to buy on a nurse's salary—topped by a glorious velvet, full-length cape—also too expensive. Another funny-bone tickler is when the hero tells the heroine that they could get along on $50 or $60 per week and act as if it were pin money.

Well, they don't know poverty like I do. No, Hollywood still has to go some to make pictures real and true to life.—Marion Rae, Newark, N. J.

Once a Bette Davis Avoider

There was a blonde motion picture actress who seemed insipid and unattractive to me. I avoided any pictures in which she appeared. It did not occur to me that her roles were insipid and unattractive, too.

To my surprise she won the leading role in the cinema version of one of my favorite novels, opposite one of my favorite actors. I went to see the picture in spite of her presence, and left the theatre cheering the film because of it! You've guessed it—the blonde was Bette Davis; the picture, "Of Human Bondage."

However, I remained cynical until her portrayal in "Dangerous" proved that her "Mildred" had been no artistic accident.

So it was that I went to see "The Petrified Forest" because of Bette Davis. Her portrayal of "Gabby" is unforgettable.

I was wrong in my attitude toward Bette Davis and I'm glad to admit it, and glad to admit as well that she is now my favorite actress.—Anna K. Hawkes, Bristol, Pa.

What About Public Taste?

It is not surprising that all the trashy pictures spilled out of Hollywood are so well attended, for it is only too obvious that public taste is low. Real feminine beauty is not a matter of geography, age, dress or social status; it is universally appreciated and admired.

Why, then, do producers strain so intensely to foist their leading ladies on the public as beauties when they are not? Why do they take half-baked girls with a violent ego and a desperate, unscrupulous will to wealth and fame, and glorify them? I wonder! Take these "stars," remove their expensive jewels, their mink wraps, their $250 gowns, their war-paint and their lavish settings, put them in the ordinary walks of life, and nobody would ever notice them.

In spite of their trumped up glamor, they are unnatural, out of place, pathetic. I crave real, natural beauty on the screen—a lovely, rounded form, a classic face, natural hair, and an expression that radiates kindness, intelligence, capability.—Bertha Koenig, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Answering all the questions you've asked about Joan and Franchot at home

THE PRIVATE LIFE

AND SO they were married. In story books this would have marked the happy ending. But this happened in real life, and it's just the beautiful beginning. I mean the married life of Joan Crawford and Franchot Tone.

I did not know of Joan's and Franchot's marriage plans until Franchot's air mail, special delivery, written right after the ceremony, arrived.

"You are the very first person we've told," wrote the bridegroom. "Our happy moment came this morning at ten-fifteen in Fort Lee, New Jersey. Nick Schenck made all the arrangements and the secrecy was complete. The ceremony was performed on the lawn of the residence of Ex-Mayor White, overlooking the Hudson River from the Palisades—and Mayor Jenkins of Fort Lee conducted the ceremony. We exchanged rings, Joan's a narrow diamond and platinum, mine a plain platinum circle. Mr. Schenck and his associate, Mr. Friedman, were the witnesses. After the ceremony they toasted us in champagne and we rushed right back to New York to get Joan to a rehearsal of a radio broadcast. We each wore a red carnation. We had visited the place the preceding Wednesday night to sign the application for a license. The moon was shining over the Hudson and outlined the slender sweep of the George Washington Bridge in the background. It really was a heavenly spot."

THAT WAS the last I heard from the newlyweds until Joan wired me to meet them in Pasadena and share their first Hollywood meal, as Mr. and Mrs. Franchot Tone. What a privilege, I thought, to be the first to greet them and witness their new-found happiness. But two hundred others were of the same opinion. While Joan and Franchot saw reporters, signed autographs and tried to dodge camera fiends, I managed to wave a feeble hello from the ragged edge of the crowd. Finally, with a dexterity that placed Fred Keating's bird-cage trick in the amateur class, we made the car and headed for home and Hollywood.

"I want to see our house," cried Joan gaily. "I want to see our new dining-room, the new music room and the garden." Kicking off her shoes and shoving her hat to the back of her head, Joan pressed her face against the window. Every time we passed a tree or a house, she would wave her hand and cry: "Hello, tree—hello, house, I'm home again." Is it necessary for me to add that Mrs. Franchot Tone was hilariously happy?

During Joan's and Franchot's absence, William Haines had gone ahead with the decorating plans that Joan had okayed before leaving. When we arrived at the house, the transformation was little less than a miracle. The entire exterior had been cleverly changed. Bill Haines, himself, was waiting to greet the bride and groom and proudly conduct them on an inspection tour.

The entrance hall was filled with baskets of flowers, packages and stacks of wires and letters. In the very center stood a huge vase of white blossoms. It was addressed to Mr. and Mrs. Franchot Tone and conveyed the sentiments of the cook, butler, chauffeur and night watchman. Joan ran out to thank them immediately and placed the flowers in her sitting-room. Just then the butler entered.

"Where does Mrs. Tone want the trunks?" he inquired, addressing himself to Franchot.

FOR A minute Franchot looked startled. "Oh-h-h—oh, the trunks," he repeated hesitatingly, as the full significance of just who Mrs. Tone was swept over him. Then swallowing hard and looking a trifle embarrassed, Franchot replied, "Put my wife's trunks in her room, please." Turning to me, he winked, as he continued, "I haven't had the courage to call

SECOND Chance

By Ruth Rankin

Eric Linden's two-year absence from Hollywood has done much for him.

Frances Dee, now happily married to Joel McCrea, is said to have been one of the reasons for Eric's temporary retirement.

ERIC LINDEN is the lad who walked out on a Hollywood career which was going great guns, because he had girl-trouble.

That may sound facetious, but there was nothing facetious about Eric at the time. He was torn wide apart—raw, sensitive, quivering in every nerve. At twenty-one, you get that way. When the girl is Frances Dee, I suppose you get it a little bit worse, for Frances is in a class by herself.

That wasn't all, either, although no one ever credited anything else, in spite of Eric's protests. They thought it was an uncomplicated case of lovelornness (now there's a word) which is quite a romantic thing to think, and Eric certainly looked the part. He couldn't have made up for it any more convincingly. The trembling hand, the downcast eye, the lonely hill-tramping, the complete and total loss of appetite—all unmistakable evidence.

Girl trouble caused Eric Linden to drop a promising career, but he's back now, a wiser young man

Linden followed "Ah, Wilderness" with "Voice of Bugle Ann" with Mlle. O'Sullivan.

You've been through it! Is there anything more harrowing on this earth? Who can laugh at it is a sadist, unless there is sympathy and memory and understanding in the smile. . . .

And there was more to it, too—as if that weren't enough!

"I wasn't doing what I wanted to do—I hated the parts I had to play. Wild youth and suffering mama's boys—suffering cats!" said Eric. "I was getting labeled, you know how people get the idea you are what you play. I avoided everyone. I was called eccentric. Imagine, at my age! You can be erratic at twenty, but eccentric is out. Well, I just got funny, I guess, and thought it best to have a change of scene."

We'll refer to that later, as the tax-collector says. It was discovered while he was away that a darn good actor was lacking for many a part that no one else could quite fill. Maybe his absence made them realize it all the more.

At any rate, when he returned he didn't have to pick up where he left off. He was way ahead of it. He made a fresh start with one of the grandest juvenile roles ever written, the boy in "Ah, Wilderness." And some say he beat a Barrymore to the draw. The whole cast was pretty fast company for a kid who was out of practise but, I reckon before things went very far, Eric was pacing 'em. If he had read every script in town and had his choice of parts to play, he couldn't have found one that could approach the anguished dawn-of-love lad in "Ah, Wilderness." There was something so helpless and lovable and pathetic—and familiar—about the boy in his first relentless grip of love. He has just done another stand-out performance in "The Voice of Bugle Ann." They have some wonderful things planned for him, way into the future. When a studio does that an actor has arrived.

He's twenty-four now and doesn't look it. But still, he doesn't seem exactly a child, either. There is calm confidence in his bearing; he has lost the old too-eager-to-please that had him tied in knots. He says he used to go for days without seeing anyone, then when he did, he talked a blue streak about nothing. He really didn't want to talk, but was afraid silence would be rude.

Not knowing the first thing about acting—he says so himself—he played one intensely dramatic part for the Theatre Guild. So Hollywood called him and began talking over contracts and prospective roles with him. "You're emotional, aren't you?" they said, in substance. "Okay, emote."

Poor kid, he presided at every death-bed scene and wept gallons and had hysterics and paced corridors and wore his nerve-ends down to the quick. He didn't know how to act, and he was afraid to tell anyone, so all he could do was be what he was playing. If it happened to be a frantic, jittery, end-of-the-rope kid, why Eric drank gallons of coffee and didn't go to bed, and thought about terrible disasters, and got himself in fine shape to scream if anybody looked at him. He relived all the family tragedies that had ever happened to him—things he might better have forgotten. Well, no human can keep that up forever—and be in love, in addition.

So he put two and two together and decided that he'd soon be measured for a strait-jacket if he didn't break loose. He was so young—good gracious, being young is hard enough, just trying to see through the fog of baffling bewilderment, without being it twice—both being it and playing it.

Eric didn't even pause to say goodbye. He boarded a plane for New York, and sailed next day on the Bremen. He found a villa near Nice. Got himself a cook, a police dog, a French gardener, some chickens and a lot of books. He had yearned to write a book for some time, so he wrote one. It isn't for anybody to see. He wrote steadily for four months. ". . . and I was purged of all my complexes," says Eric. "I wrote them down and got rid of them."

He adds, "You have to be in love to write." Well, I guess that's as good an excuse (Continued on page 93)

LOMBARD, LTD.

By Muriel Babcock

Meet Carole and "Fieldsie," one of the most successful partnerships in all Hollywood

NOW, HONESTLY, you would never expect to find Carole Lombard, one of the glamor queens of Hollywood, sitting back of an adding machine, laboriously tapping out figures, would you? Or find her diligently, and not too accurately, typing a business letter?

She has a secretary for that, you'd say. She must have! Isn't she a star with all the paraphernalia of a star, a beautiful house decorated in exotic blues and yellows, clothes such as few women can ever hope to possess and a career? Sure, she has a secretary.

Madelayne Fields goes everywhere that Carole goes.

It's the famous (in Hollywood) Fieldsie—Miss Madelayne Field, to you. The tall, hefty lass with the wisecracking tongue and the fund of funny stories, who goes practically everywhere that Carole goes and who is sort of a combination bodyguard, friend, companion, secretary and business manager. The latter is her official title, and her official job.

But visualize this picture! It is ten o'clock of a Friday morning. Carole has finished her most recent film, "A Princess Comes Across." Daily, she's been working under hot lights, she's been fitted and refitted and she's worked pretty hard, and since then she's been relaxing. Every day for a week she and Fieldsie have gone and done things. And so on this particular Friday Carole says:

"C'mon, Fieldsie, let's go shopping today, have luncheon at the Brown Derby and then this afternoon, we'll go bumming. C'mon, get your hat and your glad rags and let's take the Ford. We'll step out."

Now, if you were a secretary and your boss was a glamorous star and she said that to you, you'd probably break all records dumping the morning mail into the wastebasket and hotfoot it for your bonnet. But not Fieldsie, by gosh. She's apt to say, leveling a stern glance at her employer:

"Don't you remember me? I'm the gal who works for you. I can't go out today. I have a job to do. Look at those letters! Look at all the bills that have to be totaled. I won't be through for days!"

And no amount of argument will sway her. Sometimes Carole

Can you picture Carole Lombard at an adding machine? No, we couldn't either until . . .

BEERY

MOST PEOPLE, who know him only on the screen, take Wally Beery for just a big, dumb guy who got a good break. But they are mistaken. Wallace Beery is one of the few stars who has never hired a business manager. He can attend to his own entirely. His present contract is one of the few in Hollywood studio files which calls for a salary several times more than the President of the United States receives. Contracts are usually drawn by lawyers, but Wally wrote his own and M-G-M's attorneys could find no fault with it.

Wally's investments and adventures in the stock market have not been as profitable as they could have been, but it has been more due to bad breaks than unwise judgment. He has made and lost several fortunes and is now collecting his fourth, if I am not mistaken.

Wallace Beery is a hard guy to figure. He plays the piano beautifully and writes music which would sell, if he would put it on the market—yet no photographer ever got a shot of Wally at the piano. On even the hottest of California summer days, he never goes in his swimming pool, at his Beverly Hills home, without putting on a leather jacket, tightly buttoned up around his bull-like neck. He does it to keep warm, he tells people.

He is a homely mug and always was, yet he was once the husband of Gloria Swanson, one of the screen's most glamorous women. He was making his first picture success then, playing the comic role of a Swedish hired girl at the old Essanay in Chicago. Wally wasn't handsome to anyone but Gloria, then but a baby starlet and not yet even a Mack Sennett bathing beauty. He owned a yellow Mercer roadster, which he drove fifty miles an hour over dirt roads, almost breaking the heart of his producer, who feared they would bring Wally home on a shovel, in the midst of a picture. It affected Gloria's heart, too, but in a different manner. She married him.

His father was a Kansas City cop and his mother

HOLLYWOOD'S BAD BOY

Wally Beery, screen roughneck, may heckle movietown, but he's actually putty in the small hands of a certain gal!

By J. Eugene Chrisman weighed 220 pounds. For a Sunday-go-to-meeting suit, Wally had to wear his old man's cut-down blue uniforms. To this day he hates a blue suit and will not wear one or associate with anyone who does. He hated piano lessons even more but stuck with them to please his doting Ma. He ran away from school—

"Not because I was the class dummy, but because I knew a fellow could learn more about geography and things in general by grabbing a freight train and seeing life than he could ever get out of books and such."

HE GOT a job in a circus and watered the elephants until he became a trainer. He ran into old Topsy, an elephant he had once handled as a trainer, on one of his sets in "O'Shaughnessy's Boy" and the old girl recognized him and trumpeted loudly until he came to see her.

Unlike other big stars, Wally eats lunch in the studio café. He always takes off his coat, drapes it over the back of his chair and takes down his suspenders. He has the appetite of a bull whale and doesn't like conversation when he eats, unless he meets a pal or two at the Vendome or the Hollywood Brown Derby, then he puts on the feed bag to the accompaniment of chin music.

He is a devoted husband and a real father to his adopted daughter, Carol Ann. He and the blonde Mrs. Beery are probably the best mated and happiest couple in all filmdom. When he was on location making "Treasure Island" at Catalina, he chartered a sea plane and, between scenes, flew it to the mainland where a fast car waited twenty-four hours a day, to rush him to the bedside of his very sick wife. He swears he will make an actress out of Carol Ann and she has already appeared with him in several films. He says that if ever he slips in pictures, he can sing for a living.

He is a speed demon and has a positive mania for anything which will go fast. He gets more kick out of a roller-coaster than Carol Ann does and he flies his big plane like a demon, but has never had a serious crack-up, although he has made many passengers' hair raise in fright-wigs style. Recently he flew Carol Ann to New York and back in two days just because he thought she'd enjoy seeing "Jumbo"! He spends weeks alone, or with Mrs. Beery, at his mountain lodge at Silver Lake, always flying his plane up and back. He is a licensed commercial pilot and probably the most experienced among all the air-minded stars.

In making "O'Shaughnessy's Boy" with Jackie Cooper, he had to wrestle a tiger. Proudly he invited the press to see him display his talent as a handler of the jungle demon. Instead of being a baddie, the tiger wanted to play and Wallace had to scratch him. But the man has no fear in him.

His favorite film is still "Robin Hood" and the things he would like most to forget are most of the comic pictures he and Raymond Hatton made as a comedy team.

HE IS fifty-six years old and admits it. He is six years older than his brother Noah and got the yen to become an actor when he heard that Noah was becoming a big shot by singing on the stage. He likes to play practical jokes on others but can take them, too. He will admit that he's lazy and he detests to be interviewed by writers or newspaper men—but he always has something worth printing to say.

When reading of the latest kidnapping or the latest gang crime or bank hold-up, (Continued on page 82)

A LADY IN LOVE

By Mildred Mastin

Pouf went practical plans when Helen Vinson married

"YOU can make careful plans for yourself, figure out wisely what you must achieve, and what you must avoid, then you fall in love—and pouf—your plans are gone like feathers in the wind."

It was Helen Vinson, bride of Tennis Champion Fred Perry, speaking. She sat, her hands full of snapshots, her eyes dwelling lovingly on the face that figured in each picture. "I act like a high school girl, don't I, dragging his photographs out all the time?" She gathered the pictures up with a little laugh and slipped them back into the dressing table drawer.

Well, perhaps she was acting like a high school girl. That isn't surprising, for she's in love. What was surprising was Helen's marriage to Perry in the first place. And the swift romance, culminating in the midnight wedding, amazed everybody who knew the young actress.

Helen Vinson had sworn, repeatedly, that she would never remarry. The breaking up of her first marriage had been a disillusioning and sorrowful experience for her. She was wed to her first husband when she was little more than a child, in her teens. She was too tall for her age, shy and awkward. Too self-conscious to enjoy much social life and not popular with boys of her own age, she had buried herself in books. Then there came into her life a man fifteen years her senior. He shared and appreciated her intellectual interests. He understood her! She thought it was love. She married the man. And, "For a while," she says, "I was ecstatically happy."

But as Helen matured, became poised and sure of herself and ambitious for an acting career, their paths grew farther and farther apart. They were divorced and Helen went to Hollywood.

"Shortly after I got there," she says, "someone told me that California law did not permit a divorcee to remarry until a year after the final (Continued on page 109)

THINGS JUST happen TO ANNE

By Lois Svensrud

Anne's only seventeen, but she's a star with five pictures planned for her. "Winterset" is one of the biggest.

I JUST couldn't be anything but a movie star. You see, I could never have gone to college, because I'm not smart enough to get the credits. I can't draw a line or write one, either. I can't run a typewriter or a sewing-machine. Why, I wouldn't be worth my soap as a laundress because I'd probably never master a washing-machine! So, I guess I'd just be a flop in anything but the movies."

The speaker is Anne Shirley. Yes, the same Anne Shirley who occupies such a bright spot in the cinema solar system.

Surprised? Well, weren't we! Here we'd come to get the gal's secrets-of-success-at-seventeen and relay them to a waiting world. We'd expected to get the usual veneer of sophistication plastered over a goodly supply of conceit.

And here was Hollywood's youngest grown-up star, attired in blue slacks and red bobby socks with the friendliest smile in the world. Focused on us was a pair of brown eyes as amazingly direct as the announcement that was just made.

"If there's any secret to my success," Anne was saying, "it's being just plain lucky enough to fall into work that I can do, instead of having to earn my living at something I'd never be any good at no matter how hard I tried. Because, you see, I practically did fall into it. I was only a year old when a photographer saw me on the street, in New York, with my mother and he asked her to let me model baby-clothes for an ad. A year or so later a talent scout from Fox's New York studio asked her to bring me out there. A role in William Farnum's "Miracle Child" was the result. And I was launched in moom pitchers as easily as that! It's funny, you know, but that's the way things seem to happen to me. I don't do much about it, but nice things just drift around, somehow."

THAT WAS fourteen years ago when Anne first emoted for the camera. What's more, it was real emoting. For the minute her eyes lit on the magnificent whiskers, which Bill Farnum had sprouted for the picture, Anne set up a howl that shook Manhattan. (Continued on page 80)

THAT CAGNEY Cyclone

By Martha Kerr

Jimmy claimed that playing two roughnecks a year was plenty and so he took his case to court. What's more he won it and was released from his Warner contract.

+ + + No Kansas tornado has the speed and force of Jimmy Cagney when he gets going Ardent tennis enthusiasts, Mr. and Mrs. James Cagney enjoy the matches together.

Jim made "Ceiling Zero," with June Travis, before his recent studio walkout.

THE IRISH are an extraordinary race. God bless them for delivering us from the awful monotony of continual calm.

It will be violating no confidence to reveal that Jimmy Cagney is Irish. The fact has been bruited about pretty generally. But he is not "professional" Irish. He himself has never traded upon it. Simply, it is one of those obvious and dominating actualities which simplify the work of the press. One writes, "Jimmy Cagney, fighting Irishman," and the story is practically complete with a little elaboration, which we shall tie right into with undisguised enthusiasm. No use trying to hold us back about Jim. We won't hold.

Any Irisher worth his salt, as you well know, is never really happy when things are going smoothly. He has to snarl them up somehow, and anything at hand is welcome which offers a certain way to embroil his affairs into a lovely turbulent riotous mess.

MANY A MAN would sit down in the midst of a serene, unwavering, dull success, and count his fortunes. The only thing with which he could reproach himself, possibly, would be the spare tire assembling about his middle. Well, this man bears no resemblance to Jim Cagney. Jim wouldn't give a spare tire a break, and if he ever indulges in self-reproach nobody knows anything about it.

Naturally, Jim goes around with a permanent Cause—the Irish have to have a Cause. Which means they are in the midst of a permanent fight. The Cause always has something to do with freedom—whether for a nation, a group, or an individual. And of course they are militant about personal freedom. As soon as they have it, most of them go right out and get tied up four other ways. They are so marvelous, the world would be utterly unendurable without them.

All you have to say is, "He's Irish," for any number of perfect strangers to break into warm expansive smiles and to extend a welcoming hand. It is a universal introduction, comparable with none other. You could say, "He has millions my deah, he swam the Hellespont, he just wrote a best-seller, he's an all-American half-back, women swoon for him, he can drink any man alive under the table and hold it like a gentleman"—and get no better results. Shucks, I'm not getting away with all this lofty generalization. You know whom I mean.

NOTHING SO captures our imagination or so endears an actor to his following as to have him run true to form—to follow through with the type of character he plays on the screen, in his actual life. It is extravagantly satisfying to discover that your favorite roughneck doesn't raise canaries or sit down and take it on the chin when he happens to be outside of camera range. The particular actor may be a headache to producers—but if they would figure it out calmly, it's money in the bank. A natural like that happens only once in a lifetime.

If all the world loves a lover, it loves a fighter just a little bit more. The fighter is not only going to get the girl—he's going to keep her. To paraphrase something I read somewhere, "Every girl has two sweethearts—her own and Jimmy Cagney."

When Jim enters a room, it has all the soporific effect of an electric shock. After years of knowing him, the effect never wears off. He is tangible. He is definite. He is what he is, with no distracting side issues to diminish it. Every gesture he makes has a beginning and a climax—swift, abrupt, and positive. His words are the same. He doesn't pick around cautiously over sure ground, feeling his way. He launches smack into the matter, whatever it is—discussion, argument, interview—and gives you something you can get a firm grip on, whether or not you can print it. He isn't sugar-coating (Continued on page 98)

The really big news of the month is that Joan Crawford's shoulders are four inches larger than Garbo's. Heretofore the melancholy Greta's measurements were considered tops in that department. But Joan has a tape measure to prove she has more shoulder than Garbo. Just think of the extra disdain that those four inches can give to a fine shrug.

Inveterate snoopers have finally located Myrna Loy's hideout. It's Lake Arrowhead. For months Myrna has been slipping out of Hollywood for quiet week-ends, but no one knew her destination until it was discovered she owns a lodge at Arrowhead. Evidence that wedding bells are in the offing for Myrna and producer Arthur Hornblow is that the lodge has just been enlarged.

When Bob Montgomery did his sulking last year it was because he was on a one-man strike against the superficial, wisecracking gents he'd been playing in almost every picture. No more of those, said Bob. So he took a long vacation, returned to the studio and the first picture he made was "Petticoat Fever" with Myrna Loy. It's a story of the far north, and we were surprised to find Bob playing the same wisecracking gent he had walked out on some months before. Hollywood or Labrador, it looks like there's no escape for Robert.

Another surprise was Joan Crawford Tone's large reception for Leopold Stokowski, which turned out to be one of the social events of the past season. Joan's parties, heretofore, had always been gatherings of intimate friends, but some four hundred invited guests showed up to greet the famous conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony, who seemed to be enjoying himself immensely. Perhaps because no one asked him to bring his baton.

This month's title-changing championship goes to Frank Capra's "Mr. Deeds Goes To Town." Originally it was called "Opera Hat," but the opera sequences were removed and the hat didn't fit. "A Gentleman Goes To Town" was the next title, but just when everybody was sitting back it was discovered that M-G-M owned a story called "A Lady Goes To Town." Rather than have the gentleman bump into the lady in every theatre in the land, Mr. Capra changed his title to "Cinderella Man." Someone said M-G-M owned the rights to that title. M-G-M was contacted. Go ahead and use it, M-G-M said. Then it turned out that M-G-M didn't own the rights at all. Another studio owned the title, and they wouldn't give it up. Soooooo—"Mr. Deeds (after some hesitation) Goes To Town."

Treason Note: The immaculate whiteness of the picket fence surrounding the Toluca Lake Park home of Walt (Mickey Mouse) Disney's brother is sullied by an unknown's pencil sketches. Mr. Disney doesn't mind that so much, but the drawings are of Mickey's arch rival, Popeye, the Sailor!

Spent our first day at Palm Springs recently and now we know why everyone who visits the place wants to go native. It is, just as the ads put it, terrific. Saw a number of picture people lounging around the El Mirador pool baking out their income tax worries and watching Anita Louise do some posing for a photographer from her studio. Anita posed sitting, standing and lying beside the pool, and posed gracefully, but somewhat timorously, on the end of the diving board. Then she startled everyone by actually going in for a swim. And just when we had decided that Hollywood bathing suits never get wet!

Dave Butler, who has directed most of Shirley Temple's pictures, is one of Miss T.'s favorite men. During the shooting of "Captain January," H. G. Wells dropped in on the set and production stopped while everyone met the great English author. Shirley, who hasn't yet read much Wells, asked her mother who he was. "Why," said Mrs. Temple, "he's one of the greatest men in the world." "Oh, no," said Shirley. "There's God, and then there's Mr. Butler."

Two years ago she was June Vlasek, playing extra roles and glad to get them. Now she's June Lang, and 20th Century-Fox is planning big things for her. She's the gal who plays the schoolmarm in "Captain January," and Fox executives are so impressed by her possibilities that, according to rumors, she is about to be presented with a $6,000 dressing-room. All of which comes under the head of nice going.

When Ann Sothern departed these hills for New York by plane recently, Cesar Romero presented her with a box of jumbled mosaics to while away her time in the air. Mosaics, in case you don't know, are tiny blocks of wood, something like a jig-saw puzzle. Ann worked on the thing all the way to New York, spilling the entire box whenever the plane struck an air pocket. About fifty miles past Pittsburgh she finally got the thing together. It turned out to be a picture of herself.

Gene Raymond's still boasting about the 80-pound marlin he hooked off Palm Beach a couple of months ago. Fay Wray is the jumpingest gal in town. Jumping from London to New York to Hollywood, she remained here only a few weeks when she hopped back to New York and then to Nassau to spend a short vacation with hubby John Monk Saunders, who commuted from London and back to see her. After Nassau, Fay leaped back to New York and on to Hollywood, where a picture assignment awaited her. We think it's nice that its title is "Roaming Lady."

A goodly percentage of moviedom's famous were on view at the annual Awards banquet of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts to see Bette Davis, Victor McLaglen, et al, receive the gold statuette which is known familiarly in Hollywood as Oscar. Naturally, Oscar is the most popular guy in town on that night of nights, and everyone awaits with bated breath the announcement which awards him to the top stars, director and picture of the year. As a matter of fact, the winners, who are supposed to be as surprised as anybody, know the results long before the announcement is made. They know because they're asked downstairs where there is a facsimile of the speakers' table and a battery of cameras which photographs their acceptance several hours before they actually do any accepting.

The real star of the evening was D. W. Griffith, who was awarded a special Oscar for his contribution to the development of motion pictures. The great director of "The Birth of a Nation" was so touched by Hollywood's acclaim that he unconsciously joined in the applause for himself. His brief and dramatic speech was easily the high point of the evening.

Romance Dept.: Bob Taylor has been devoting most of his time to Barbara Stanwyck these evenings, while Irene Hervey is being seen about with Allan Jones . . . Jean Harlow's closest pal is still Bill Powell, and vice versa . . . Jeanette MacDonald giving most of her spare hours to Gene Raymond . . . rumors are persistent that John Barrymore is furnishing a home, and when it's completely furnished it will contain Elaine (Ariel) Barrie . . . and the newest big romance is Cary Grant and Mary Brian.

Incidentally, when the Brian lass returned from England she found her Toluca Lake home completely redecorated. Whether Mary was as glad, as she was surprised, is difficult to record, for the decorations were strictly not in the Billy Haines manner. The artists who went to work on it were her Toluca neighbors, which include the Stu Erwins, Glenda Farrell, Jack Oakie and W. C. Fields. Some of the Fields touches are still on exhibit for those of Mary's friends who can take it.

Lunched with Joe E. Brown a few weeks ago, we were surprised to find him a quiet, serious-minded guy. He had just come from having an impression of his mouth immortalized in concrete in the forecourt of Grauman's Chinese. You can't put your mouth in concrete, he discovered, because your nose gets in the way. So someone took a trowel, and with two generous sweeps made an impression of what the Brown mouth ought to look like. We asked Joe E. about his being among the first ten box-office attractions of 1935, and it's his belief that the kids put him there. He watches his fan mail carefully, and whenever a youngster complains about a scene in one of his pictures he starts to worry. For example, when his own daughter saw him eating with his knife in one of his epics she said, "That's not my daddy." Joe didn't sleep for a week.

The Dionne Quintuplets, whose only rival for female pulchritude is Shirley Temple, have now formally made their screen debut and can safely rest on their laurels. It might interest them to know that little Miss Temple was taken to see their picture. Someone asked her how she liked it and Shirley replied, "I think children are cute in the movies."

Dr. Joel Pressman put Mrs. Pressman (Claudette Colbert) plus flowers, candy, etc., on the train bound for New York the other night. Imagine his surprise when an hour later Claudette arrived home plus flowers, candy, etc.! It seems that, enroute to the depot, the doctor had slammed his fingers in the car door and, just as the train pulled out, Claudette began worrying so much about her husband's wounded condition that she jumped off, flagged a taxi and tore home. And here they've been married for over two months. However, satisfied that the injury was minor, Claudette finally made the trip.

Preston and his wife, who's paid him only two compliments during his entire career.

NO FLATTERY, PLEASE!

HOLLYWOOD'S Public Enemy No. 1 is in our midst," said Preston Foster grimly. "He's lurking in ambush. He's a sneak, a decoy, a destroyer. He's subtle and sinuous and soft. He steals on us unawares. The G-men can't get him because he's bodiless. He can't be put behind bars because he's invisible. He attacks his victims individually. And each one has to do his own fighting. If we rout the enemy we're as safe as actors ever are. If he defeats us we're as done as cold baked potatoes.

"And Hollywood's mortal enemy is not any one of the things it has been said to be—neither too much wealth nor the 'other woman.'

"No, Hollywood's mortal enemy is 'I'! I...I...I...the Great Mogul, Me . . . the puffy-headed, swelled-chested, know-it-all I!

"And when that enemy downs a man that man is dead. I've seen good actors turn into stuffed shirts. I've seen hard-working, humble kids transformed into strutting popinjays. I've seen swell girls metamorphosed into silly manikins with their noses in the air and their brains removed from their golden heads.

"I know a chap, who was a big box-office star a couple of years ago. He was so badly smitten by the enemy that he wouldn't even act in most of his long shot scenes. He had his stand-in do his acting for him while he stood with his eye screwed to the camera lens, directing how things should be done. He was so good in his own esteem that his job wasn't big enough for him—he had to direct and supervise the script and camera work besides. He had an ego complex in maniacal form. Well, he isn't sitting very pretty now. It's a known fact that when we begin to think we're pretty good others think we're pretty bad."

Preston Foster, big, hearty and unactorish, lounged in his chair opposite me. He struck me as a combination of Clark Gable and Spencer Tracy. He has some of Clark's complete casualness and debunking quality, with the ruggedness and stark simplicity of Spencer Tracy. In other words, he is a man's man.

I said, "But aren't there some ways and means of defeating the enemy?"

"Sure there are," said Preston, "hold on while Doc Foster writes a prescription. (Continued on page 112)

MRS. KIES dropped her bundles unceremoniously at the foot of the stairs and bounded up them, two at a time crying, "Margaret! Margaret! I'm coming, dear!" The sound of Margaret screaming and the smell of something burning put panic in her heart.

Margaret, you know her today as Margaret Lindsay, looked up calmly and grinned at her mother. "Hello," she said. She was standing in front of the long dressing table mirror, swathed in some sort of fancy lace drapery—and she was holding a lighted candlestick in her hand! But no enveloping flames!

Mrs. Kies sank down weakly on the bed, "Oh, Margaret," she said, "I thought something awful was happening to you!"

"Oh, no!" that one said pleasantly. "Nothing's happening to me except I'm learning to (Continued on page 107)

DO WOMEN SPOIL MEN?

DO YOU think that women spoil men?" I asked the beautiful Virginia Bruce. And she replied, "I don't know whether they do or not, but—they should."

" 'Should'? "

"Yes, definitely should." And then Virginia said one of the most selfless things I've ever heard a woman say about the man she loved and will always love.

She said, with such sincerity, that she is glad John Gilbert had Marlene Dietrich to spoil him in those last months of his life. It was so good for him, Virginia said. Marlene bolstered up his ego, which so badly needed bolstering. He could, she explained, still feel that he hadn't lost the compelling fire of the "great lover" when he could attract one of the most glamorous women in the world. She knew how kind Marlene had been to Jack. She watched over him and she saw to it that he was happy and entertained.

"I wasn't with him," said Virginia. "I couldn't be. So I am glad that Marlene was, for that is exactly what I mean when I say that women should spoil men.

"I may marry again one of these days," Virginia said. "I am not the sort of person to want to go through life a woman alone. I'm not independent enough. And I'm wise enough to know it. But it will be difficult for me to find, ever again, anyone so vital, so electric as Jack Gilbert was.

"Perhaps we were both fated, Jack and I. For here is a curious thing that happened to me before I came to Hollywood. A long time before, when I was just a schoolgirl back home in North Dakota, I went to a clairvoyant one day and she told me that I was destined for tragedy.

"I didn't think," said Virginia, "that it would come so finally—or so soon.

"Perhaps part of my tragedy will be that I do spoil men. I seem to be the type to attract men who are much stronger and more forceful than I am.

"I think," said Virginia, "that it is not irrelevant to what we are talking about for me to speak of Jack. Because, after all, my belief that women should spoil men and most of my theories about the relationships between men and women spring, naturally, from my marriage to Jack.

"Certainly, if the husband is the dominant factor, the wife quite naturally defers to him, waits on him, obeys him. I was like that and I think I always shall be. I always feel young and inexperienced when I am with a man who interests me. I feel like a child who is being taken out by an older person, and who really should be seen and not heard!

"I always do what I am told to do—even as I did in my marriage. I never dreamed, when I was married, of interfering with anything my husband wanted to do. I never thought of opposing my will to his. If there was any waiting-on to be done, I did it. I wouldn't have dreamed of asking Jack to run downstairs to get me a book or to run any errand for me. If he wanted to be with his friends, for instance, it never occurred to me to join them unless I was asked.

"Men should have a masculine world into which neither wife nor sweetheart should intrude.

"Men need spoiling more than women do, contrary to some opinion. Biologically, if in no other way, men are the ones who are supposed to go out into the world and fight for success. In order to win that success, men should be sent forth armored with self-importance and the conviction that they are pretty darn good, no one any better. And if that ego is deflated by a demanding, argumentative sort of a woman, he is licked before he starts. I think," said Virginia, "that a man who is made to feel abused is the most pathetic object in the whole world.

"Women may need the kisses, but men need the pats on the shoulder.

"Just consider the movie marriages which have been the most successful, the most long-lived . . . the Jean Hersholts, the Warner Baxters, the John Boles, Virginia and Jack Gilbert on the day they wed. Their love was ill-starred, but it gave her an unusual slant on men.

Susan Ann Gilbert, Jack's and Virginia's lovely child. She fared royally in her late father's will.

And Virginia herself in the gay fripperies of her role in "The Great Ziegfeld."

Virginia Bruce's answer to this question may not be yours, but the men will agree with her unanimously!

the Bob Montgomerys, the Preston Fosters, the Paul Munis, the Leslie Howards—they illustrate what I mean. For, in every one of those marriages, the man is the bread-winner, the conquering hero, the star. The wives are what all women should be—just wives. If they had careers, they sacrificed them to those of their husbands. They gave their men the limelight.

AND THEN, on the other hand, consider the marriages where the wives have been the big stars—they didn't do any spoiling, they were the spoiled ones—and so were their marriages.

"Women should be," said this young Virginia with the very mature mind, "two things to their men—mothers and children. Mothers, when it comes to home things, children when it comes to big things. And I think that's just what successful wives are. I know that Mrs. Howard mothers Leslie at home—sees to it that his ties and socks match, that he eats the right things, gets the proper amount of sleep. I know that Mrs. Muni goes on the sets with Paul to make sure that he eats regular meals, is not overtired and doesn't have to think of small details. But in the large affairs of life these wives take orders!

"I think that a great many modern women are spoiling men—but not in the right way. I mean the women who are professional, who earn money, who take away from men the right to be the head of the house.

"I don't mean that women should sacrifice their careers, if they have careers which are really vital to them and to the world. But I do think they should be clever about their professional lives. They should spoil their men in the loving way, not the destructive way. They should pretend that they work because it amuses them, not because it is necessary.

WHY BART MARSHALL gets YOU !

Quiet Englishman he may be, but now you'll see why he is popular with men and fascinating to women

I ONCE heard a beautiful woman say, "I would be afraid to fall in love with Herbert Marshall. I know I'd never get over it." And she was lovely, very young, very self-confident. Yet she admitted that she would be afraid to fall in love with the dark, tall man his friends call "Bart."

Norma Shearer once explained him this way. She said, "Women are attracted to him because he has a beautiful courtesy and because he suffers so!"

And Gloria Swanson, still one of Hollywood's most fascinating women, has eschewed all other escorts for him.

A friend of mine said, recently, "Bart is so really kind. For instance, if a bunch of us get together and someone is on the pan and the conversation gets a bit caustic, Bart will always check it before it goes too far, saying, 'Oh, but we all make the same mistakes, you know,' or 'We might do the same thing ourselves under similar circumstances.' And he always uses the 'we,' including himself. He's a sweet guy, no foolin'." And it was a man speaking—a man named Robert Montgomery.

The boys on the set at the studio—the sound men, props, electricians—said to me, "Mr. Marshall remembers all of our names and faces the day after we start to work—and the names of our wives and kids, too. He remembers that my Sammy has the measles and that Bill's Jim fell off his bike. He seems to care, too. He's reg'lar, he is!"

Bill Seiter, directing "If You Could Only Cook," a recent picture of Bart's, said to me, "Bart is a magnificent fellow—and what an actor! He'll work until he drops dead. Nothing is too much trouble for him. He never complains, is never 'difficult'—I'm nuts about him!"

Everywhere men say, "He's a grand guy." And everywhere women say, something wistful in their voices,

By Faith

Bart, at home. You'll be enjoying him next in "Till We Meet Again" with Gertrude Michael.

Witty Gloria Swanson is one of Bart's most constant companions. He says he's not a domestic man and likes best to "talk shop" with stage and screen people.

"There's something about Herbert Marshall . . . ."

Now, in Hollywood, as in all small towns, there are gossips who dip their tongues, now and again, in the broth called vitriol. No matter how deserving a person may be, no matter how popular, there is usually some one to pop up, like the devil, and do a mite of lambasting. But never once has the devil popped up, in my hearing, where Bart is concerned. And it's not because I haven't been around, either. I've even prodded the gossips to see whether I could draw sparks. Not one. And I was intrigued. It seemed logical to me, a Marshall fan myself, ever since "Trouble in Paradise" set us all Marshall-mad, to believe that women feel about him as they actually do.

I felt sure that he is, as Bob Montgomery said, tolerant and kindly. I could observe the "beautiful courtesy" for myself and I sensed in him a certain haunting and faintly sorrowful "remembrance of things past." But I wondered why he is as he is. By what road has he travelled? Has the hand of Destiny been, for him, a mailed fist or a soft kid glove? I thought it would be interesting to try to take the Marshall apart, to find out how he ticks and why, to analyze the makings of the man he is today.

BART AND I had tea together. And I mean tea. In the living-room of his Beverly Hills Hotel bungalow. The walls were book-lined, firelight painted both the walls and the gravely attentive face of the man talking to me. A terrifically modest man he is, I'll tell you that. Not articulate when it comes to talking about himself. He has, indeed, the apologetic manner of one who would say, "But you don't really care to hear all this about me. . . ." It took considerable persistence on my part, and a great deal of that "beautiful courtesy" on his, for me to get what I did.

And this is the way I got it:

On the wall hung framed photographs. One was of a young couple, Ethel Turner and Percy Marshall, Bart's mother and father—rather a pathetic young couple, timid and frightened looking. One was of three little ladies, frilled and deliciously

SYLVIA SIDNEY PLAYS Truth

By Katherine Albert

WITH HER divorce from Bennett Cerf hardly cold in its grave, I asked Sylvia Sidney to play the game of "Truth." However, there were to be some new rules. Sylvia was not only to be "It," but all the other players as well. I wanted her to look herself squarely in the face—obviously an impossible feat—and tell what she thought was wrong. I wanted a complete confession of all her faults because in that way, we could get at the root of a lot things which have been worrying people about Sylvia.

When this fantastic idea was suggested, she and I were lunching at the Vendome. Sylvia was all done up in the smoothest riding habit in town. The only difference between Sylvia and a lot of other movie stars was that Sylvia actually had been riding.

"You've come to the wrong person," she told me, when I suggested she play "Truth" with herself. "Why don't you just wander from table to table at this restaurant and ask, 'What's wrong with Sidney?' The only trouble is that you'd be here for days."

I explained everything again. I wanted the brutal, frank words from Sylvia herself. I wanted to find out why she and a nice guy like Cerf couldn't get along.

"Oh, it isn't that I'm stalling," Sylvia said. "I know myself as well—better, than anybody in the world. I know my faults and I'm not afraid to tell about them. Heaven knows, nobody else has ever hesitated to tell me. But then, I like that. I want the truth—straight out. And I give it. So that brings us to one of my major faults.

"I am completely without tact. I'm impelled to say what I think and I can't help showing people how I feel about them. If I like a person, he knows it. If I don't—well, he knows that, too. You see, I can't turn charm on and off. I admire people who can, they get lots farther. But I can't do it—that's all. And when I make the effort to do it, which I almost never do, it is completely phoney.

"People must understand that about me and accept my complete tactlessness.

"THE BEST friend I have in the world is a girl who bawled me out the first time we ever met. It was at the Theatre Guild School. She was several years older than I. We had just been introduced when she said, 'What's wrong with you? You're just a kid yet you pile on so much lipstick that nobody can see your mouth. Don't do it!'

"That's how the friendship began. (I've very few friends, which is another fault.) Not long ago, this same girl visited me here in Hollywood. When we said good-bye, at the station, she gave me a good bawling out about the way I was managing my life. I like that. I say what I think to people. I want that from them.

"I used to have an ungovernable temper. I've controlled it—but not because I'm going sweetness and light all over the place. I stopped having rages simply because it seemed silly to play big emotional scenes that I didn't get paid for. I save the fireworks for the camera now. I'm afraid to give my emotions.

"When I was in one of those tempers the words poured out like hot lava. I was completely articulate. I wasn't one of those who say later, 'Oh, I wish I'd thought to say that at the time.' I thought to say it at the time, and regretted it the next day.

"My tempers always ended by my throwing something across the room. Vases simply weren't safe around me. And once I threw a potted plant. But those words and gestures can't be recalled. Always, after one of my tempers, I'd actually be ill for days. I couldn't eat, I couldn't sleep.

"I can't say I've mastered my temper, even now. I still feel the same inside, the only difference is that now I simply shut my mouth on the words and walk out of the room. Inside I'm seething but, at least, I have no regrets the next day."

She paused for breath and straightened the coat of her riding habit. "Oh, yes, I'm sloppy. I know it but can't seem to do anything about it. Howard Greer, who is not (Continued on page 103)

DO YOU BELIEVE IN MIRACLES?

If, as is Bette Davis', your bust is inclined to be large, it can be safely reduced.

WELL, DO YOU? Because I do! I've seen too many of them, out Hollywood way, not to believe in them.

I know that you can work miracles on your body. And when I say "work," I mean work. You can't do it by wishing, or quack methods or hocus-pocus. But faith in yourself plus the necessary work has turned many a miracle before this.

There are certain parts of the body which, if they are not naturally beautiful and symmetrical, most women are inclined to give up for lost. The legs, for instance. The breasts. The contour of one's face and particularly the shape of one's nose.

Now children (that's what you all are to me, whether you are six or sixty), you know by this time that I never mislead you in my articles with a lot of fine-sounding clap-trap that doesn't mean anything. I'm not reneging on my statement that you can work miracles, because that is true. On the other hand, it would be wrong to tell you that you can take a pair of legs which are thick and heavy because of their bone construction and turn them into a pair of Dietrich-like appendages. But believe me you can do wonders with that same pair of heavy legs by getting rid of any excess fat or bulging muscles, and shape them as you never had hoped possible. However there is a limit.

BUT LISTEN, darlings, wouldn't it be quite worth while to reduce the calf, say, one and a half inches—which is quite possible? And slim the ankles down perhaps an inch? That, too, is quite possible. If your bust is large and lacking in lovely lines, as Bette Davis' is inclined to be, there is plenty you can do to acquire, as near as possible, the exquisite proportions of a Harlow or a Rochelle Hudson. You can reduce the bust by proper diet to a remarkable extent and firm up the muscles by exercise.

Now I've been honest about this thing. Are you going to be sensible about it? You'd better! Are you going to be sensible enough to say, "I may not be the most beautiful creature in the world, because of this or that, but I can—and I will—be as lovely as is within my power"? People who have some unhappy physical handicap are inclined to put on a great show of indifference and make believe that they care little for the acclaim which all the world pays to beauty. But they can't fool mama. You've heard them . . . the sad little birds, at dances, who spend most of the evening out in the powder room, playing like they're waiting for someone. A pathetic game it is, too. The girls who say, with a sweet-sour smile, "I really don't care much for boys." The women whom life passes by. Such people make me want to do two things: first I want to sit down and have a good cry with them. Then I want to give them a good, hearty smack between the shoulder blades and say, "What the devil's the matter with you anyway? Snap out of it! It's your own fault that you are as you are. Get busy and stop sulking!"

Sorry, children, I didn't mean to fly off the handle like that. I'm just trying to tell you a few things you must do if (Continued on page 83)

HER BOARDING HOUSE DAYS

Ann Harding's fellow boarders didn't think she'd get far. "No warmth," they claimed!

By Frank Easton

Decorations by Bill Holman

FOURTEEN YEARS ago Ann Harding lived in a boarding house at 322 West 88th Street, New York City. Young, unsophisticated, eager for success, she wandered in and out with either a history book or a volume of Shakespeare under her arm. She dressed conservatively, almost drably, with a peculiar flair for unmatched pieces! The world was her oyster and she was looking for the pearls only.

That was in 1921.

During the long years since, Ann Harding has become a stage star and a screen celebrity with a salary reputed to be over five thousand dollars a week. She has been married, is the mother of a child, still wears cotton stockings and has subsequently been divorced. Her career has once been on the verge of a complete collapse.

But in 1935 . . . .

She made "Peter Ibbetson" and presto! Ann had made her comeback, salvaged her career.

But to get back to the story I have to tell you. Monroe Owsley and I, back in 1921, were in New York. We were attending Columbia University and had taken rooms at 322 West 88th Street.

Our first night at dinner we were put at a table with the Gatlee family—a mother and two daughters. Edith, a dark-haired siren, was secretary down Wall Street way. But Dorothy, a blonde, had given up her secretarial job, changed her name to Ann Harding and was studying for the stage.

It wasn't long before Owsley and I got to know the Gatlees quite well, especially Ann.

Strange girl, Ann, but fascinating. Quiet, studious and aloof, she seemed to live in a world of her own, a world of ideals and ambitions which she kept carefully concealed from even those who thought they knew her well. She moved in a self-produced atmosphere of peculiar detachment, not resentful of people exactly, but fearful rather.

The folks at the boarding house never really knew Ann. She wasn't much of a mixer, so they thought her cold and austere—too much so to ever make a success on the stage. They constantly prattled about her lack of warmth and understanding.

Not that she wasn't popular. She was. Everybody liked her. But everybody stood just a little bit in awe of her. She was charming, but she never invited confidences from people, and never for a moment allowed any one to break down the gates to her little world of isolated decorum. She was the nearest thing I ever saw to an upper class English woman, living in well-bred seclusion and viewing the passing show of life daintily, speculatively, almost timidly.

But underneath all this frigid exterior Ann was, and still is, thoroughly human and understanding. She's still consumed with a burning ambition and is one of the most sympathetic persons I've ever known. That's why she has been a success, and why, after having suffered a career-collapse, she will shoot right to the top again.

Back in those days in 1921 times were difficult and money scarce. Ann's father and mother were separated. The salary of an army officer isn't large and their income was, I suppose, sufficient to furnish the necessities, but the scheming done to make ends meet took the brains of a financial wizard. That was Mrs. Gatlee's job—her daughters were a great help. Edith worked and bought her own clothes. As for Ann, she didn't care whether she had any or not. She was totally disinterested in clothes, being as happy and contented in a cheap print dress as in a Hattie Carnegie ensemble—it was all the same to Ann.

Few people outside the theatre realize the struggles and hardships of show business. The world sees the few who arrive, after they have arrived, and sees only the glamor connected with the stage and screen, not the thwarted hopes and aspirations, the disappointments that they have endured.

Night after night Ann would come home dog tired from tramping the streets around (Continued on page 96)

Clothes

LOOKING AT MY calendar this month, I discovered that this issue presents a little problem, whether you know it or not. Why? Well, there are all of you who are about to step off into matrimony between now and the end of June—you want news about trousseaux and such. But there are all you others who, although you are interested in weddings, too, are much more worried about the first week-end holiday that happens along about Decoration Day—you want to know how to pack enough clothes into a suitcase to knock the eye out of any prospective bridegroom, of a year from this June, that might happen to loom up!

Una Merkel tells you what to Left to right below, you see two more evening gowns that hang in the Merkel closet ready for traveling orders! A net and lace affair with jacket—and a dinner gown of silk crepe with soft lace trimming. For sports activities, active or passive, there's a white silk shirtmaker dress with blue accents. And for general daytime use, a navy blue two-piece dress printed in white stars.

Black lace for evening is not only smart but a good traveler. Una loves all the flare of this one.

that go places!

to pack for those first week-end holiday trips ahead

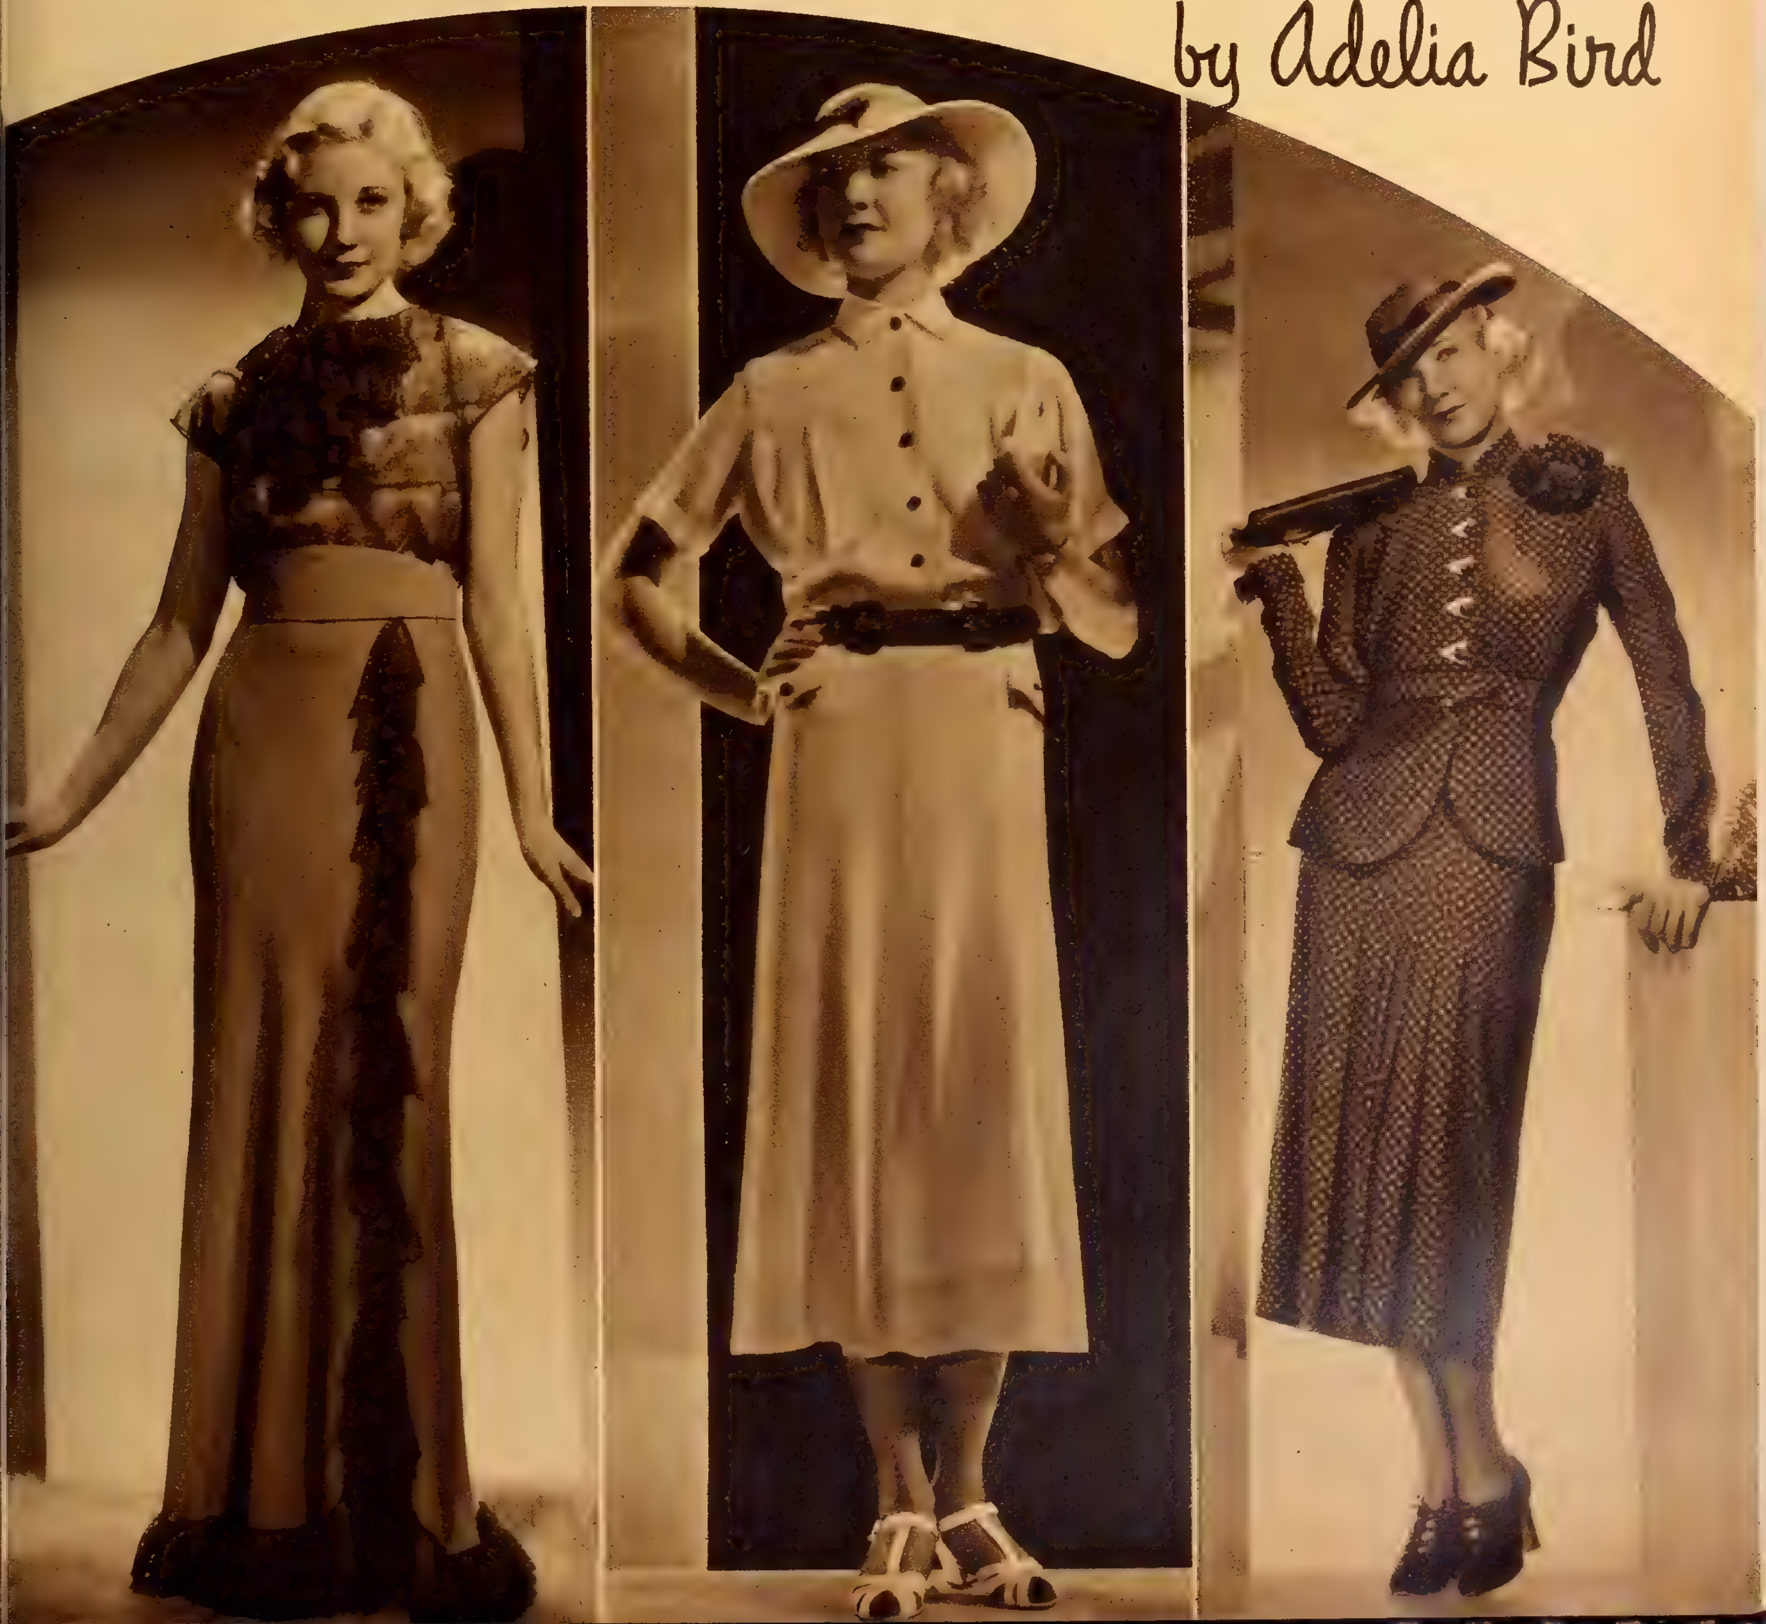
by Adelia Bird

So-o, tossing a coin—and cheating a bit because Una Merkel came into the picture right then, the brides lost until next month when their turn will come. Meanwhile, they can get some excellent trousseau tips from the grand clothes which Una has contributed to this story.

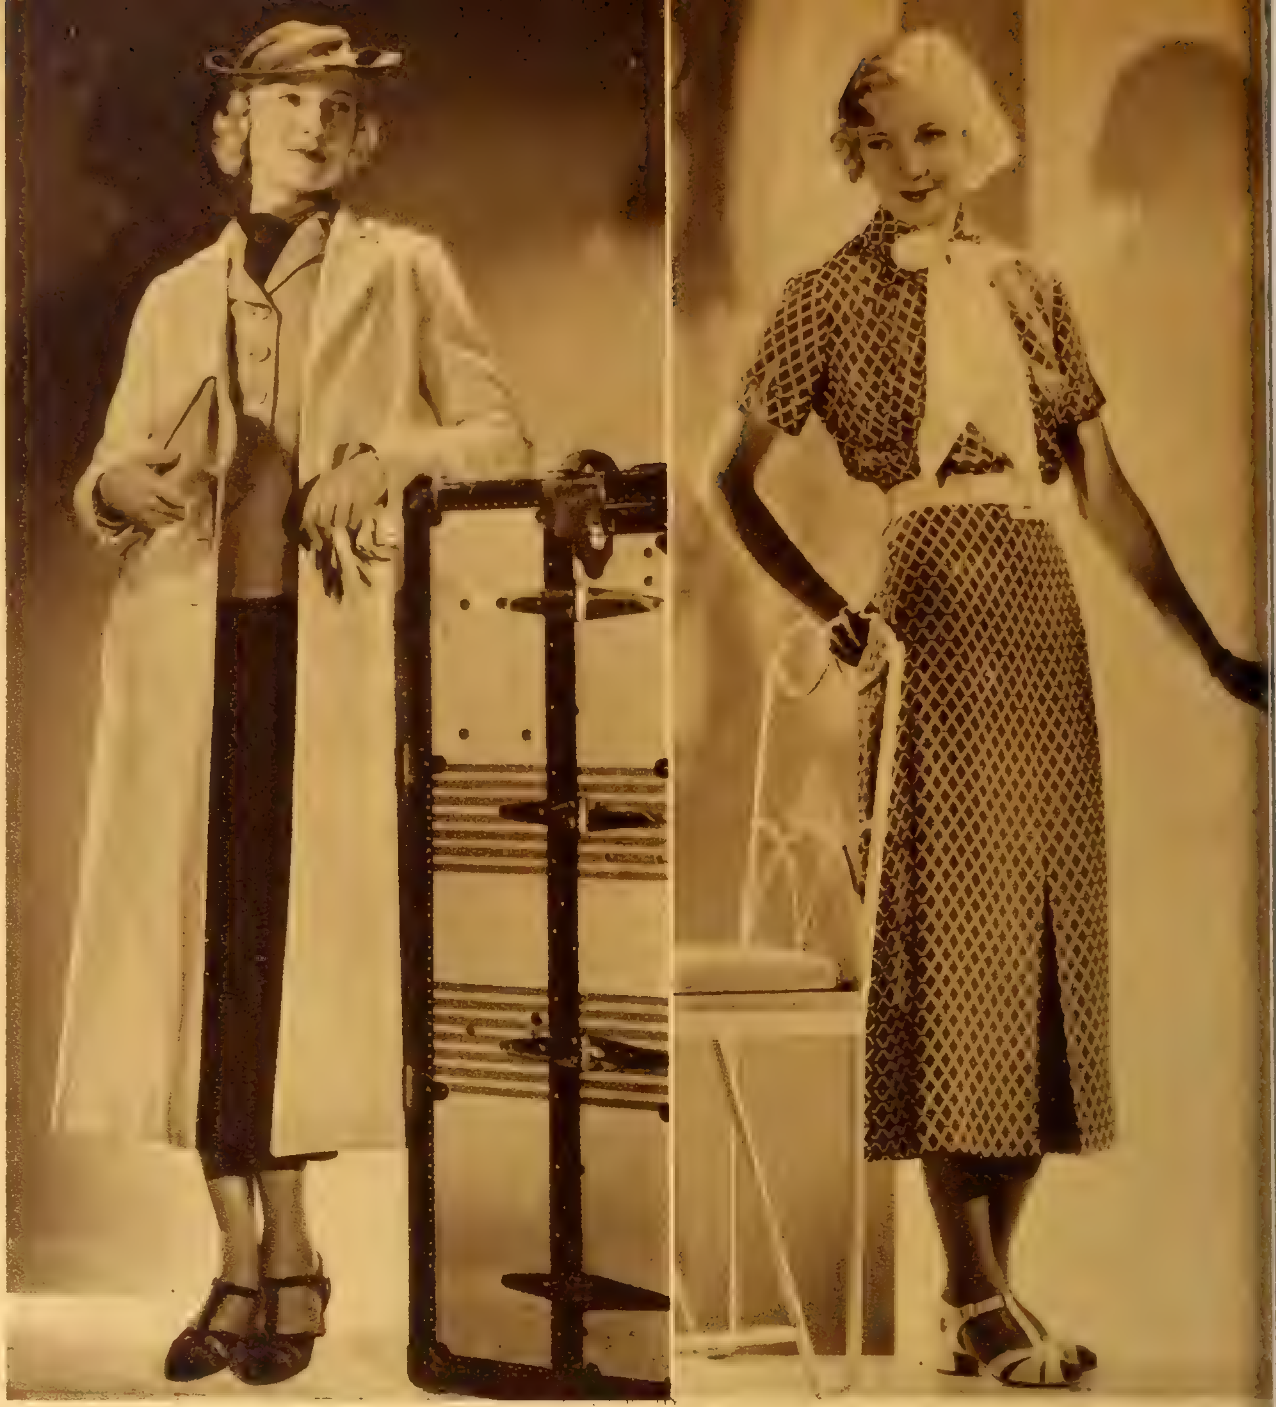
Hollywood, as you know, has the most week-end holidaying crowd in the country. A brief dash out of town is about the only way many stars get a vacation at all between pictures. And although they live in sports clothes during the day, they have to take clothes with them that will meet unexpected party demands. Palm Springs, that beautiful desert resort, is a great week-end favorite because it's within easy driving distance of Hollywood, yet far enough away to insure a rest from the studios' demands.

What is worn by the smart stars at Palm Springs is a pretty good guide to what you will want to wear this summer at nearby lake and seaside resorts. Palm Springs is like Florida in this respect; it forecasts trends for all of us who can't get away until the hot summertime is practically upon us.

Here are just a few of the fashions that have been spotted on recent week-ends at such favorite Palm Springs gathering places as the El Mirador, the Desert



At right, you see two more of Una's week-end fashions story. First there's the three-piece suit she wears for travel—red, white and blue basket weave woolen, a patriotic trio for Decoration Day week-end. Blue skirt, red jacket and white coat. A green and white silk print is an extra sports dress that's easy to pack.



Inn and the Racquet Club. White in costumes leads as far as colors are concerned—and the white costume is nearly always accented by a color. Next, after white, come those costume shades that look so new and exciting this year—probably because they are more vibrant than the pastel shades which we have become used to for summer. Many yellow shades, ranging from chamois to daffodil. Pinks in the watermelon and coral tones. Aqua and turquoise blues and loads of the new purple blues.

Ann Sothern, who gets away to the desert as quickly as a picture is finished, has a knitted silk swim suit in aqua blue—this is very form fitting. She has another one of more formal design in the popular Tahitian flower print. This is in a brown and white color combination and is particularly attractive with Ann's blonde hair and fair skin.

Although shorts are still on the up for popularity in active sports, more and more divided skirts, known as culottes, are seen. Stars are taking to this style more slowly than you would think, it being such a happy compromise between slacks and shorts. I think the reason for this is that they have been devoted to slacks for so long, that they don't welcome any innovations in the skirt line. Speaking of the culotte, however, Ann also numbers a culotte costume in her desert week-end wardrobe. Hers looks like a green silk shirtwaist dress but has the divided skirt instead of the usual pleated one.

When slacks are worn, and that is most of the day, whether in Hollywood or down in the desert, color contrast is cleverly used. One young starlet, with an eye to the unusual, wore wine red slacks pin striped in white with a yellow tweed, mannish jacket. Another gal, with a more feminine turn of mind, wore pink pique pajamas with a blue sweater. Mannish jackets in bright colors are preferred for slack costumes—shirts and blouses also of a tailored type to go with these.

Back to Ann again, she wears an ice-blue linen-like cotton coat dress that has the unique feature of a halter neck top. This is one of her pet week-end dresses, along with a one-piece linen in yellow.

A new idea in informal dinner dancing costumes has been seen recently at Palm Springs and it may develop into a fashion for all of you. It is an afternoon-length dress given formal trimmings and accessories. For example, one pioneering gal appeared in a very sheer wool dress, made simply with a rather high collared neckline and short sleeves, the belt, collar clip and bracelet being of brilliant jewels! Still another wore an evening jacket of brocaded satin over a finely pleated chiffon skirt of average afternoon dress length. It's something to experiment with, if you like to be the first to start something!

Enough of what goes on at Palm Springs—and what of Una Merkel, are you saying? Well, Una up and offered her own personal week-end or vacation travel suggestions for all of you to copy. Una and her young husband, Ronald Burla, have to be ready to snatch a quick vacation trip whenever Una has a moment to spare between pictures. And, as Una says, she can't stop to shop elaborately for clothes when she and Ronnie have to be ready to leave almost as soon as the idea occurs to them. So, as a result, Una keeps clothes on hand that she can depend upon to be adequate for any crazy trip they may suddenly decide to take.

There's nothing formal or "big star" about Una—she's just a charming, unspoiled Southern girl who has made a success but hasn't let it change her. That's why I think she's such a swell person to talk about vacation clothes—she has to snatch quick holidays the way we all do and she doesn't dress (Continued on page 86)

A delightful way to aid DIGESTION

Traffic—irregular meals—the responsibilities of running a home—no wonder digestion feels the strain of our speeded-up existence. That's why people everywhere welcome the fact that Camel cigarettes aid digestion—normally and naturally. Scientists explain that smoking Camel cigarettes increases the flow of digestive fluids, fostering a sense of well-being and encouraging good digestion. Enjoy Camel's mildness—with meals—between meals—whenever and as often as you choose. Their finer, costlier tobaccos never get on your nerves—never tire your taste—and definitely aid digestion.

Fastidious women turn instinctively to Camel's costlier tobaccos. Among them are:

ABOARD UNIVERSAL'S 'SHOWBOAT'

It's been reunion time out on the "Showboat" set where Irene Dunne is reviving her famous stage role of Magnolia. Many of the original cast have come back to play with her, among them Helen Morgan and Charles Winninger, the first "Cap'n Henry." This part and its romantic songs are dear to Irene.

SECRET BEGINNINGS OF Age Signs Laid Bare

SKIN AUTHORITIES LAY BLAME FOR LINES, WRINKLES, DRY SKIN ON A "LAZY UNDERSKIN"

Right under your skin are blood vessels, oil glands, nerves, cells and fibres. When these fail—age signs come.

Miss Barbara Hebbard, New York: "I have seen my pores become finer—even blackheads disappear!—after regular treatments with Pond's Cold Cream."

Rouse hidden glands, nerves, fibres to win back Smooth Line-free skin ... End Blackheads, Blemishes, too!

"I HATE TO GROW OLD!" The same cry from every woman's heart . . . If you're 20, you fear the 30's. 30? You dread the 40's. Yet the years themselves are not bewailed. It's the unlovely lines, the gradual coarsening of the skin that make some women feel . . . "They hardly had any youth at all!"

But these tragic age signs can be warded off—Their hidden starting place is known! Skin authorities say it lies five layers below the skin you see. Down in what's called your underskin.

The diagram above shows you what the underskin looks like. There you see the oil glands that should keep skin supple . . . the blood vessels that should invigorate the skin, clear it . . . the under tissues that should keep skin firm.

Deep-skin treatment needed

"Then why does skin age?" . . . Because these tiny glands, tissues, blood vessels lose their vigor! They slow up . . . give skin faults their chance to start. But you can rouse your underskin, keep it active—by faithful use of Pond's deep-skin treatment!

Lady Daphne Straight granddaughter of the late ANTHONY J. DREXEL and of the late WILLIAM WHITNEY, says: "Pond's Cold Cream keeps my skin clear, positively glowing. It even wipes away little fatigue lines."

Smooth on Pond's Cold Cream. Made with fine, specially processed oils, it goes into each tiny pore quickly, deeply. Next minute, it's out again—laden with long-lodged dirt and make-up.

Wipe it all off and pat in more Pond's Cold Cream briskly . . . That's all there is to the treatment! Yet followed faithfully, see what happens. As the glands act normally—their oils no longer clog. Blackheads, blemishes can't come! . . . As tissues fill out, little lines gradually fade. As your whole underskin wakes up—your outer skin takes on that soft feel, that smooth look which make you feel young at any age! Begin now to give your skin Pond's care. Remember, this is the treatment that brings true skin beauty . . .

Fight Skin Age this way

Every night, for thorough cleansing, smooth on Pond's Cold Cream to loosen, float out dirt, make-up, skin secretions. Wipe it all off . . . Now rouse your underskin! Pat in more Pond's Cold Cream briskly. Watch how each treatment makes your skin really fresher and younger looking.

Every morning, and during the day, repeat this Pond's deep-skin treatment. You'll notice that even powder looks better—it goes on more evenly because your skin is so fine, so soft!

DICK POWELL—Mountain View, Ark., was the birthplace of this popular crooner on a certain November 14, 1904. Richard E. Powell is his real name, and he has two brothers—Howard and Luther. Until he was 12 Dick was just a country boy, but his family moved to Little Rock, Ark., where he attended grade school and college. During this youthful period Dick was very busily engaged in learning to play the saxophone, clarinet and cornet and singing at weddings, funerals and in the church choir. His next move was to organize an orchestra. In St. Louis a vaudeville act flopped, so he hastened home and shortly after married Mildred Maund. Things were pretty dull until a visiting orchestra signed him to a contract and took him on tour. After that, Dick held various positions, ending up as master of ceremonies in a Pittsburgh theatre for three years. A miracle in the guise of a talent scout eventually turned up, and in 1932 Dick Powell made his screen debut in "Blessed Event." His hobbies, outside of the movies, include music, flying, golf, swimming, horseback riding, bridge and football games, to say nothing of making amateur movies. Dick is 6 feet tall, weighs 172 pounds, has blue eyes and auburn hair. His marriage to Mildred Maund was dissolved some years ago, and now Joan Blondell seems to be his current amour. "Colleen," with Ruby Keeler, is Dick's most recent picture and "Hearts Divided" will present him again with Marion Davies. After that will come "Stage Struck" in which he and Joan Blondell are co-starred. Write Dick at the Warner Brothers Studios, Burbank, Cal.

MIRIAM STRUTT, no address—I'm glad you asked who played the seamstress in "A Tale of Two Cities" and Lou in "Ceiling Zero." Both parts were taken by Isabel Jewell, who is finally getting some credit for being a proficient actress. Jean Harlow was 25 on March 3rd.

ROBERT TAYLOR—Little Bobby has been doing all right by himself. In fact, Mr. Gable had better watch out for his "popularity prize." To get back to business, Bob was born in Filley, Nebr., on August 5, the son of Dr. S. A. Brough. Moving to Beatrice, he attended school there and then went on to Doane to college, finishing at Pomona. In the latter instituition Bob Brough was outstanding in dramatics and a star tennis player. A campus production of "Journey's End" won him a screen test from a talent scout, who immediately sent him back to his books at the first glimpse of it. This was only temporary, it seems, for after graduation Bob was tested again, this time signed to a contract, and put into training by M-G-M. His first picture was "Handy Andy" in 1934. Tennis and horseback riding are his favorite sports, he plays the cello and piano, collects different kinds of sweaters and is very superstitious about black cats and ladders. Six feet tall, he weighs 165 pounds and has brown hair and blue eyes. Bob is very popular with the feminine stars these days, and there's really no telling in whom he is most interested at the moment. His next picture will be opposite Loretta Young in "Private Number." Write him at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Washington Blvd., Culver City, Cal.

GRACE REYNOLDS, Danbury, Conn.—Ginger Rogers and Fred Astaire are to be teamed again in "Never Gonna Dance." Dick Powell and Ruby Keeler will undoubtedly continue their team-play after Dick finishes his current assignments (see biography above), but nothing is set for them at the moment.

JOAN CRAWFORD—Lucille LeSueur Cassin has travelled a long road since she was born in San Antonio, Tex., on March 23, 1908. When she was still quite young, her family moved to Kansas City, Mo., where they resided for 16 years. There Joan received her earlier education in a private school, and was initiated into the dramatic arts in the wings of her father's theatre. Against her parents' wishes, she left home and made her stage debut in a Chicago revue. Upon the completion of a successful engagement in the midwest, Joan came to New York where she appeared in several plays. She was seen by a Hollywood executive and placed under contract, appearing in "Pretty Ladies" in 1925 as an extra. She was still Lucille LeSueur then, but because her name was so difficult to pronounce, her fans gave her the name of Joan Crawford in a magazine contest. From that time on her progress was steady, and she now ranks in fifth place among the most popular stars. Joan is 5 feet 4 inches tall, weighs 115 pounds, has reddish-brown hair and brilliant blue eyes. Her favorite color combination is blue and white, she adores sport clothes and loves to wear lounging pajamas. She is considered an excellent dancer and has a better-than-average soprano voice. On October 11, 1935, Joan Crawford, the former Mrs. Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., became Mrs. Franchot Tone. And this is a surprise—Joan and Robert Taylor are going to be teamed in "The Gorgeous Hussy." You may write her at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Washington Blvd., Culver City, Cal.

GERTRUDE GASSETT, Hoppinten, Mass.—Both Spencer Tracy and Preston Foster are married. Spencer is married to Louise Treadwell, a non-professional, and they have a son who is not far from his 'teens. Preston Foster's wife is Gertrude Warren.

NELSON EDDY—This is the fourth time Mr. Eddy's life story has graced these pages—which must prove something or other as to his popularity, since he's only made two big pictures. To get down to vital statistics, he was born in Providence, R. I., June 29, 1901, the son of Isobel Kendrick and William Darius Eddy, both excellent singers. Educated in grammar school and Rhode Island Normal, the remainder of his education was obtained in night school and from correspondence courses. Nelson's first job was that of a telephone operator, although his heart was set on being a doctor or a trap drummer. Then came jobs in the shipping department of an iron works, in the art department of a Philadelphia newspaper and on other newspapers in that city as reporter, copy reader and finally writer of advertising copy. In Providence, Nelson had sung as a boy soprano in several churches, but it wasn't until this time that he began to amuse himself by singing with phonograph records and wondering if, perhaps, he might not use his pleasant baritone voice as a means of livelihood. He proceeded to take singing lessons from first one prominent instructor then another in the United States, Paris and Dresden. In 1921 he made an anonymous stage debut in "The Marriage Tax" and three years later was singing for the Philadelphia Civic Opera Company. In 1931 he was ready for New York, and made a sensational hit. In Los Angeles in 1933 he gave a concert and received 18 encores! Screen tests and a contract resulted, with Mr. Eddy appearing in very minor roles in "Broadway to Hollywood," "Dancing Lady," "Student Tour" and finally starring in "Naughty Marietta" and "Rose Marie" which were really worthy of his talents. Six feet tall, handsome and athletic, Nelson finds relaxation in swimming, motoring, tennis, dancing and sailing. He weighs 173 pounds and has blue eyes and blonde hair. He can sing 32 operatic roles and in French, English, Italian, Spanish, Russian and Yiddish. He has never been married and is not even engaged. The "Firefly" is tentatively scheduled for him and Miss MacDonald as their next co-starring record-breaker. Should you care to write him, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Washington Blvd., Culver City, Cal., is the address.

BRUCE REED, Kansas City, Mo.—The man who played Duke Mantee so excellently in "Petrified Forest" was Humphrey Bogart, who also played the role originally on the New York stage when that show was so successful last year. Joe Sawyer was Jackie, and Gramp Sawyer's role was taken by Charles Grapewin.

GARY COOPER—Frank J. Cooper is his real name and he was born in Helena, Montana, May 7, 1901, the son of Alice and Charles H. Cooper, non-professionals. Dunstable School, England, Helena, Mont., Iowa College and Grinnell College gave him his education. Gary's stage experince was gaethered while playing in amateur productions at high school and college, but he was most interested in becoming a cartoonist, having held a job as such on a Helena Newspaper. However, in 1924 he betook himself to Los Angeles and become a house-to-house canvasser, which work was anything but lucrative. So he finally landed a job as an extra in a Western, and continued to play extra roles for a year. His first important picture was "The Winning of Barbara Worth" in 1926. Since that time Gary has appeared in an amazing number of pictures, and despite the fact that he is so busy he has found time to travel and to indulge in his favorite pastimes—fishing, hunting, riding and swimour great day—

THE DAY—will ever come. I can't tell you how much new courage it brought me. Darling!
Bob

A LITTLE square of paper can hold so much! Memories . . . hopes . . . the look, the very personality of someone you love. Make snapshots now—they'll mean everything to you later. And don't take chances—load your camera with Kodak Verichrome Film. This double-coated film gets the picture where ordinary films fail. Your snapshots come out clearer, truer, more lifelike. Any camera is a better camera, loaded with Verichrome—use it always . . . Eastman Kodak Company, Rochester, N. Y.

Accept nothing but the film in the familiar yellow box.

WE CAN'T PROMISE YOU A Love Affair

...BUT Nonspi THE SAFE DEODORANT DOES PROMISE YOU LASTING PROTECTION

● A love affair must be of your own making. Nonspi promises only to keep you fastidious... what else can you ask of a deodorant? Nonspi is a sure and safe anti-perspirant and deodorant for underarm moisture... because:

1. Nonspi has been pronounced entirely safe by highest medical authority.
2. Nonspi can be used full strength by women whose delicate skin forces them to use deodorants half-strength, with only half-way results.
3. Nonspi protection lasts from two to five days... and you can depend on it.
4. Nonspi's siphon-top bottle prevents contamination. And there's no dripping or waste with this patented Nonspi applicator.

Remember these four points when you buy. Protect your delicate gowns by stopping underarm moisture effectively and safely. Insist on genuine Nonspi at all drug and department stores in the U.S.A. and Canada. 35c and 60c a bottle.

Born under a Lucky Star

Yet ROCHELLE HUDSON

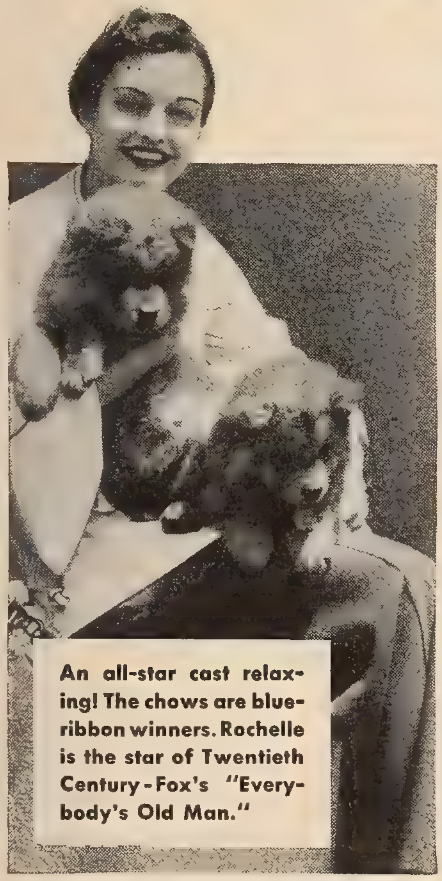
won't trust to luck when it comes to lovely washables—she insists on LUX

Between scenes, Rochelle rests in her dressing room on the set. Its furnishings have the same crisp freshness she insists upon for her personal things.



An all-star cast relaxing! The chows are blue-ribbon winners. Rochelle is the star of Twentieth Century-Fox's "Everybody's Old Man."

"WHILE I'm usually lucky, I don't count on 'luck' to save me from stocking runs or faded colors," declares Rochelle Hudson. "Lux is my secret of keeping things like new for ages!"

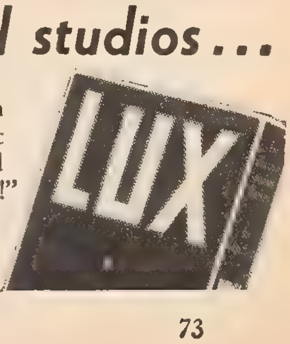
Why risk spoiling your smart washables this summer? It's so easy—and economical—to keep lovely prints and pastels, sheer cottons and fine linens, always superlatively fresh with Lux.

Rubbing with cake soap, or using ordinary soaps which may contain harmful alkali, is apt to fade colors, weaken threads. Lux has no harmful alkali. Safe in water, safe in Lux!

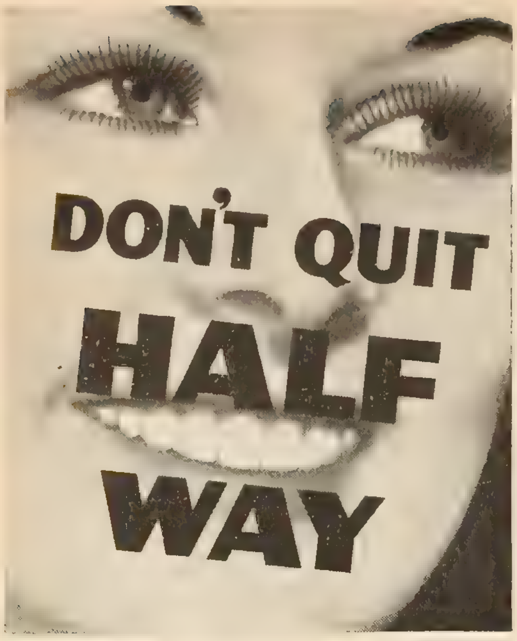
"I love the clothes in my new picture," Rochelle says. "So many of them are Luxable. They're terribly smart looking."

Specified in all the big Hollywood studios . . .

"Washing failures, by holding up production, would cost us thousands of times what they would an individual," says Arthur Levy, wardrobe supervisor. "That's why at Twentieth Century-Fox studios it's a rule that only Lux be used for stockings and washable costumes—we know it's safe!"



HOLLYWOOD HAS A NEW WORD FOR "WASH"—IT'S



Forhan's goes deeper

DOES BOTH JOBS

CLEANS TEETH

Half way measures are powerless against the real enemies of lovely teeth—soft, sick, failing gums! Forhan's does both jobs—cleans and polishes teeth while aiding gums to stay healthy, firm, youthful! It gives your teeth two-way protection yet costs no more than most ordinary tooth pastes.

SAVES GUMS

Why take chances with your teeth? Begin today to use Forhan's. Notice how much better it makes your entire mouth feel. Soon you'll SEE the difference, too—whiter teeth, firmer gums. Forhan's was created by one of the leading dental surgeons in the country. There is no substitute for its protection. Ask for Forhan's today.

More Good News

Meet Mr. and Mrs. George Mc-Donald! Little Jean Parker surprised everyone by marrying this good-looking young newspaperman quietly at Las Vegas.

Davis was so wrought up over the prospect of receiving the Academy Award that, the day of the presentation, she spent the entire afternoon in a picture show, sitting through two features, news reels, a comedy, a travelogue and the latest Mickey Mouse cartoon.

Katharine Hepburn can't be bothered with extra curricular activities. Classed among those are hostessing. So she's fitted up an elaborate playroom in her new home, complete with every kind of slot machine available. Her guests are ushered from the door directly to the playroom and left to their own devices. The Hepburn is fast becoming Hollywood's most popular hostess.

The owner of the Gable dimples can get a mad on once in awhile, too. We hear it's blown over now, but not so long ago Clark was seen to storm out of the studio. Seems the news had just been delivered to him that he wouldn't be permitted the trip to the Orient via the China Clipper. Then to top the difficulties, while working on the "San Francisco" set, a building to be used in the earthquake sequence toppled over in Mr. Gable's direction. The result was a completely ruined dress suit, coiffure and disposition.

It was a gala day not long ago at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer when D. W. Griffith visited the set of "San Francisco." And the biggest thrill came to Woody Van Dyke, Metro's director par excellence, and head of this picture. Years ago, when Griffith directed "Intolerance," Woody was his errand boy on the set. As a token of his high regard for the great Griffith, Director Van Dyke asked Mr. Griffith to direct Jeanette MacDonald in the last few sequences of the picture.

Understand that the extras on "Big Brown Eyes," the Joan Bennett-Cary Grant picture, are all on a diet these days. A barber shop sequence took five days to shoot, and every day the extras had to be lathered with whipped cream since shaving soap dries too quickly.

We had a nice chat with Freddie Bartholomew lately. He had just met Paul Muni for the first time and announced that he was frightfully impressed. "I have always regarded Mr. Muni as one of the better actors," said Freddie thoughtfully, "and now I realize more than ever how exceptional he must be to have been selected for the title role in "The Good Earth."

Several customers nearly passed out under the dryers when a man led a huge wolf dog into Westmore's beauty shop the other day. A special booth had been reserved for the purp, and here he was treated to a bleach, followed by a white henna pack. "Lightning" is the son of Strongheart, that famed old dog of silents, and is to appear in the forthcoming sequel to "Call of the Wild." The director thought the new hair-do would improve his features. Hollywood is going more to the dogs every day. At a recent Assistance League luncheon, Buck, the St. Bernard of "Call of the Wild," was honored guest. He gave paw prints to eager fans.

Don't bet on what Katharine Hepburn will do next. The other day she showed up at the RKO lot in a truck, loaded with sweaters, scarves and knitted dresses which she proceeded to auction off on the lot. Seems that Katie had been shopping at Carmel, found a store making very arty knitted goods, and promptly purchased a supply to the tune of $1,500. Hiring a truck she piled her purchases in and headed for the home lot, having promised the shop owners that she would sell the supply within a week at a good profit.

Wonder what Josef Von Sternberg's name actually is. Recently the director got in such a dither over rumors that he was originally called Joe Stern that he offered $100,000 to anyone who could prove that such was his name. Now if the $100,000 had been offered to prove that the name was not Josef Von Sternberg we could all get to work on the Von Goldbergs, etc.

Junior Stars' note: Freddie Bartholomew has settled down to the serious business of teaching his Aunt Cissy to ride horseback. Auntie is serving her apprenticeship on San Toy, the horse which was given to Freddie by Victor McLaglen. And Jackie Cooper, who rented a horse for the past season at Palm Springs, personally took care of the grooming and handling of his animal. When the season ended, the two of them were such pals that Jackie's mother had to buy the horse.

Everyone wondered where Rosalind Russell's been spending her evenings of late, because no one saw her around at the so-called gay spots. A spy discovered she's been sitting home nights with a stenographer, dictating a scenario. It's sort of a story of her own life, says Rosalind. She also adds that, in her opinion, it's terrible, but that she's going to try to sell it under an assumed name. We'll keep you posted.

One of Madge Evans' favorite men is a sad young gent named Toughie. Toughie is a dog, and recently he was lost or stolen from Madge's home. After a frantic search Madge was about to advertise for her lost friend when a boy appeared at her door wanting to know if she'd like to buy a Scottie. Madge took a good look at the merchandise. It was Toughie. "How much?" she asked. "A nickel," said the young salesman. It was a deal.

After Wally Beery announced he was going to Detroit to buy a station wagon, his friends were slightly surprised to see him pull up in a shiny new Cadillac. But, when Maureen O'Sullivan confided she was about to buy a car with sleeping accommodations, she really meant it. It's a sedan with seats which slide back to make a bed, just in case the O'Sullivans are ever caught napping. Incidentally, it's the first car Maureen has ever driven.

At the engagement party for Jack Oakie and Venita Varden the great Oakie fell madly in love with Mrs. Pat O'Brien's evening gown. Next morning Jack was presented with the gown, and a couple of days later Miss V. became Mrs. O. attired in the O'Brien raiment. Looks like Mrs. Pat, who owns a dress shop, is her firm's best advertisement.

Streamlining may be a fine thing for automobiles but it's not so good for dogs, Dick Powell has decided. Recently, before entering his cocker spaniel in a dog show, Dick put his pet on a strict diet to give him that streamlined effect. Came the dog show, and the Powell spaniel, with his ultra-modern chassis, took second prize. "He'd have had first prize," said the judge, "had he been a little fatter."

Here's a story to pass on to those innocents who believe it's such a simple matter for a friend of a friend of a cousin of theirs in Hollywood to get them a pass into a studio. A small fire broke out in Paramount studios the other morning. When the engine came dashing up to the gates, sirens wide open, the firemen were met by the grim gateman. He wanted to see their official pass before opening the sacred gates so much as an inch.

Have you been fair to yourself . . . AND TO HIM?

Much has happened since those glamorous days of courtship. Naturally, you are both a little older—a little more mellow. But have those years dealt kindly with your looks? Or have you aged more than you should for the birthdays you secretly count?

So many women lose their good looks after thirty. They fail to realize the importance of what they eat day after day. Over the years, faulty menus can definitely affect their appearance. In some cases, constipation contributes to their troubles. Continued neglect of this condition causes discomfort, may lead to headaches, poor appetite, listlessness.

Common constipation is usually the result of insufficient "bulk" in the meals you eat. Fortunately, a delicious cereal supplies this "bulk." The "bulk" in Kellogg's All-Bran absorbs moisture within the body, forms a soft mass, gently cleanses the system. Scientific tests show that All-Bran is a normal food for normal people. Two tablespoonfuls daily, served with milk or cream, are usually sufficient. Stubborn cases may require All-Bran more often. If not relieved this way, consult your doctor.

Kellogg's All-Bran makes no claim to be a "cure-all"—but it does correct constipation due to insufficient "bulk." It is guaranteed by the Kellogg Company. Serve All-Bran as a cereal, or cook into tempting muffins, breads, etc. Sold by all grocers. Made by Kellogg in Battle Creek.

"Uncertain Lady." You say that you resent my writing to "Little Miss Marker." Please, Sweetheart, don't be "Looking for Trouble," a man must sometimes correspond with "His Private Secretary." Why "Only Yesterday" I was thinking to myself that of all the "Little Women" I know you are the most "Adorable" and how happy I am that "You Belong to Me."

"Let's Talk it Over" and in "The Old Fashioned Way" we will "Kiss and Make Up." "Let's Try Again" when next week I arrive at our little home with the "Morning Glory" on the porch. $1 PRIZE LETTER
Not Sensational But—

I would like to pay tribute to a little actress who, in my opinion, is one of Hollywood's best and loveliest. True, she has not done anything sensational in pictures, but that is because she has not been given the proper vehicle, not because she lacks the talent or ability. Yet, she has been successful and applause is certainly merited her for her praiseworthy characterizations. I feel sure she has a bright future before her, for one with such a refreshing and hauntingly sweet personality, one of such refinement, cleverness and such utterly disarming naturalness is bound to reach the top.

In her home life she is an exception in the film colony, devoting most of her time away from the studio to her home, her husband and her baby daughter, and seldom joining in the gaieties of Hollywood social functions. To me she is an ideal, home-loving, hard-working, talented girl—one I should like for an intimate chum. Who? Evelyn Venable!—Mildred Smith, Denver, Colorado.

$1 PRIZE LETTER
If Double Bills Bore You—

For the first time in my life, I feel impelled to reply to a letter written to a magazine—that of Mr. Vogt in your April issue.

I do agree with Mr. Vogt that the second half of some double features is boring, but if anyone is interested only in good screen material, he is privileged to leave the theatre if the second feature is unsuitable, or better still, find out from the film marquee just what is playing before entering the theatre. If, by some chance, there is one picture on the bill which he has seen or does not desire to see at all, while the other is one that he has been waiting for, all he has to do is ask the girl in the ticket office for the time schedule and in this way he need not sit through anything unworthy of his intellect.

To prove that all double-features are not of a poor calibre, I have listed some that I have seen recently. You will agree that it would be very hard to determine which should be billed as the second rater, both being of such high quality and the actors being far from "hams."

"Story of Louis Pasteur" and "Petrified Forest." "Annie Oakley" and "Sylvia Scarlett." "Whipsaw" and "King of Burlesque." "Dangerous" and "The Bride Comes Home."

That's quite an imposing list, isn't it? And, I assure you, I know good acting when I see it. I would also like to mention that by following the procedure stated in the beginning of this letter, I've never lost a picture yet. That is to say, I see all the best and am rarely bored.—N. Brown, Brooklyn, N. Y.

HONORABLE MENTION
Fascinating Gangsters!!

Oh, these fascinating gangsters that we've been seeing lately—Cesar Romero, Jack LaRue and George Raft.

In the old days the villain was hissed and hated by excited audiences, but now if they don't watch out, girls will be falling for the villain instead of the hero. But don't think we resent it. Isn't it much more thrilling to see these handsome gangsters who are capable of putting people on the spot and hitting the spot too?

Here's hoping to see more of those three ideal movie gangsters do their worst, while we breathlessly watch, secretly hoping the hero won't be too hard on them.—Margie Hartman, West Allis, Wisconsin.

Exploiting Home Talent

I note with pleasure that more and more casts are composed entirely of young American actors and actresses. This is a good sign, showing that the talent in our own youngsters is being brought out, and is holding its own with foreign talent in Hollywood. Although the steady waning of the musical comedy will lose many people their jobs, the increase of historical, classical and operatic films is developing more character parts. It takes talent to play such roles, and so acting is reaching a higher plane.—Elizabeth Hitchcock, Windsor, Mass.

Star Tips

Did anyone ever tell you that . . . Joan Crawford ought to eat more potatoes? Crosby and Powell croon too much? Bette Davis is the best actress on the screen? Bill Robinson is just as good an actor as tap dancer? Joan Blondell has the most beautiful orbs in Hollywood? Jean Parker is the sweetest doll on the screen? Miriam Hopkins has the best speaking voice? Ginger Rogers ought to stick to dancing; her singing is bad? Hepburn should try to speak like a natural human being? Raft ought to go easy on the vaseline and stop wearing high heels? Ruby Keeler ought to learn how to act? Harlow ought to try eating? Shirley Temple is the most glamorous gal in Hollywood? Connie Bennett should be spanked?—E. Slevin, Bronx, New York.

Insulted!

I wonder if other Philadelphia moviegoers are as fed up as I am with hearing our great city continually knocked by third-rate hack writers in their desperate efforts to be funny. The rawest instance of this kind was seen in "42nd Street," which, except for its dialogue, was a perfect picture. "Metropolitan" and other current films also contain slighting references to Philadelphia's "sleepiness," a gag so ancient and disproven that modern writers should be ashamed to use it.

I cannot imagine why producers permit their pictures to be cluttered with these disgusting slams against America's third largest city. Anyone who has ever been here knows that its "slowness" exists only in the torpid minds of scenario writers who haven't the mental capacity to think up something more original.—K. L. Greene, Philadelphia, Pa.

Silly Stuff

I think that the cowboy serials and pictures are getting sillier and sillier. They are all alike. The heroine is taking some important papers somewhere; bandits appear on the scene and shoot the driver. Just then Tom Mix or Buck Jones, or whoever the hero is, comes galloping on a fine white horse named "Silver" and takes the driver's seat, shoots the bandits and saves the day. All so thrilling! Nuts! If the bandit falls off a cliff, he usually breaks an arm or a leg, but if the hero falls off a cliff, he gets up, brushes himself off and gets on "Silver" and rides away. I think this stuff is much too old, don't you?—Patricia MacWilliams, Washington, D. C.

A Line or Two From Lots of Letters

If Jean Harlow would study the selection of the plays given her instead of the effect of "startling" new hair tints, she might find a "startling" increase in her fan mail.—S. Henderson, Tucson, Arizona. If your budget permits but one show a week, see "The Petrified Forest." If it permits two, see "The Petrified Forest" twice. It is the strangest love story ever unfolded on the screen.—C. Toles, Colorado Springs, Colorado. Won't someone tell me what type of audience "Tarzan" pictures are made for? The incredibility of these pictures is amazing, I have even heard children remark on it. To me it is all a lot of noise, unreality and waste of time on the part of the audience, not to mention the effect on the nervous system.—Dora Starr, Bronx, New York. Music to instill the proper mood in the days of silent pictures, where the orchestra always played an appropriate accompaniment, may have been not only all right but pleasant. But to use music in an all-talking production at points where absolute silence is supposed to reign supreme is going a bit too far.—Mary Sharp, Indianapolis, Indiana. I wonder why they've never teamed Bette Davis with George Raft? It takes something more than mere acting to do justice to such difficult, hard-boiled parts as Bette and George portray—it takes naturalness and technique. Give us a Davis-Raft team and you'll give us a new kind of thrill.—Loreen Pallas, Cleveland, Ohio. If Hepburn and Hopkins ate more spinach they would be calmer and healthier, but perhaps not such interesting personalities. The recent, overzealous beautifying of the stars has led to some pretty disastrous results. It is responsible for Garbo's waning popularity. She would be as popular today as she was five years ago, if they hadn't devitalized her beautiful face. That heavy line drawn on the upper eyelid, the droop of the mouth, and the heavily shadowed cheeks may be all right on a Benda mask but an actress' face should express animation. That goes for Dietrich, too.—Mary Peterson, Philadelphia, Pa.

Gail Patrick and beautiful green orchids seem like a perfect alliance. And what an original way she wears them, pinned to the back of her evening gown!

"YOU SAIL HIGH WHEN YOU START THE DAY WITH SHREDDED WHEAT!"

"Fresh air and exercise rate the top of my list for keeping fit. But I'm not swinging along blindly. My daily diet is mighty important, too. For breakfast, every one I know is changing to Shredded Wheat. And I'm right with them."

Things Just Happen to Anne

Ice cream cones, toys and lollipops were rushed to the scene in an effort to calm the new actress' temperamental outburst, but to no avail. The day was finally saved by Mr. Farnum and a quick shave.

Of course, she wasn't Anne Shirley in those days. Dawn O'Day was the name then and for the next twelve years in Hollywood. For after "Miracle Child," Mrs. O'Day decided to bring her small daughter to the film capital. She was convinced that her child had talent. So convinced that she gave up the job in a New York department store, where she had worked since her husband's death, to gamble her all on a ticket-and-a-half to the coast.

"It was a good gamble, too," Mrs. O'Day will tell you now with a twinkle in her eye. But there were a dozen years between then and now—years when directors just gave occasional roles to the shy, brown-eyed child with the coppery curls. For Mrs. O'Day was not a good movie mama. She had never taught her little daughter to smirk beguilingly at important directors, to hang adoringly on the skirts of important stars, or to clamber up on casting directors' knees. She knew Dawn had talent, the studio would know it inevitably—so what was the rush?

In the meantime, there wouldn't be much money, but neither would there be the danger of sudden success turning that head of bright curls. Mrs. O'Day didn't have valuable contacts, wealth or social position to give her daughter, but she had something that beat them all—plain, ordinary common sense. The result, of course, you saw for yourself in "Anne of Green Gables." The Anne Shirley whose sincerity and lovableness shone even in cold celluloid and sky-rocketed her to stardom.

I'VE been out in the 'cold, cruel woild of the woikin' girl' since I was a year old," Anne told us, "but I never realized it. I was having such a good time! I've always felt so lucky just to be in the movies at all. And I knew that I was more fortunate than most girls in being able to earn and learn at the same time. Of course, there were plenty of times I didn't earn much, but the smaller the role the more chance I had to watch the stars on the set. And I got a thrill out of every minute of it. As for worrying about whether I'd get big roles or big money, I just didn't. Mother taught me that I could only do my best in what they gave me, and if I were really good, my chance would come. I've always agreed, anyhow, with that old darky who said, 'I've worried about a lot of things in my life, but most of them never happened,'—and don't you?"

Who doesn't? But how many in this vale of tears have the sense to remember it? Yet a seventeen year old girl has learned to take life in her stride and "get a thrill out of every minute of it." The twelve years when she was a "bit" player held as much fun for Anne Shirley as the last two years since she's achieved fame.

"Of course, I'm terribly happy that the studio thinks I'm good enough for important roles, now," Anne said, her sensitive face very serious as she tried to explain, "but what I mean is that I've always been so happy in my work that it's practically impossible to feel any differently now. Except for more time at the studio, I do about the same things I always did. I go to school (she'll graduate from high school this spring) which I dislike just as much as I ever did, incidentally. I have game-parties, read magazines and plays, go to the movies and sit around and munch candy and talk and—munch candy. Having money enough to buy this house and a car—my first!—and a dog, now that is different!" Anne's eyes shone as she explained about the dog. "We've never been able to afford a house before, and they won't let you have dogs in apartments ever, so I feel really ritzy about my dog, even if I did get him from the pound!"

THE new house from the outside looks just like any other pretty stucco California bungalow. But inside there is that indefinable something that makes a house a home. It simply exudes the friendly charm of its owner. In actual money, Mrs. O'Day and Anne haven't splurged on the furnishings, but in time and thought they have spent a young fortune. Gayly painted furniture, crisp bright curtains and potted plants are in every room. The sun-porch, made from what was formerly a screened-in porch, is where the family practically lives. The "family" consists not only of the collie, Anne and her mother, but Phyllis Fraser, the nineteen year old cousin of Ginger Rogers.

"Phyllis has been living with us for over a year now," Anne explained. "We met at a party, and she asked me to have lunch with her some day. You know how people are always saying 'let's have lunch some day' and never mean it? Well, I knew Phyllis meant lunch! We've been practically inseparable ever since. It's funny, too, because we're exact opposites. Phyllis is the amusingest person you ever saw, while I never know what to say. I'm still looking forward to saying something witty and she has yet to say something dull. She's—well, she's swell," finished Anne simply.

Another difference that being a star has made to Anne Shirley is that she can go to more movies! In the years when the pennies counted, movies were her idea of the grandest treat in the world. And they still are—the difference being that now she can afford to go. And go she does, holding the all-time Hollywood record for attendance.

"I just eat them up! Any and all kinds. There's something to enjoy about every one of them—even the weepy kind with mascara trickling down your nose. The ones I like the most, though, are like 'These Three'—you know, the kind that you want to go right home and think about."

We wanted to know if Anne liked the roles which she has been playing, and were assured that she had liked every one of them. "Besides," she said earnestly, "I'm so lucky to be able to play the particular type of young girl I do, because I'm the only one who is doing that type of thing now. I think that the studio knows what's best for me to play anyhow. Whatever they say is all right with me."

That remark should be framed and hung on Hollywood Boulevard. Here is an actress who doesn't think she could outlanguish any Camille to date. Such genuine modesty is rare if not extinct in this town.

You can probably understand now why Anne could play in pictures for over twelve years before she really got a "break." Oh, yes, she was in over a hundred productions in that time, and did her small roles with unmistakable ability. But the minute the director was through with her would be the last he'd see of the big-eyed small girl. Anne would have retired into the shadows off the set and settled down quietly to looking and listening. When there was a picture plum to be handed out, the directors would give it to some child who was either underfoot herself or had a mama and a press-agent there.

She only forgot her bashfulness with people who didn't look or act too important. George Nicholls, Jr., a cutter on "Rich Man's Folly," a picture in which Anne appeared when she was twelve, was one to whom she felt friendly. Four years later, when Mr. Nicholls was co-director on "Finishing School," he suggested that the little O'Day girl be given an important role. And the next year, when he was given the directorship of "Anne of Green Gables," Mr. Nicholls insisted that the little O'Day girl be given a test for the lead. Every youngster, and not-so youngster, in Hollywood wanted that role—but the rest is history. It was then, too, that Anne had her name legally changed to her present one.

Since then she's been starred in "Only Yesterday" and "Chatterbox." She co-starred with Will Rogers in "Steamboat Round the Bend."

"Will Rogers was so grand," Anne told us, her face lighting up at the mention of his name. "Whenever he saw a cameraman coming near for a close-up, Will would turn around and say, 'Come on, Annie, be a sport and let 'em get one of you.'"

You will be seeing Anne in "M'Liss" and also in one of the prize packages of the year—Maxwell Anderson's "Winterset." But we wish you could have seen her as we did—curled up in the window-seat of the sun-porch and looking for all the world like a youngster without a responsibility in her life. And yet this girl has known bad fortune and good. And she can take them both.

And romance? Of course, we asked Anne about THAT, being female as well as news-sleuth.

"I guess romance will drift around, too, in time," she said, and added with sparkling brown eyes, "At least I certainly hope it will!"

And that's Anne Shirley. She wastes as much time kidding you as herself. Which totals no time wasted. As honest as she is pretty, as sincere as she is talented, and as level-headed as she is redheaded, this girl couldn't side-step success or "flop" in anything.

Hollywood's Bad Boy

Wally always remarks that his old man was right.

"He believed that a stiff rap over the head with a nightstick was the best preventative of crime."

He attended the funeral of Carol Ann's mother and, when one of her little brothers asked why they threw that dirt on his mama, Wally cried. He's a sentimental and tender-hearted goof. He liked to work with the late Marie Dressler and still thinks "Min and Bill" a good bit of business. He isn't ill-tempered but he stands up for his rights against the world. An executive once said to him, after a set-to on the lot:

"Wally, why don't you be a good guy? Why are you always scrapping with someone? That won't get you anywhere!"

"Yeah?" said Wally. "And I suppose you got from running a five-cent theatre to where you are by letting people walk on your face?"

The executive walked away, very fast, without saying a word. Wallace laughed.

Wally once walked from Times Square to New Rochelle to get a job as a cop in the movies, but it rained and he had to walk back in it without getting the promised five bucks for the day. He was once a chorus man, but so were James Cagney, Jack Oakie and several other he-men stars. Once, when a girl told Wally that his face was drooping like a frost-bitten pumpkin, he saved a hundred bucks to have it lifted, but the specialist wanted five hundred, so Wally let the face ride as was.

THE role he disliked most was the one he played in "Grand Hotel." He's a baby and, when he gets a pain or a tummy ache, he walks right out of the picture and goes home to mummy and hot packs. He cannot stand physical pain as well as most men. His trousers, even when he is dressed up, seem always about to let everything go and fall off. He once directed a picture in Japan. He insists that the two best rules for a happy marriage are, speaking of picture stars:

"Keep your wife away from the studio. She hasn't any business there. Let her run the house, you haven't any business trying to butt in."

"Never marry a woman who wants to have a career!"

He tied with Fredric March in 1932 for the Academy Award for the best male performance of the year. He insists on quitting, even if there is more work to do, at 5 P.M. every night. He and Garbo!

He has no complaint about life and thinks he's done darn well.

"Edison started out as a newsboy and a train 'butcher,'" says Wally, "and he ended up being the world's greatest inventor. Ford thought up a way to make cheap automobiles and now is one of the world's richest men. I started out as a chambermaid to a herd of elephants and I live now in a swell dump in Beverly Hills. It's a funny world, ain't it?"

He calls all men "Keed!" and all women "Dear"—nothing can break him of the practice. On location with "Old Ironsides," he made a pet of a seal which insisted on swimming close to the ship. When Jimmie Cruz prepared to dynamite some of the old ships for a battle scene, Wally held up several hundred people, on production, for two hours until he was sure his seal was safe.

He once owned a yacht, but when his wife made him buy and wear a formal yachting costume, he sold it. Claimed the damn thing made him uncomfortable. He walks right through mud puddles and never seems to know they are there while others go around them.

He has a robust sense of humor and isn't afraid to laugh long and loud.

Do You Believe in Miracles?

seemingly insurmountable difficulties stare you in the face. And I'm going to do it right now.

LET'S start on legs. If your legs are fat, the problem isn't so difficult. If they are muscular, it's more difficult, but still possible! Here's what you can do, first, for the calves:

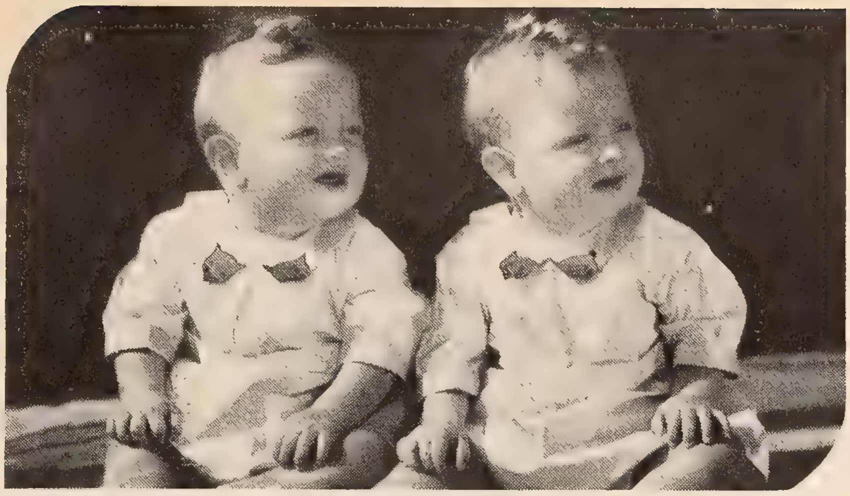
Sit down on the floor, one leg bent up at the knee—the leg you're going to work on. Now take hold of the fleshy part of your calf with your two hands. Squeeze, and put plenty of energy behind it. Keep your thumbs against the shin bones and with the fingers, thumbs and palms, dig in under the leg muscles and squeeze the fat off. Don't pinch yourself, that's wrong, and it won't do any good. Squeeze with the heel of the hand and the fingers. The legs must be absolutely relaxed. Your hands do all the work. Give ten minutes to each leg, every day. You won't see any world-shaking improvement by just doing it once. You've got to keep this up and keep it up. And, babies, it will work! I used this same treatment on Constance Cummings. You know Connie was a dancer in musical comedy in New York before she went to Hollywood. And she had developed muscles in her legs like Pop Eye the Sailor. Now, they are slim and lovely—mama did it! And I'm telling you how you can do the same thing.

Now, the ankles. Let me repeat, if it's bone construction that makes your ankles big, you can expect to do only so much. But for goodness sakes do what you can. Above all, don't sit back and say, "It's no use." It is some use, because the following exercise will slenderize your ankles remarkably and besides that, keep them supple. Then, with a clever choice of hose and shoes, and graceful management of your feet and legs, you can even make the ankles appear much slimmer than they actually are by measurement.

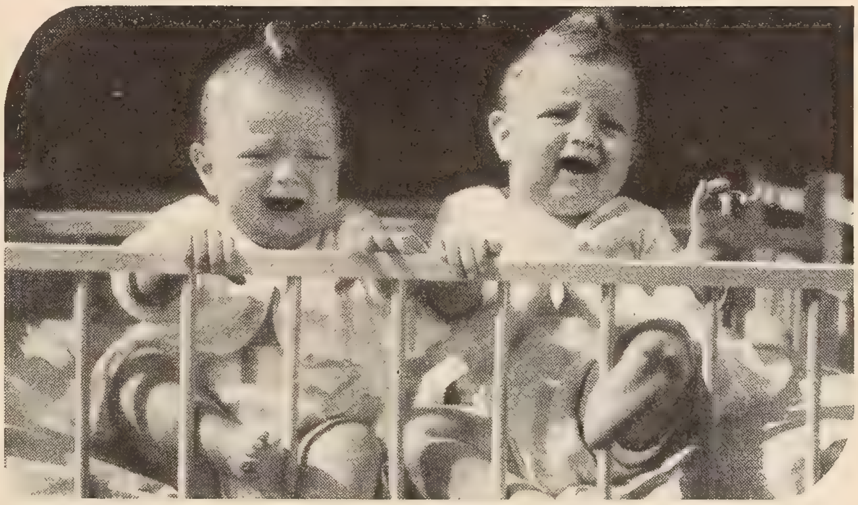
Here is the exercise for slimming the ankles: Lie flat on the floor, feet together, toes pointed. Arms straight out above your head. Now, from this straight-line position, bend up and try to touch the tips of your toes with your fingers. Be sure to keep the knees stiff. You probably can't do it at first, but never mind, keep at it until you do it correctly. Another thing, don't turn your toes up—keep them pointed away from you. You'll feel a tingling, pulling sensation in your ankles. That's swell. That means you are doing it correctly. That sensation means that the fat is coming off and the muscles are being stretched within an inch of their lives. Incidentally, this same exercise will limber up your whole body and strengthen the abdominal muscles.

HERE'S another ankle exercise, just for variety's sake. I'm certainly generous this month, am I not? But, babies, I expect you to be just as generous with your will-power and gumption to do as I tell you. That's fair enough, isn't it?

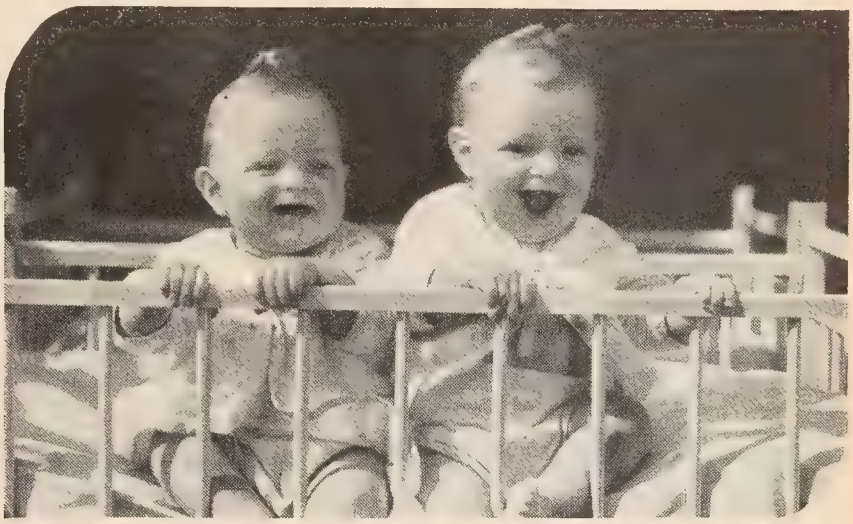
Now here we go: sit on the floor, legs stretched straight out. Hands placed behind you to brace your body. Now lift your hips off the floor, so that a straight line is formed from your shoulders to your toes. You are now supporting your body with only the palms of your hands and your heels. Everything else off the floor. Now bend your toes forward and down, trying to touch the floor with them.



"What! Go to bed? . . . Well, that's a dirty trick! We let you get us dressed up, and we did stunts for your old company . . . and now your dinner's ready, you pack us off to bed!"



"We won't lie down and go to sleep! Not one eye will we close all night long . . . you'll see how much noise twins can make! Our feelings are hurt—and we're prickly and cross!"



"Ah-h . . . ! She's getting the Johnson's Baby Powder! (Good teamwork, eh?) When we get rubbed with that silky-slick powder, we'll purr like kittens. Mother—we forgive you!"

"I'm Johnson's Baby Powder—the comfort and joy of millions of babies, because I soothe away prickly heat and all the little chafes and irritations that make them cross. The talc I'm made of is the finest, rarest Italian kind—no gritty particles and no orris-root. And I have three helpers in taking care of babies' skins—Johnson's Baby Soap, Baby Cream and Baby Oil. Try them, too!"

IF Perspiration were a TIGER

—you'd jump to protect yourself from its ravages! Yet the insidious corroding acid of perspiration can destroy the under-arm fabric of your dresses as surely, as completely, as the scarifying claws of a tiger's paw!

Answers to thousands of questionnaires revealed the astounding fact that during the past year perspiration spoiled garments for 1 woman in 3! What appalling wasteful extravagance, when a pair of Kleinert's Dress Shields would have saved any one of them at trifling cost.

And this surest form of perspiration protection is now the easiest also! Kleinert's Bra-form is a dainty uplift bra equipped with shields—always ready, without any sewing, to wear with any dress at any moment. A supply of two or three solves the perspiration problem for the busiest woman and they're as easily swished through the nightly soapsuds as your stockings and lingerie!

Just ask for "Kleinert's" at your favorite notion counter—shields, 25¢ and up; Bra-forms, $1.00 and up.

Go on, stretch and touch those toes to the floor. Now come back to the first position and repeat.

Do either one or both of these ankle exercises a few times every day and work up to at least twenty times.

And here's another little trick. After the calf-squeezing and ankle-slimming routine is over each time, spread a heavy turkish towel over your legs and ankles and beat hard through it, with the palm of your hand. Don't be a "softie," slap good and hard; that smashes down the fatty tissues and helps the good work along. Keep the muscles entirely relaxed, always. Don't tighten up at all.

Now get busy and show mama how good you are, and I give you my word that you can work miracles with fat or heavy legs and ankles with the above treatments. It's hard, uphill work, I'll admit, in the exaggerated cases. It's no snap even in the milder cases. I'm not kidding you on that score, and you must not kid yourself. But who cares? Isn't it worth it? Just think, in the next few months, you will have so slenderized your legs and ankles, you need no longer feel self-conscious about them! It costs not a dime, it just takes time! Well, for heaven's sake, did you hear that? Sylvia's getting poetic! Me and Shakespeare. Gosh, I'd better cut that out and get back to business.

When ankles are bloated and puffy from too much standing, as can happen to people who must stand at their work and to the housewife who must traipse around all day, here is a treatment which will make those puffy ankles look better and feel better:

FILL the bathtub partially full of very hot water. Place a basin of cold water on the floor beside the tub. Sit on the edge of the tub and put your feet into the hot water. It should be just as hot as you can possibly stand it. Keep your feet there as long as you can. Then out with them, and pop them into the cold water for just a second. Now back into the hot water. Alternate between the hot and cold plunges for ten minutes. Dry them carefully and thoroughly and then march into your bedroom, taking with you a bottle of rubbing alcohol. I said rubbing! Lie on the bed and take up one foot at a time and give it an alcohol rub. Massage the toes. Take the toes in the palm of your hand and rotate them. Knead the instep. Your feet will feel so good that you'll want to do an Astaire around the room when you get through. It's a good idea to sleep with your feet on a pillow, too, to get rid of puffiness. You'll be surprised how it rests them.

Bow-legs are another problem which I want to take up. There's a trick to this: you take the fat off the outside of the leg and leave it on the inside, thereby making your legs look straighter than they actually are. You can use the same squeezing-slapping treatment I just mentioned for the calves.

Here's another good exercise: you need someone to help you do this. Lie flat on the bed, on your back. Your assistant puts one of your feet on her shoulder. Then she takes the heel in one hand and pulls it hard, meanwhile pressing against the toes and sole of your foot just as firmly as she possibly can, with the palm of her other hand. Encourage her to put plenty of energy behind this—a slow, not a jerky, pull. It will help straighten out the outside of your legs Give five minutes to each leg and don't waste a minute of the time.

For heavy thighs and upper legs, there is an exercise I gave last month, in connection with that little matter of reducing the abdomen. I mentioned at the time that it would turn a trick for the thighs, too. If you missed it, you can have it by writing to me for it.

Thin legs are another problem which most sufferers are inclined to regard as hopeless. "Oh, I know my legs are pipe stems. All my family have thin legs. There's nothing I can do about it." That's the usual excuse and what a thin, skinny excuse it is! The earlier one starts to develop skinny legs the better, of course, and I do hope mothers of spindle-shanked children will take the hint.

If you're thin all over, you want to develop all over, naturally. For that, a building-up diet, which I've given in these pages before and which I'll send you for the asking if you've missed it and need it. However, since legs are my immediate problem, I must tell you that flesh won't settle on the legs with the ease that it sneaks up on the hips and such. Corrective exercises are necessary. Swimming is excellent, riding a bicycle is good, too. And tap dancing is a good leg developer. If you haven't a bicycle, here's the bicycle exercise:

Lie on your back. Bring your legs up into the air, and keep them there. Now just make believe you are riding a bicycle. That's all—but put plenty of knee action into it, and push as if you were pedalling up a hill.

NOW, my darlings, I want to give you a diet and exercise for the bust. The reduction of this part of the body takes patience, common sense and work. You can't rush headlong into it. You must never use strenuous methods on this part of the body. Never massage the breasts for reducing. You must depend mostly on diet to decrease their size. First, you should go on my general reducing diet for ten days. I've given it here before, but if you haven't it, send for it at once.

After the ten-day reducing diet, you do the following: When you get up—and get up early, if you don't mind!—drink a glass of hot or cold water with a little lemon juice in it. Two hours later, take six ounces of buttermilk. If you think you don't like buttermilk, learn to like it—it's good for you. If you can't learn to like it, drink it anyway. You've got to do a lot of things in life that you don't want to do, and one more little thing isn't going to hurt you. Continue to drink six ounces of buttermilk every two hours, from the time you get up until you go to bed. And don't forget the glass of water every morning. If you find that too strenuous, you can take a cup of beef broth, consomme, tomato juice or fresh fruit juices occasionally . . . in between. But remember, three days on liquid. Then the other four days of the week, back to my general reducing diet, with the single exception that you eat very little meat. Go heavily on the fresh fruits and vegetables. Stay away from starches and take no soup or water with your meals. Stick to this alternating routine until your breasts are the size you wish them to be. And always be sure that you eliminate properly.

Now comes the exercise. This is to firm the muscles and flesh of the bust while reducing, or if they are flabby or sagging. You've got work to do, so let's begin.

First, get yourself a good uplift brassiere, one that gives you proper support. But be sure it doesn't bind you. Then: get a broom or a yardstick. Stand straight. Hold the broom or yardstick in both hands, horizontally across the body. Arms at the sides. Now raise the arms straight out in front of you, and continue on up until your arms are straight above your head, with the stick still in a horizontal position. Stretch up as high as you can. Now, as you bend the arms at the elbows, bring the stick down behind your head until it passes the neck and is across the back of your shoulders. This will force you to keep the shoulders back. Now follow the same course back to the first position. What does this do? I'll tell you: there are muscles on each side of your chest, which run from the top of the breast to the shoulder. This exercise will tighten those muscles and strengthen them so that they can support the weight of the bust. Think about these muscles all the time you're doing this exercise. Concentrate on them. Work in front of a mirror, so that you'll know you're doing it properly. Ten times a day at the start and work up to twenty times. Do it every day, and no back-sliding, do you hear?

HERE'S one last thing: I'm planning an article on beautifying your face by other means than slapping on a little make-up, although make-up is important, too. But right here I want to mention that difficult feature that can make or mar a lovely face, the well known nose. Noses that are too broad, too flat, or too pudgy, you can change. You can't change the bone formation, of course. But the rest you can do. Here's how:

Go to work on that part of your nose which you don't like. Say your nose is too broad. With the second and third fingers of each hand, press firmly on either side of the nose. Use a slight rotary movement and press firmly. Ease up on the pressure a little as you work outward away from the nose, and then move upward and off toward the cheek bones—always a circular movement and never pull or stretch the skin. If you have fat on the tip of your nose, follow this treatment there. (That's what I did for Ruth Chatterton.) A few minutes a day and you'll be surprised how quickly you will notice a marked improvement. A finely chiseled nose is elegant—and for the movie stars it photographs much better. That's a tip for little Alice Faye.

Now, run along and get busy. And write to mama when you want help or get stuck. I'm sitting here with a nice pile of fresh stationery and a brand new ribbon in my typewriter. Don't forget, you supply the envelope, with your name and address and a stamp on it for your reply. That goes for my special consultation and measurement chart, too. Those of you who have had one, will need another one for the next four weeks—and the rest of you had better send for it right away—it's free. So, babies, get out your scissors and clip!

Clothes That Go Places!

with such a lavish hand that her ideas and suggestions will be impractical for us.

Una told me that her idea of really enjoying a trip is to have enough clothes packed in her suitcase so that she doesn't have to stop and ponder on what she can wear every time she makes a change—yet not be so burdened down with bags that her husband wants to drop her off the train before she gets half way to her destination. There's a hint for you brides-to-be who think you have to take along a year's supply of clothes on your honeymoon.

HER first consideration is a good, comfortable and smart traveling outfit. You can see it on page 66. It's a very patriotic color scheme for Decoration Day being red, white and blue basket weave woolen. Her skirt is blue and the smart, trimly buttoned jacket is flame red. Topping this is a white coat made on the new straighter lines with front button closing. A blue and flame red chiffon scarf tucks into the neckline and her brimmed felt hat is red with blue feather trim. Her handbag matches her coat fabric and navy blue sandals with flat heels complete this very wearable and good looking costume.

Of this ensemble, Una said to me, "I really think that I favor this ensemble over any other in my entire wardrobe. This is the season of the year when colors impress me and I amaze myself at the brilliance of the colors I choose."

Still very patriotic is a two-piece silk print that Una recommends as an alternate traveling costume and for general daytime wear, wherever you might go. The print is a white star design on a blue background. The blouse is made like a jacket with buttons of the print brought through pennant-like appliques of white to form a unique trimming detail. Be sure to take a good look at Una's sea-blue felt hat—it's one of the new mannish types that looks so giddy in contrast with a feminine dress. The banding is navy blue ribbon.

Two sports dresses go into Una's suitcase. One is the classic shirtmaker dress that tops all sports lists every year. This is shown on page 65 and it is an example of the white dress with color contrast which I was mentioning earlier. Of silk crepe, the bodice has a deep yoke with inverted pleats used to give a soft fullness below the yoke. Blue buttons fasten the blouse up to the high turnover collar at her throat and also hold down the flap pockets on the skirt. A navy kid belt and navy grosgrain ribbon band on the wide-brimmed hat further carry out the color accent. Again, you will notice that Una wears the sandal type of shoe, this time with the new high-low heel, a heel slightly higher than the flats.

In her second sports dress, Una reverses the color accent by using white touches to contrast with green in her green and white silk print. This dress, too, is simple in design—it features the same short sleeves but the pockets are on the bodice this time instead of the skirt. The full white tie is one of those nice feminine gestures, just what you'll see time and again on the simpler tailored daytime clothes.

Here is one of Hollywood's pet play hats. Just a brim of linen with straps which Jean King designed to unbutton for laundering purposes. A perfect hat to pack for week-end jaunts—so cool, too! They come in all the gay pastel shades. The stars are wearing them with their sport togs.

Right at this point I want you to notice particularly how well Una has planned her accessories so that she needs only a few changes while away. Her color scheme of blue and white is repeated all through her travel and sports clothes, with the exception of the green and white print in this group. But, there again, she has used her head because she can interchange her white accessories with both the blue and the green costumes. Thus into her suitcase goes one pair of white sandals and one pair of blue; the latter she wears for traveling. A white tie, white gloves and blue ones, a blue belt and a white one, a white hat and a light blue one and two handbags—there you have all she needs to make just a few outfits look like a dozen. In fact, the white hat could be the only extra beside the red one she uses for traveling. And even though Una wears navy blue oxfords with her printed tailored dress, she could have worn her blue sandals just as well and eliminated that extra pair of shoes. Subtraction is an art in packing skillfully.

The three charming dresses on pages 64 and 65 are in the Merkel closet, ready for packing in a hurry. Una can make a selection from either one of the three, confident that they will fit into any evening party while she's vacationing. And each one being either of lace or lace and another fabric, it will look fresh and unrumpled upon arrival.

Una says of her evening clothes, "In buying an evening gown I do just the opposite from what I do in selecting my daytime clothes. I pass up the tailored and go thoroughly feminine. I want to feel fluffy, even a bit frivolous—not as though I were dressed in a man's tuxedo. Formal gowns should be woman's one outlet for all of her 'lavender and old lace' yearnings. Her one great care, however, should concern what she wears with such a gown. Adrian, my screen designer, once gave me an interesting tip. It helped me and I am sure it will help a great many others.

"He said, 'When you are dressed for an occasion, whether it is for luncheon at noon or a formal dinner at night, and somehow you don't feel quite right in what you are wearing—take something off. Don't put anything more on.'

"That was a true statement; try it some time. Take off that extra clip or bracelet, or perhaps remove the earrings or a hair ornament. Then see how much better dressed it will make you appear."

The first of Una's evening gowns, pictured, is black lace, and it certainly lives up to her credo on evening clothes. The pert, flaring peplum, the unusual flaring line of the neckline and the outflung swish of the skirt all have that frivolous look she cherishes.

The second dress isn't quite as practical a traveler as the first, Una explained to me, because the full net skirt has to be pressed out upon emerging from suitcase quarters. The jacket of pale yellow lace, to match the skirt, is short and tightly fitted with the wide collar piped in the skirt material. A huge bunch of flowers is pinned on the bodice—these are artificial, but Una interchanges them with real ones when they are available.

And the last dress is one of those soft dinner dresses that can be worn for a dozen and one different occasions. The skirt is fawn-color silk crepe with a cascade ruffle of brown lace down the front and more of the lace edging the hem. The blouse, also of the dark lace, has a jabot at the

"No more 'tired,' 'let-down feeling' for me."

"I reasoned that my red blood corpuscle strength was low and I simply took a course of S.S.S. Tonic and built it back."

IT is all so simple and reasonable. If your physical let-down is caused by lowered red blood corpuscles—which is all too frequent—then S.S.S. Tonic is waiting to help you...and will, unless you have a serious organic trouble that demands a physician or surgeon.

Remember, S.S.S. is not just a so-called "tonic." It is a tonic specially designed to stimulate gastric secretions, and also has the mineral elements so very, very necessary in rebuilding the oxygen-carrying red corpuscles in the blood.

This two-fold purpose is important. Digestion is improved...food is better utilized...and thus you are enabled to better "carry on" without exhaustion—as you should.

You may have the will-power to be "up and doing" but unless your blood is in top notch form you are not fully yourself and you may remark, "I wonder why I tire so easily."

Let S.S.S. help build back your blood tone...if your case is not exceptional, you should soon enjoy again the satisfaction of appetizing food...sound sleep...steady nerves...a good complexion...and renewed strength.

S.S.S. is sold by all drug stores in two convenient sizes. The $2 economy size is twice as large as the $1.25 regular size and is sufficient for two weeks treatment. Begin on the uproad today. © S.S.S. Co.

neckline. This is definitely the "lavender and old lace" type of dress Una meant.

And there you have one of the best planned wardrobes for going places on a jiffy's notice that I've seen in a long time. The reason I said that this group of costumes offered good tips for brides, as well as holiday travelers, is because every item in Una's wardrobe, pictured here this month, would be perfect for trousseaux, too.

Before signing off, I know you'd like a last-minute bulletin on what Grace Moore took with her to Europe from Hollywood shops and designers. Loving the culotte dresses, she took almost a dozen of them, all in cotton or silk, either printed or monotone, with blue predominating, however, and all in a length just below the knee.

Grace took Hollywood-designed sports clothes because she believes that no other place inspires quite such perfect sports clothes as does California. A number of more formal afternoon costumes were in delicate flower prints—and she took along a hatbox filled with large-brimmed hats to accompany these.

Chiffons and softly tailored silk prints for evening gowns, as well as several of the new dinner suits in soft fabrics, went into her trunks.

And there, my friends, are wardrobe ideas for trips from two days to several months! So start your first week-end off in just the right clothes, but not too many of them.

There's a trick to packing easily and adequately for short or long trips. Hollywood stars are prize packers and so I have made some of their best tips into a leaflet called "Roundtrip Travel Pointers." It's absolutely free, merely send a stamped, self-addressed envelope to Adelia Bird, Modern Screen, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Foods that Score a Grand Slam

could ruin our appetites for dinner, not to mention what we did to our figures."

"All we came together for, primarily, was to visit and play bridge, without a thought of food," declared Marsha, casting an extremely interested look toward the approaching refreshments which created some doubt in my mind upon the complete sincerity of her statement.

I, ON the other hand, viewed the advent of tea with the greatest enthusiasm. Not that I was at all hungry. Of course not! I simply and unselfishly wanted to see if I could collect any bridge-party suggestions to pass on to you. Naturally, I had to sample the cake to see if I could recommend it. So I did, and I could, and I do. For it turned out to be something entirely different in the line of fruit cake, made with strawberry jam, delicately spiced and light enough in texture to be enjoyed as a spring or even a summer sweet. I got the recipe for this cake from Arline before leaving, you may be sure.

With the cake the hottest and most fragrant tea imaginable was served. And the only time a servant appeared during the entire time I was there was to replenish the supply of hot water! For Arline, herself, set the table informally, poured the tea, dispensed the cake and passed the tray of tea accompaniments. The latter supplied quite a festive note. The tray itself was fitted with little glass compartments, each filled with something attractively colorful and different. There were lemon slices in one, of course—each with three or four cloves stuck in them. In another there were candied cherries, and next to that there were strips of candied orange peel. In still another dish there were pastel tinted mints. One glass compartment held salted nuts and one was filled to the brim with kumquats, those brightly colored preserved Chinese fruits that resemble oranges, but are about the size of small plums. In each of these was stuck a colored toothpick with which to pick them up and eat them. Cheese popcorn also appeared on the tray.

It was the most appetizing-looking tray I've ever seen! And the only work entailed was in assembling as wide a variety of tempting items as possible. You, too, might try out this idea the next time you have guests whom you wish to impress at a minimum of trouble to yourself. Naturally, you can cut down on the number of things you serve, since Arline's shelves probably are better stocked than most of ours. But try not to have less than five items if you want to make a real impression.

After getting Arline's promise of the cake recipe and after pictures had been taken of the bridge (and tea) enthusiasts, I went about the business of discovering the special dishes the others planned to serve the next time the four met.

"AS I told you before, I go in for sandwiches," Wynne Gibson assured me between bites. "I constantly invent or discover new sandwich spreads and vary them still further by using different breads. Ever think how many kinds there are? White bread, graham bread, rye bread, bran bread, Boston brown bread, finger rolls and baking powder biscuits, to name just a few. Some spreads taste better on one special kind of bread. Others are vastly improved by tucking them between halves of hot, split biscuits. Still others gain originality by combining two breads in one sandwich—white bread and cracked wheat, for instance. I believe in using sweet as well as non-sweet fillings to allow guests to sample and choose, particularly if no other sweet is served. My favorite spreads include a sardine mixture, two peanut-butter spreads—one sweet and one not—and one meat and cheese combination, among others."

In a few quick words Wynne outlined recipes for them, all of which I carefully copied down and which you will now find printed on a recipe card in this month's Modern Hostess leaflet. Want to have a copy? Well you'll find a coupon at the end of this article that will conveniently and quickly bring a set to you—free of charge!

Included in the leaflet also is the Judge Jam Cake I was raving about before. And, of course, I wouldn't dream of leaving out Paula's and Marsha's specialties, so you'll find them in the leaflet, too.

Paula it seems is an ice cream addict of the most pronounced variety. During the fresh berry season her symptoms become even more acute than usual, so that, at this time of year, she always serves a fresh fruit sundae. To make this she places lady fingers, split and cut in half, in the individual serving dishes. The lady fingers are moistened with a little fresh fruit juice before the ice cream is added. Then a big scoop of the smooth, fruit filled ice cream is placed on top of the lady fingers and flocks of whole berries are used as garnish. The Raspberry Ice Cream recipe she recommends—and which I have for you in the leaflet—can be made in an automatic refrigerator, or with a slight change, it can be frozen in an old-fashioned freezer. Directions for both methods are given on the card.

Strawberry pies and tarts are Marsha Hunt's chefs-d'oeuvre. And when served à la mode they can't be beaten. Her recipe is in this month's folder.

Marsha Hunt is a berry and ice cream enthusiast, too, but as she also favors pastries, her refreshments take the form of Strawberry Tarts à la Mode—a cute idea and a delicious combination. Make the tarts according to Marsha's recipe, top each with a spoonful of ice cream and wait confidently for appreciation and praise—for you'll get it. That is, you will if you follow this particular recipe. And since all you have to do to get your set of these four food trump cards is to ask for them—you shouldn't miss this opportunity. Served over the bridge table, the lunch table or the dinner table they're sure to supply you with a winning hand and hand-out! And this is one game where the rules are easy to follow and the hostess is sure to be the winner!

The Private Life of Joan and Tone

her Mrs. Tone yet. Guess I'll try that tomorrow."

The changes in the house turned out to be a source of delight to Joan. The old dining-room was now transformed into a music room. Bill Haines had covered the walls with beige leather and inlaid the ceiling with solid cork. Drum-shaped wall brackets supplied a soft light. It is here that Joan and Franchot pursue their vocal work which may some day surprise their friends.

The new dining-room is the realization of one of Joan's fondest dreams. It is so large that Mr. and Mrs. Tone would have to send messages by carrier pigeon, if they hadn't been wise enough to have an extra small table for two. It is at a bay window at the far end of the room and overlooks the pool and beautiful gardens. It is here they dine when there are no guests to grace the Duncan Phyfe banquet board that centers the room. The walls are white and hand-carved in a morning glory pattern. There are under-glass panels of hand-painted taffeta. The draperies are of the finest embroidered dubonnet velvet.

Franchot's room is a combination of artistic beauty and masculine comfort. Joan gave it to him as a Christmas present and, typical of Joan, she kept it a secret until Christmas Eve. Promptly at five in the afternoon, seven men in a huge truck drove up in front of the house. Orders had been given weeks before and everything was in readiness. When Franchot went down to the library to wrap some last-minute packages, Joan turned on the radio full blast. The men were then given the signal to go to work.

Exactly thirty minutes later, Franchot Tone was the proud possessor of a brand new room. Furniture had been placed, rugs put down, draperies hung, with each man having his own particular job to do. Brown and white is the color scheme. The chairs are brown wool, with brown leather backs. The rug matches. The window cornices are covered with brown leather and trimmed with brass nail heads. The moment the workmen were finished, Joan raced downstairs. Grabbing Franchot by the hand, she made him close his eyes, as she led the way. Piloting him to the center of the room, Joan cried, "Merry Christmas."

Outside of an occasional dinner at the Ambassador, Joan and Franchot are seldom seen in public. Life is so complete, they seldom feel the need of contact with the outside world. One night, when I happened to be dining there, Joan remarked that it had been months since she had danced to good music. Franchot, being an obliging husband, stepped to the radio and tuned in on Eddie Duchin's orchestra.

"May I have the honor of this dance?" he asked Joan, in mock-formality.

"You may, sir," answered Joan coyly. Swinging her up in his arms, Franchot and Joan whirled around the table while the butler, trying to suppress a smile, served the soup.

SATURDAY night is the one night that Joan and Franchot entertain their friends. Usually there are about six people at the table. On rare occasions there have been as many as ten. The Fred Astaires, Jean Dixon, the Irving Berlins and myself are among the more regular guests. Occasionally, Joan and Franchot entertain the Sam Goldwyns, the Gary Coopers and the Gene Markeys. A picture is run in the little theatre and Joan drives herself crazy trying to find a film that no one has seen. One night she had six different pictures of which each person had seen at least one.

"I'm going to form my own company and produce my own pictures," remarked Joan despairingly. "Then you'll see pictures you've never seen before—and probably hope you'll never see again!"

Every day from four to six, unless they are working, Joan and Franchot sing for Signor Morondo. If they feel that anyone is interested and tolerant of their ambitions, he will be invited to listen. If he is lucky he may hear them try a duet from "Traviata." Irving Berlin witnessed a lesson recently and came away completely amazed. Stokowski, the famous conductor, marvelled at their appreciation of good music.

During the week when one or both are working, the Tones retire early. They usually go into the library after dinner and sit before the fire. Sometimes Franchot reads aloud to Joan. If he has lines to learn, Joan sits quietly over a loom and works on hooked rugs. She has completed three of them since the first of the year and plans to present them to her friends next Christmas. Their pet Dachshunds, "Pupchen" and "Baby," receive a great deal of attention. Each dog sits at his master's feet and gazes up with rapt devotion. When Joan gives the word, "Baby" curls up on the train of her dress and goes to sleep. Franchot usually gives "Pupchen" a better break and allows him to climb up in his lap.

"I HAD never hoped to find so much beauty in one person," Franchot told me shortly after their marriage. "Besides her physical beauty, Joan possesses a beautiful mind and a spiritual quality that is going to carry her to supreme heights. Joan has a talent that hasn't as yet been touched.

"When I came to Hollywood, I merely wanted to make money. I had no intention of remaining and little dreamed that such happiness could be in store for me. In Joan I found everything I had ever hoped to find—all in one woman. It was through her persuasion that I took up singing. It is one of the thrills of my life and such a soul-satisfying means of expression."

"Franchot never ceases to amaze me," said Joan. "He is the most honest person I have ever met and I do admire honesty. He has a wonderful perspective on everything. We are so good for each other, because when I get upset, I think emotionally. Franchot has a reserve that is a godsend. It saves him so much and allows him to handle a situation so much better. His ideas are good and he has such a nice way of carrying them out. He is a highly interesting conversationalist. Besides loving him as a husband, I have great admiration for him as a man."

One of the prime factors in the happiness between Joan Crawford and Franchot is their great respect for each other. Both feel respect and consideration for the other and his work, which is the basic foundation of true love. For years Franchot acted on the New York stage and spent the balance of the night in speakeasies. By day he would sleep until it was time to go to work again. The happiness he is now enjoying was an unknown quantity. Joan, having had her fill of gay times, more than appreciates the sanctity of her own home and the peace that comes with love and companionship. Is it any wonder that their mutual love for life and living has created a beautiful kindred spirit for Mr. and Mrs. Franchot Tone?

Lombard, Ltd.

goes on anyway, but more than likely, she'll say, like a good sport and a good pal:

"Well, if I help you, then will you go?"

And Carole, herself, takes a turn at the adding machine and the typewriter!

SURE, Fieldsie has a swell job. A lot of very efficient secretaries would give their eye teeth to be in her spot. I don't know but what I wouldn't enjoy it myself—living right in the same beautiful house with one of the most famous women of the screen, knowing her famous friends, sharing her pleasures and her triumphs, going to swanky parties and wearing lovely clothes.

Fieldsie thinks so. She told someone recently: "I'd rather be Carole Lombard's secretary than Garbo, Dietrich, Harlow, Shearer, Crawford and Hepburn all rolled into one big glamorous number. I have more fun."

You think she's kidding? You don't know Fieldsie. She kids, but she speaks the truth. She knows Hollywood, for she started out as a Mack Sennett comedienne. She met Carole when Carole was a Sennett bathing beauty. But I am digressing. Before I tell you how she became Hollywood's No. 1 Secretary, I want to tell you the story back of it.

Being a glamorous movie star doesn't mean that life is always serene, that you are always happy, that you haven't bumps to take in friendship and business, that there aren't heartaches and headaches. Being a star doesn't necessarily mean that because you have great worldly possessions that you don't need honest, genuine friendship.

And the Lombard-Fieldsie combination started because Carole already had a real and proven friend in Madelayne. I've already said Carole isn't above doing a turn at the adding machine to give her pal a lift over business cares. Why, do you suppose? Because Fieldsie has been giving her lifts ever since they first became friends. Fieldsie has given much to Carole and Carole tries to give back in return. That's friendship, real and rare in these days or any days for that matter.

WELL, then let's go back to the Mack Sennett days. Madelayne was a pretty successful comedienne. She's six feet tall, and in those days she weighed pounds and pounds. This last year she has taken off, under a doctor's careful eye, sixty of them. With her lovely face and now this approachingly well proportioned figure, she's a beautiful girl. But that is still another story.

As I said, Carole was a bathing beauty. The gals became good friends. How? How do you become friends with anyone? It just happens. They liked each other. Madelayne, with her ready wit and humor, was always the center of an applauding group. Carole found her vastly entertaining. As for Fieldsie:

"Although I wouldn't admit it, I was terribly self-conscious about my weight. I knew that Carole realized this, for without mentioning it, she used to say and do things that meant a great deal to me. I remember one thing she said which comforted me greatly. 'Beauty is an asset to a woman as long as she has something inside, but if she hasn't, beauty doesn't count.'

"We were friends. I used to talk to her about her job and she would talk to me about mine. One of the first sophisticated roles Carole achieved—remember she was then that pretty little Peters girl from Los Angeles and quite young—was that of the vamp in the Trem Carr independent, with Vera Reynolds as leading lady. We got her into a slinky evening gown and although neither one of us knew a thing about false eyelashes then, we had heard about them and we sent out for a pair. Between us, we pasted them on. Carole looked a sight, but she photographed beautifully. The part was successful and gave her a big boost.

"Pretty soon after this came her Paramount contract. She made 'Fast and Loose' in New York and 'Safety in Numbers' here. I continued to help her. People got the idea I was her secretary, but I wasn't. I was still earning my $35 a day on my own jobs.

"Then came Carole's marriage to Bill Powell. About this time, a friend of mine, Ann Haines, Bill Haines' sister, decided to go to night school to study stenography. I volunteered to keep her company and take French—I thought it might be of some use to me in pictures. I never did take French, but I took shorthand and typewriting. The shorthand characters fascinated me. Lots of girls hate shorthand, but I was never more intrigued with anything.

I USED to beg Bill Powell, who has the the most perfect English diction of any man I know, and whose letters are fine examples of good English, to let me take his letters. He was obliging, although I must have been a trial, for I was slow and inefficient, as any beginner would be. This proved, however, a marvelous experience and a great help in attaining accuracy and speed.

"Carole's career began to boom. All this time I was taking movie jobs as they came along, but suddenly, as Carole shot ahead so fast, I found I did not have time to go to work. She needed too much looking after. This was the latter part of 1931.

"Carole and I talked the matter over —should I go to work as her secretary or should I not? She wanted me and I wanted the job, but I was afraid of ruining a friendship by a business relationship. You know, when money enters, friendship often walks out of the window. But we decided to take a chance.

"It's worked—it's worked for almost five years, despite the fact that Carole and I have many of the same friends and go to the same places. We live in the same house and are together a large part of the day. A great deal of clowning goes on, but when business, actual cold business involving money, comes up we are serious. I do my work as far as I can without consulting her, but when a matter requiring her attention arises I make a definite appointment to talk it over with her. For example, I say, 'I would like to see you tomorrow. How about 9:30 in the morning?' and Carole will probably say, "Okay, but can we make it 10:30? How long will it take?'

"I run the house, pay the servants and the bills, do her income tax, and pay the insurance. I am really a manager rather than a secretary.

"I do not sign checks. Our original agreement was that I would sign no checks. I wouldn't permit her to give me this authority, for I did not want the responsibility of handling someone else's money to that extent. Carole sticks to the bargain to the letter and keeps my books straight by not writing checks or borrowing any money which I don't know about. If she borrows, she tells me about it and I make arrangements to pay up as soon as possible. We have no debts."

It sounds like a pretty sensible arrangement, doesn't it? And Fieldsie's story a logical enough one of her gradual development into an ace secretary. But can't you see, behind her matter of fact remarks how much she must have helped Carole with straight clear thinking and sincere friendship as the glamor queen started upward on the Hollywood success trail?

Their real, genuine feeling for each other is covered up with much clowning and some of the funniest wise-cracking you've ever heard. Fieldsie has been known to mutter, when Carole has been a little negligent about getting down to business details: "I'm going to fire that gal in the morning!"

Adolph-the-Flying-Dutchman met an English admirer when Freddie Bartholomew visited Jean Harlow on her set. Master Fred, you can see, roller skated over to the "Suzy" set!

AND Carole delights in perpetrating jokes on Fieldsie, like the time when the latter was away on a vacation at Arrowhead and M-G-M kept calling her for a three-day acting job. Fieldsie turned the job down flat, saying that she had too much to do at the Lombard headquarters. But on the second call, while Fieldsie was away, Carole accepted for her and promised to deliver her early Monday. Carole then waited until late Sunday night when it would be too late for Madelayne to break the appointment to call her long distance and tell her she had to do her comedy act at the studio on the morrow. Was Fieldsie mad? Oh, yes, but she couldn't refuse the assignment.

Perhaps you wonder how a secretary, or even a business manager can keep pace in clothes with a famous screen star who must always dress beautifully and expensively. It is a job, but here is where Carole helps out again.

Fieldsie stands pretty much on her own feet, but on the occasion of her birthday and Christmas, Carole always gives her presents and often there is included a lovely evening gown or two, an evening bag and other luxurious accessories. Then there is Carole's birthday. Carole, it seems, doesn't like to receive presents without giving them and on her own birthday she gives practically as much as she receives.

Nice, indeed, but Carole likes to do it and what would she do without Fieldsie to be hardboiled about business matters and keep her from being buffeted around? A woman with a big career such as hers can use a lot of genuine, unaffected shrewd help to keep it running smoothly. Besides, it's pretty nice always having a pal on tap for laughs and relaxation.

Perhaps you understand now why Carole types letters occasionally to help her secretary and enjoys it!

Second Chance

as any. Then, all his obsessions, aberrations and frustrations being neatly catalogued, disposed of and checked out, naturally he fell in love again.

HE met a girl. She was very young, and recently divorced. She was entirely lovely. "She had a lot of healthy young madness in her," is the way Eric says it. They walked around Juan Les Pins, they swam in the moonlight, they bicycled. They found a great, empty, haunted old gambling house on the Island of Campiane and gave an animated and inspired vaudeville performance which echoed through the vast vacancy.

Eric's recovery was almost complete when they joined forces with a group of fun-making young Americans, doing Europe and doing it right. Another group, from Cambridge, appeared out of the azure and were instantly members of the same club. Through France and Spain and Italy, they pursued their merry way. Not the usual time-wasters and money-spenders, but happy young intellectuals who knew where they were going and why—but were not in any great hurry about it. They knew how to play, and for the first time in his life, Eric Linden played. He lost track of time, he

Every girl owes it to herself to make this "Armhole Odor" Test

If moisture once collects on the armhole of your dress, the warmth of your body will bring out stale "armhole odor" each time you wear your dress.

IT is a terrible thing for any nice girl to learn that she is not free from perspiration odor. Yet 9 out of 10 girls who deodorize only will discover this embarrassing fact by making a simple test.

You owe it to yourself to make the test tonight. When you take off your dress, remember to smell the fabric under the arm. If moisture has collected on the armhole, even once, you will be able to detect a stale "armhole odor."

You cannot protect yourself completely by the use of creams or sticks, which deodorize only. They cannot keep the little hollow under your arm dry.

You may be completely dainty, but people near you are conscious of the stale "armhole odor" of your dress! They think it is you!

There is one SURE protection

Once a woman realizes what the problem is, she will insist on underarm dryness. That is why millions of fastidious women regularly use Liquid Odorono. With the gentle closing of the tiny pores in the small area under the arm, no moisture can ever collect on the armhole of your dress, to embarrass you later by creating an impression of uncleanliness.

Any doctor will tell you that Odorono is entirely safe. With Odorono, the excess perspiration is simply diverted to less "closed-in" parts of the body, where it is unnoticeable and evaporates freely.

Saves your lovely gowns

There's no grease to get on your clothes. And with all moisture banished, there's no risk of spoiling an expensive costume in one wearing. Just by spending those few extra moments required to use Odorono, you'll be repaid not only in assurance of complete daintiness, but in money and clothes saved, too!

Odorono comes in two strengths—Regular and Instant. Regular Odorono (Ruby colored) need be used only twice a week. For especially sensitive skin or hurried use, use Instant Odorono (Colorless) daily or every other day. At all toilet-goods counters.

If you want to be completely at ease and assured, send today for samples of the two Odoronos and leaflet on complete underarm dryness offered below.

"I COULDN'T TAKE A STEP IN PEACE!

Every Move, Every Position, Cost Me Pain"

ANY person with Piles knows what suffering is. Piles cause you physical suffering. They cause you mental distress. They make you look worn and haggard.

Piles can take various forms—internal or external, itching or painful, bleeding or non-bleeding—but whatever form they take, they are a cause of misery and a danger.

A Scientific Formula

Effective treatment today for Piles is to be had in Pazo Ointment. Pazo is a scientific treatment for this trouble of proven efficacy. Pazo gives quick relief. It stops pain and itching. It assures comfort, day and night.

Pazo is reliable because it is threefold in effect. First, it is soothing, which tends to relieve soreness and inflammation. Second, it is lubricating, which tends to soften hard parts and also to make passage easy. Third, it is astringent, which tends to reduce swollen parts and to stop bleeding.

Real Results

Pazo comes in Collapsible Tube with Detachable Pile Pipe which permits application high up in rectum where it reaches and thoroughly covers affected parts. Pazo also now comes in suppository form. Pazo Suppositories are Pazo Ointment, simply in suppository form. Those who prefer suppositories will find Pazo the most satisfactory as well as the most economical.

Send for Trial Tube

All drug stores sell Pazo-in-Tubes and Pazo Suppositories. But a liberal trial tube will be sent on request. Just mail coupon below and enclose 10c (coin or stamps) to help cover packing and postage.

didn't have to be any place at eight o'clock, or give out interviews, or consider the consequences, or work up a fine frenzy for the camera, or wear his heart on his sleeve.

He was cured. He was well. He had snapped out of it. He felt so good he wanted more outlet for it than play. All of a sudden, he figured it was time to go back to work.

The tension relaxed, he was full of health and the pure joy of living. Confidence welled in him.

He paused in New York to do a play—preparation for Hollywood again. And then Hollywood. Right away there was "Ah, Wilderness," and he fitted into it like the center piece of a jig-saw puzzle. The company went East to Grafton, Massachusetts. Eric was feted by the Swedish colony in Worcester—he is of Swedish ancestry, though born in New York City. All told, it was a grand trip.

Near Grafton, Eric found a charming seven-acre farm with a house two hundred and fifty years old. "So cheap," he says, "it took my breath away." He bought it. It will be rented to tenants, and will form a nice nest-egg for the boy whose M-G-M contract is bringing him his first real money.

HE bought it because he wants to experience the turn of the seasons, the bleak spareness of real winter, which is never felt in California. He says he would like to live the way Robinson Jeffers, the poet, lives in his stone house looking over the sea at Carmel. He goes up to Carmel and drives 'round and 'round the Jeffers place and he sits and looks at it—because there lives a great poet who is a god to the Eric Lindens of the world.

You might get the idea that Eric was arty (perish the thought), if he wasn't so blessedly sincere about it. He is the best-read young man, with whom I have had the pleasure of conversing, in Hollywood. But why make it geographical—he is a well-read young man in anybody's town. He would like to be remote and contemplate life, to be a great hermit, perhaps, but a lot of living seems to be going on all the time, and he doesn't want to miss it. Thinks he won't be a hermit until next year.

Really, he is the nice, well-bred kind of a young man who takes girls to symphony concerts instead of to prize-fights. If you had a daughter, or if you are one, you would be quite flattered to have Eric's attention, although it might be a good idea to read a book first. He wouldn't ask a dumb girl twice. He looks out of honest, frank eyes. He is sincerely gracious. He hates ostentation and phonies more than anything—but he doesn't soap-box about it. Just avoids it and them. He does what he wants to do, and refuses to do anything again that he doesn't believe in. He is intense, but calm about it. And he is "sweet"—not hard, or calculating, or too briskly casual with people. He is sweet without selling it, and wouldn't like being called it to his face.

As for girls, well, Eric says, "You have to be so darn careful about hurting feelings and being too out-spoken. The Hollywood girls," he glanced about cautiously as if he were about to break down and hand over the key to the mystery, "are all so career-crazy. If they would just now and then have an honest impulse to do something grandly, magnificently mad—you know, nice mad, like, well, like what? Let me think." Eric groped for something mad. Then triumphantly, "Like getting up at dawn and going for a ride with the milkman. Or sleeping on the beach, or just walking somewhere. My gosh, they never walk anywhere. They think you're mad if you suggest it. Well, that's not exactly what I mean. You can't define these things, they just have to overtake you, extemporaneously, and you do them. But the girls out here—well, they don't get overtaken inspirationally. They wonder how it would look in somebody's column the next day. They are always thinking of consequences. But I know a girl in Pasadena, now . . ."

He says he came back to Hollywood enjoying things, and wants to keep on. He likes Hollywood better now because he isn't too analytical about it any more. He is making up his week of seven days, and living them, until the next seven days. No more glooming into the future.

He may have the soul of a poet, but he is a right good trencherman at the table, too. Right now, Eric is up at Lake Arrowhead building himself a sturdy log cabin, where he is going to practise, at odd moments between pictures, being a hermit. I can almost hear his hammer ringing on the nails, and almost see the waiter, wherever Eric takes his dinner tonight, rushing out for double orders.

Because Eric has his health back, he's located his lost perspective, and, barring a little girl-trouble that may crop up here and there, it's all clear sailing from now on!

Absent-Minded Liz

Wasn't she sure of work for a year to come? She could afford to plunge, she thought. She bought herself some beautiful outfits for this trip to America.

Two days before she was to sail, she got a letter from the American producer. Equity, he told her, had forbidden him to carry out the terms of the contract. Because she was English and, therefore, a foreigner, he could guarantee her only two weeks' work. If the first play in which she appeared was a failure, in two weeks' time, she wouldn't be allowed to appear in another one for six months!

"I was frantic," Elizabeth told me, twisting a cigarette in her fingers. "I went back to all the English managers who had offered me work and begged them to give me a job. But they laughed in my face. Their attitude was that I had made my bed and that I would have to lie in it.

"For months I went without work. I moved to a dingy room, and lived on coffee and buns.

"I never told my parents or any of my friends how desperate I was. I was too proud to do anything like that. After all, I had insisted on going on the stage, and I wasn't going to admit failure to anyone. Sometimes my friends used to invite me for dinner at their homes. Then I would take a bus most of the way, which was all I could really afford. When I came to the last street or so I'd grandly order a taxi for myself. Thus I'd arrive in state, although I had very little money.

"I always believed in keeping up a front. Why, with the very first thirty pounds I ever earned, I bought myself a fur coat, deciding that money would attract money, and that the only way to attract work was to look expensive.

"Eventually I did get work with an English company that was going on tour, but I could have saved myself all that heartache if I'd only been a more practical person and investigated that American offer before I signed on the dotted line."

Elizabeth Allan must have someone to look after her or she would be in continual hot water.

THERE was the time when she was in love and planned to get married. Her engagement was to be announced at a very important supper party. That very same day Elizabeth was scheduled to work on some scenes in "Reserved for Ladies" with Leslie Howard.

"Hadn't you better tell them about our engagement for this evening?" her fiancé asked Elizabeth. "Otherwise, they may keep on shooting scenes till midnight."

"Oh, I'm sure it won't be necessary to say anything," said Elizabeth airily. "We'll be through in time."

Knowing her, her fiancé was still worried. "Do you want me to call for you at the studio?" he asked. "Don't you think that would be best?"

Elizabeth shook her head. "No, darling, I'll come straight to the dinner. Don't worry. I'll be there before 11:30."

But the picture was somewhat behind schedule, and late that evening the company was still working. Of course Elizabeth could have explained the circumstances and asked to have the shooting of the scene postponed till the next day. But with her customary irresponsibility she trusted to luck to be through in time. She wasn't.

At 11:30 the 'phone rang. Where was Elizabeth? Her harassed husband-to-be was waiting for her so he could make the announcement of their engagement.

Elizabeth promised she'd be right down. The soup grew cold. The guests grew weary. Elizabeth finally arrived. She was all contriteness. She was so charming and helpless that they forgave her—as people always forgive Elizabeth.

"I don't mean to let people down," she told me. "But it's hard for me to realize that there are only twenty-four hours in the day. There are so many things I want to do. And somehow or other I hopefully believe that I'll be able to do them all. Once, for instance, I had a dinner engagement. Then two old friends from the Gaumont-British Company came to see me and insisted on my going to dinner and the theatre with them. So I called up the friends, with whom I had an engagement, and they said that it would be all right if I managed to meet them by midnight. The two men I was with insisted I must go to the Rainbow Room with them. It would be a shame to miss seeing the Rainbow Room while I was in New York! Finally I went with them, hoping I could meet my other friends in time. It was two o'clock by the time we got through there! And after two, of course, when I met my other friends. You can imagine how they felt!

"I'm so vague about appointments that it's a wonder to me that I have any friends left at all."

Just then the 'phone rang. And Elizabeth made an appointment for the next evening. And after that it kept ringing. She made three or four other appointments for the same evening. It was obvious that her social calendar was hopelessly mixed up. She was like a child who is presented with five or six different kinds of candy, and who cannot possibly choose from among them, so she takes them all.

"I'm supposed to see a preview tomorrow night," she told me, "and I'm supposed to have dinner with Mr. and Mrs. ———. Oh, dear, I suppose I should have told Miss So-and-So that I won't be able to see her. I had an appointment with her for the same time, too."

"How will you get out of it?" I asked interestedly. "Do you ever tell white lies or anything like that?"

"Sometimes," she confessed, looking a little downcast, "but this dinner appointment is business, you see. I've got to keep it and I'll tell my friends that.

"I think it's a good thing for an irresponsible person to be saddled with responsibilities, so after I'd been in Hollywood a short time I bought a house in Beverly Hills," Elizabeth continued. "I hired a new cook and invited about six friends to dinner. Then I went out and played tennis. When I got back home it was almost seven o'clock.

"'What time will you have dinner served?' asked my cook.

"'Oh, I think my friends will be here about seven o'clock,' I said cheerfully.

"The cook's face turned white. 'What friends?' she asked. 'Why, the six friends I'm having up for dinner, of course,' I said.

"'But, ma'am,' she protested, 'you didn't tell me anything about having any friends up. I thought I was just supposed to make dinner for you.'

"There wasn't time, in the short interval that was left, to prepare dinner for seven people. So when my friends arrived there was no dinner. After inviting them to a home-cooked meal, I had to take them out to a restaurant for dinner."

EVENTUALLY, Elizabeth gave up this idea of having a "home of her own" and moved into a hotel. Afterwards she lived with the Dick Barthelmess's. And before she left for England she'd been living with the Countess Di Frasso. Like

HAPPY RELIEF FROM PAINFUL BACKACHE

Caused by Tired Kidneys

Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys — and may be relieved when treated in the right way.

The kidneys are one of Nature's chief ways of taking acids and wastes out of the blood. A healthy person should pass about 3 pints a day and so get rid of more than 3 pounds of waste matter.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, this waste stays in the body and may become poisonous. It may start nagging backaches, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Don't let it lay you up.

Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills — used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help to flush out the 15 miles of kidney tubes. Get Doan's Pills.

all impulsive people, she moves frequently, for no special reason.

"Because my people are in England and I'm usually in Hollywood, I'm continually using the transatlantic 'phone. Now there's a rule in Hollywood that, whenever you use the transatlantic 'phone, you have to pay your bill within twenty-four hours. But I go off to play tennis or swim or go horseback riding and I forget all about those darn bills. Three or four times my telephone's been cut off completely for that reason." The 'phone bills are lower now that she's in England making a picture for Gaumont-British!

"I have no sense at all about money," Elizabeth continued, lighting her cigarette from a tiny shank of silver. "I'm penny wise and pound foolish. I'll save money for months and then blow it all on some foolish thing that's caught my eye.

"I drive my banker absolutely crazy. He believes that I ought to invest some money, but I haven't the haziest idea about investments, so I tell him, 'Just put it away in a safe place where I can get it if I need it.' He thinks I'm slightly mad, for he feels that the money could be earning interest instead of just being put away. But I'm hopelessly impractical.

"Every once in a while, I go over my check books, trying to determine how I've been spending my money, but after a short time, I get tired of the whole thing and give it up. I never have been able to live on a budget."

But the peak of all Elizabeth's irresponsibility, the high mark of her absentmindedness, occurred when she changed banks. At the beginning of the month, she carefully made out checks to all her creditors. Then she sat blithely back, feeling that all her worries were over for another month.

Suddenly she began to get the most indignant letters from the tradesmen whom she had just paid. "It's a shame," they wrote furiously, "that you, a rich movie star, should be trying to cheat us. Your check has just been returned to us, marked 'No Funds.' "

Elizabeth stared at the pile of complaining letters. She turned quite white. Impatiently she dragged out her bank book. What sort of a ludicrous mistake was this? A glance at the bank book confirmed her worst misgivings. No wonder the tradespeople were fuming! She had used the wrong check book and sent out checks on the bank in which she had no money!

Her Boarding House Days

Times Square in search of a job. Managers turned her down with a regularity that was positively nauseating. Miss Harding had had no experience, they said. This went on for months. But was she discouraged? She was not!

Owsley was crazy about her. Whether she was crazy about him, I wouldn't know. She saw a lot of him. And at that time she saw very little of anyone else. I am sure she wasn't in love, though. Love didn't enter into her scheme of things then. Her only love was the theatre. Of course, she hadn't met Harry Bannister at that time.

In fact, men didn't mean a great deal to her. She preferred friendship to romance—and Owsley was that friend.

The boarding house gossip had it that he saw her almost every evening. And the gossip was right.

They would go to a movie, visit an art museum, attend a lecture, or just sit in the parlor and discuss books, interrupted from time to time by the antique and gossiping inmates. Owsley was up to his ears in love and, in turn, received a liberal education. You see, Ann didn't care for jazz parties, so they didn't go to jazz parties. They spent their time in serious pursuits—Ann adored books, so they delved into books, discussing Swinburne and Shakespeare until Owsley was blue in the face.

ANN'S interest in books was second only to that of her stage career. She ate, lived, and drank them. Her mind was like a steel trap. She lived on traditions and had a secret fear of life, but never allowed it to interfere with her ambitions. She reminded me of a sad, crushed poet full of the confusion of life and the fear of poverty. She had a burning desire for fame and success and the peace of financial security.

Months went by, and one day Owsley and I moved to the University campus and we lost sight of Ann and her family. Of course, we heard of her from time to time. Rumors reached us to the effect that she, at last, had secured a job. Then, practically overnight, she was being featured and within another year she was almost a star. Our paths were separated and the boarding house romance was a thing of the past.

Not long ago I saw Ann Harding again for the second time in fourteen years. I had a date with her for lunch at the RKO Studios in Hollywood.

I was ushered down long corridors, across streets, through offices, over stages, and finally reached her dressing-room, a spacious and almost luxurious bungalow.

Ann was in a flutter. She grabbed my hand and her words tumbled out breathlessly, "I'm as nervous as a cat. I've been in the wardrobe all morning, fitting dresses. Drives me crazy fitting dresses. And I've got a sore foot, to boot. Big toe, I think—"

I laughed and looked at her admiringly. She was a dream in pale blue chiffon.

"You look grand," I told her.

Ann beamed with pleasure. "Gee, I'm starved," she said. "Let's eat."

The studio lunch room was packed with stars, extras, and the din of babbling voices. Several people came over to our table and chatted a moment; assistant directors with information relative to the picture, technical men, two or three stars. At last we were alone and I had the opportunity I wanted to talk of the old days and the future.

When I brought up the subject of the boarding house days her eyes sparkled with animation.

"How's Monroe?" she asked. "Haven't seen him lately."

"Fine," I nodded.

"Those were thrilling days," she reminisced. "I can hardly believe that it was fourteen years ago. Life was one glorious dream then." She paused, looked at me, through me, vaguely. "With all that's happened since, happiness, heartache, successes and failures, I've never let anything disturb that dream. At least, I've tried not to. Of course, we must accept the good with the bad."

"Have the failures ever discouraged you, Ann?"

SHE laughed between bites of a chicken salad sandwich. "Not permanently. My marriage discouraged me more than anything else. I tried hard to make it a go, so did Harry. But I suppose it just wasn't to be." She seemed to think of something and leaned across the table. "Do you ever feel bouncy?"

It was my turn to laugh. "Bouncy—?"

"Yes. You know, sort of full inside—bubbling over with the thrill of everything? Well, that's how I feel since 'Peter Ibbetson.' The picture I'm starting now, 'The Witness Chair,' will help me regain my former place in the public eye—I hope."

"Then you're through at RKO?"

"Yes—off to London to do several pictures for Capital Films. I'm looking forward so much to the trip. It'll be fun working over there—and I'm taking my daughter, Jane, with me. I scarcely know myself," she said, cupping her chin in her hands. She became enthusiastic. "I've taken a new lease on movie life and feel like making pictures forever. After all, my life means so much more to me than just success now. I've Jane to live for and work for."

"Are you thinking of marriage again?" I asked. "I've heard rumors . . ."

"Absolutely not. That is, for a while." She changed the subject abruptly. "But you must come up and see that child of mine, she's adorable!"

She talked on ecstatically about the details of rearing a daughter. Her career was forgotten, the lunchroom faded, and she was a mother living in the hopes, the dreams, the future of her child.

She glanced at her wrist watch.

"Phew!" she said. "It's late. Forgive me for running off this way. Do call me up soon. Thanks for coming to see me."

The last glimpse I caught of her, she was running up a studio street, her ash-blonde hair blowing straight back from her face. It was then that I realized that the successes and failures of fourteen years had made little difference in Ann Harding, except that they had broken down her wall of aloofness.

After making a picture in England, which she says is her best role to date, Mary Carlisle returned to Hollywood recently.

That Cagney Cyclone

anything to hand out—he strikes with honest boldness and no sniveling false modesty.

He would make a punk diplomat. The world is over-crowded with persons who say "perhaps" when they mean "yes" or "no."

Out at Jim's house the other morning, he was having a grand time in a blue house-robe of warm wooley fabric which Mrs. Cagney wove beautifully on a handloom for his Christmas present. He loves the rare opportunities he has to wear this garment.

THE rain poured hail-columbia outside, the fire blazed in the Cagney library. Jim curbed his restless vitality long enough to relax—sometimes for five whole minutes—on a long pigskin-covered couch. Even when he reclines, he reclines briskly. And he does not rise in sections, like mush. He executes a neat pivot on his rear axis, lifting head and feet at the same time, and achieves the floor in one gesture. He must have springs in him somewhere.

We had a marvelous talk about his recent fight with Warner Bros. It was going good when the telephone started ringing furiously.

Within the following two hours, I guess every person with a grievance in Hollywood called up Jim and aired it. We had no more opportunity to discuss Jim's personal battle, he was so busy fighting everybody else's. (Oh, all right everybody's else, then, but it sounds terrible.) Fact is, the telephone conversations gave a clearer idea of his opinions on fighting, in general, than would have been possible by asking questions. The telephone was right there at his elbow, I couldn't help hearing, and what he had to say was certainly no secret to anyone who knows him. It just happened that I never heard it all condensed in one bunch before. The six or seven conversations went like this:

"When anything like that comes up, keep it on paper. The only thing to do is fight it all the way down the line, baby. You've made the right beginning, keep a stiff upper lip and don't let 'em upset you, that's what they depend on . . .

"That's the proper attitude—don't back down. See it through and stick tight. Sure, they'll try all kinds of pressure, what of it? Keep banging away, baby, throw rights at their chins . . .

"Hell, no, the publicity doesn't mean a thing, it's read today, forgotten tomorrow. If they can suspend you and then say you can't come back to work until they say so, that's virtual slavery. Who's your lawyer?"

WELL, there's no use being delicate about it. A lot of persons were on the outs with a lot of other persons that morning—and they flew right away to Jimmy Cagney for advice and moral support.

It also goes to show that when people are frantic or frightened or desolate, they call up Jimmy Cagney. If they don't feel a thousand per cent better, then it's a doctor they need. There's nothing like it for the circulation. Jimmy was in the pink. His eyes snapped, his red-sand hair fairly crackled, his voice was quick. Every few minutes he made one of those characteristic Cagney gestures—the hand snapping up, the sudden stop—you can't describe it, but it tells chapters, the way he underplays it. You've seen it, on the screen. It's part of him.

Between phone calls, Jim said he had no notion or intention of getting away from the type he had been playing, but that two roughnecks a year was plenty. He wants to vary them with other characters and types. He added:

"The thing that makes you also breaks you in this business, if you hammer at it too hard. The career is short enough, as it is.

"It is always a good policy to change your pace.

"As for stories, it is better to have good plays and stories adapted than to try to fit the player with vehicles tailored to order.

"I gave up sitting in on story conferences long ago, as most actors have. You always wind up with the same story, anyway. I can do more on the set after the picture is started."

It's no news to you that Jimmy took his recent studio squabble to court. He won his suit and was released from his contract. Naturally, producers are anxious to sign him up, but Cagney would much rather go off to Europe for a year or so and forget all about work. However, the next few months will tell what this spunky gent will do.

JIM paused to answer another call and give his pep-talk about hitting where it would do the most good. Not that he advised indiscriminately. Far from it. He listened with care and concern to the grievance and the groundwork before he gave any advice at all. It would just be tough to ask Jim to advise you if you were fighting over something asinine, and what a scorching that baby could hand out in that case.

"Ever had any set-trouble?" I asked.

"Never!" Jim answered, promptly. "Never an unpleasant experience with any person with whom I have actually worked in a picture—far from it. Before you come out here, the wise-guys warn you about scene-grabbers and camera-hogs and all that rot. I never paid any attention to it, and it has never happened.

"It's only in the business deals you haven't a chance without a lot of people wanting an edge. My brother is now handling all my business, and are the flesh-peddlers burning. Imagine an Irish agent!"

Jim has a way of inspiring a sort of idolatry among his friends, without trying. He is the best company on earth, when the mood is on him. He will sit through lunch until five o'clock with some intimate group in a far corner of a restaurant, his vivid audacious face leaning far over the table, as he recounts some fantastic mad Irish story. He loves them. The wilder the better. He knows a million, a lot of them about his family. Little, fabulously whimsical things they used to do—ridiculous, romantic, notional—which makes them peculiarly his. For instance, the way his father used to go around the breakfast table and kiss all of them good-bye every morning, walk to the door, look back and solemnly cross himself—then bend over and tie his shoe-laces! Why he left the shoe-laces until then no one knows.

God only knows why the Irish do most things, but we are glad that they do!

quaint. Another of a man signed "Uncle Bogey." One of a man—how well we know him!—signed "Eric Blore." Another with the inscription "N. Carter Slaughter." Others signed "Nigel Playfair," "Frances Wetherall," "Gerald Du Maurier" . . .

And Bart said, suddenly, pointing to the little gallery of framed faces, "They are my past and they made my future. They can tell you my story. They are responsible for whatever I am today . . ."

"My father," said Bart, fumbling with his pipe in the rather embarrassed way all nice men have when they are embarrassed, "my father was responsible for my dreading the stage as a career. Because of his life in the theatre I am one actor who never wanted to be an actor—quite terribly the reverse. My father was a grand actor—better than I can ever dream of being, as a matter of fact—but the world never found out how grand he was. He was, I think, lacking in 'drive,' in the ability to sell himself. I only know that he spent his life touring the provinces, that he never got the breaks and that, as a result, there was never quite enough money and always too much worry. My mother always accompanied him on tour. And during vacations I, the only child, went with them.

"And so, I saw the theatre, not as a glamorous world of lovely ladies, champagne in slippers, violets, hansom cabs and late suppers—but as a drab work-a-day world, where discouraged men and tired women tried to make four shillings do the work of eight. I saw the theatre as a place where actors daubed their faces with grease paint which concealed, only too thinly, their humiliations and heartaches. They were actors, those poor darlings, though the world never gave them a hand. No, I had no reason to love the theatre. I saw the seams, never the spangles. And

I'VE DISCOVERED AMERICA!"

"I'm an explorer! I've found out more about this great country of ours in three weeks than I could have in a lifetime poring over geography books. And what a comfortable way to explore . . . in a big Greyhound motor bus, among congenial fellow travelers, with one of America's finest drivers at the wheel. The cost of my trip, going one way, returning another, was less than gas and oil for a small private auto! Here are a few of my delightful memories:

"Everyone aboard the big bus smiled when that starry-eyed young couple got off at Niagara Falls. As if we didn't know all the time where they were headed—and why!

"What a thrill . . . when a tiny fawn burst from the woods, scampered across our road, and went splashing through a Minnesota stream.

"In the shade of a giant redwood grove, it took fifteen of us, stretching our arms wide, to encircle one of those tremendous trees.

"As our bus was ferried across San Francisco's Golden Gate, we could look up and see men, like microscopic spiders, spinning the cables of the world's mightiest bridge.

"I will never forget that wrinkled old Indian woman who sold me the clever little hand-woven basket, beside rainbow-colored Apache Trail.

"Our Greyhound bus actually passed right over the top of Virginia's marvelous Natural Bridge—an experience I will always remember!"

Why don't you plan to discover this amazing America for yourself? Greyhound offers the most interesting way, and by far the most economical. Start now, by mailing this coupon.

so I never postured before a mirror, at the age of six, aflame with the ambition to play Hamlet. I spent most of my time trying to forget those tired faces which the footlights served only to illumine, mockingly."

And as Bart talked, in his eyes the remembrance of those things past, I understood the kindliness and tolerance mentioned by Bob Montgomery. Of course, he would be kindly and tolerant, remembering so much frustration and pain. I understood now what the prop men meant when they said, "He seems to care . . ." Of course, he would care, remembering those hard-working, frightened troupers of his childhood. I understood what Bill Seiter had meant—for, of course, he would work until he dropped dead, uncomplainingly—he had seen too much of failure and defeat to dare to take work casually. His is an heritage of remembering the problems, pains and perplexities of simple, unsuccessful people.

WHILE at school, Bart lived with his mother's sisters, three spinster ladies called, respectively, Aunt Daisy, Aunt Nellie and Aunt Dolly. "It was Aunt Nellie who really brought me up," said Bart, "during the travels of my parents." They were three frail little mid-Victorian ladies, who lived surrounded by canaries, Nottingham lace curtains and the pressed-flower fragrance of Mr. Tennyson. Aunt Nellie used to make poetry, Bart remembered, out of everything she read—advertisements in magazines, slogans on soap wrappers—she would read them aloud as though she were reading verse. They lived in a world where Victoria was still queen and Lord Tennyson still the poet laureate. And the boy Bart lived with them, drinking in that gentle atmosphere with his tea and crumpets. They were gentle, good and unworldly. They loved Bart and worried over "the good of his soul."

The three little aunts, I believe, explain the "beautiful courtesy." They, undoubtedly, conditioned the gentle compassionate manner which is the grown man's greatest charm for women.

"When I was about sixteen," Bart was saying, as I poured tea for him ("sugar-and-a-dash-of-milk-please" was the order), "I had to leave school entirely—not enough money to go on. I took a job in an accountant's office, not because I wanted to be an accountant, but just because I had to have a job. I was unfortunate in that I didn't know what I wanted to be, or to do. My ambitions were not ignited. And I was the office boy, nothing more. Eventually I was fired so I lived again with the little aunts. I was at loose ends, unhappy. Finally came a letter, offering me an assistant managership of a musical comedy company going out on tour. The three aunties, bless them, didn't think it quite nice for me to be going on tour with 'all those young ladies in the chorus, Bart dear'—but I went.

"I took the job for the sake of the few shillings in it. I kept on taking similar jobs for the same uninspired reason. Not yet had Thespis tinged me with his fervor," smiled Bart (he seldom laughs aloud), "not until I met Eric. Yes, Eric Blore. We were playing, when we met, with Robert Courtneidge's company of 'The Arcadians.' I was playing the imposing role of a footman, I believe. Odd that I should have been a footman at just that time—and Eric, so much later, so superior a butler! At any rate, we met. And there began the friendship which has never faltered for a moment from then to now!

"And it was Eric Blore who was the turning point in my adult life. It was Eric who opened doors for me, the existence of which I had never suspected. It wasn't that he did anything concrete for me. Quite simply, by the fact of his being just Eric, he spoke a language I had not been hearing in the nice, lazy unimportant surroundings of a road-show musical. He was unique in those surroundings, and his wit was brilliant. Even those many years ago, he had started to coin phrases that are to me, and to many of his countrymen, near-classics. In short, his already established brilliance (which I had the good fortune to recognize) removed me mentally from the genial, hearty but frightfully limiting language and outlook I was acquiring from the other lads, of more ordinary theatre patterns. He gave me what I can best describe as a 'flavor' to life. And I, who had never had any real ambitions, any soaring hopes for myself, began to reach out, to grope, to stir, as it were, in my sleep. I have Eric to thank for this."

And so, by one of those strange paradoxes, which makes life so fascinating a serial story, we have the magnificently meek Mr. Blore to thank for the sauvity, the subtlety, the "flavor" which is Bart Marshall today.

BART was on his way, then. He began to do some good things. He played better and bigger parts. He began to feel himself not just one of the boys around the place, but an actor with a shapening goal. He did considerable touring. He filled in between tours with some short-run plays for N. Carter Slaughter. And then came the war.

When Bart came back from the war there was that something in his eyes which has never faded out of them—the living memory of pain. For Bart spent ten months in a base hospital, one of thousands of young men with grievous war wounds, who stared at blank hospital walls and saw no writing on those walls for them! He had eleven more months to spend in a wheel chair before he learned to walk again. It was all over, he thought, before it had really begun. The aromatic flower of living, which Eric Blore's personality had planted, was now a trench flower mired in mud and stained with his own spent blood.

Then entered Uncle Bogey, his mother's brother, whose real name was L. Godfrey Turner.

"If it were not for Uncle Bogey," Bart told me, "you would not be sitting here now, trying to write a story about me. No one would have heard again of Herbert Marshall. Uncle Bogey was a journalist, a writer. He was, also, an epicure and something of a dandy. He was sartorially perfect and he seldom had a sou to his name! He had a lavish joy in life, an embattled mind, keen wit, sensitive appreciations and a gallant soul. Many of the things I care about, today, I derive from Uncle Bogey. I love big cities, for instance, as he did. I have no desire to go back to the land. I like sophisticated men and women. I like intelligent talk about good books, plays, the enterprises of others. His rich outlook on life gave me these things. I am really happiest when I am with 'mine own people'—the people of stage and screen. I adore shop-talk. I'm not domestic. I do dislike coping with material problems. The adventures of the mind are so much more satisfying—so Uncle Bogey said. I have no interest in politics. I should like enormously to write.

"These things and many others I 'got' from Uncle Bogey. And something even more vitally important. Uncle Bogey had lost his first-born son in the war. And when I went to stay with him at his villa some twenty-five miles out of London, there within sound of the firing and living under nightly danger of air raids, I came to know him as man to man—both men desolated. He proved to me that a man may face utter desolation without whimpering. By his fine courage and by his gorgeous humor, which not even grief could crucify, he showed me how a man may know irreparable loss and still inherit the earth. When I learned to walk again, I returned to London, healed in spirit if not in body, and all because of Uncle Bogey."

AND so it is to Uncle Bogey that we turn for the explanation of that valiant spirit which has made Herbert Marshall succeed in the very teeth of his irreparable disaster. It is Uncle Bogey who gave him back his hope, his confidence which were literally shot away from under him. It was Uncle Bogey who taught him how to take his first step over the debris—the first lap of the triumphant journey—to Hollywood.

"I want to hand a very special orchid now," Bart said gravely, "to N. Carter Slaughter, who gave me back my job in life with one casual, magnificent gesture. Magnificent just because it was so casual. He took up the work Uncle Bogey had begun and made me whole again.

"I returned to London. I was no longer defeated in spirit but certainly, I thought, I am defeated in my profession. I could no longer see myself as any kind of Romeo, famous and footlighted. One night I was in a pub in London. It was one of those thickly foggy nights when men look like ghosts of their former selves. I felt like a ghost of my former self, a very couragous ghost, but disembodied. I was trying to face the grisly fact that I had been an actor and that, just as I'd begun to love the thing, it was denied me.

"Slaughter came into the pub that night. He strolled over to me, shook hands, said casually, 'Can you go out for me in such and such a company next week?' That was all. And it was the beautiful casualness of the offer, the assumption that there was no reason why I shouldn't go out, no reason why I shouldn't pick up where I had left off that—well, that resurrected me from the trenches, that healed my war wounds. God bless him for that. I want to give him very special honorable mention, for no story concerning me or my life could be authentic without him."

I think it is N. Carter Slaughter who gives us the explanation of why Bart is the man's man he is. For he has known

1 SECOND LATER
GRAND! POND'S VANISHING CREAM FIXES THAT
BEDTIME
OVERNIGHT TOO-FOR EXTRA SOFTNESS

When you Melt away dead skin cells

Miss Wendy Morgan, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William Fellowes Morgan, Jr., New York: "I smooth my skin with Pond's Vanishing Cream. Make-up looks smart!"

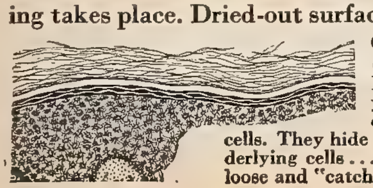
YOU really have the softest skin imaginable. If you'd only bring it out! Its true softness is hidden by dull, dead cells—which you yourself can melt away.

Day after day, your skin is drying out. Little cells are forever shriveling into dry, flaky bits—mean "powder catchers"! But you can smooth your skin instantly—with a keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream)!

A distinguished dermatologist says: "When a keratolytic cream (Vanishing Cream) touches the skin, an instant softening takes place. Dried-out surface cells melt away. Young underlying cells come into view. The skin quickly acquires smoothness and fine texture."



Outer Skin (Magnified) Right on top, you see the dead surface cells. They hide the young underlying cells . . . In time, flake loose and "catch" powder.

Try Pond's Vanishing Cream with the coupon below. See how it puts an end to roughness, an end to powder trouble. Starts you toward a young, fine-textured skin! Apply it twice a day . . .

For a smooth make-up—Always before you put on make-up, film your skin with Pond's Vanishing Cream. More than a powder base, it melts away flaky bits . . . leaves your skin smooth. Make-up goes on evenly with a "beauty-salon" finish!

Overnight for lasting softness—Every night after your regular cleansing, spread Pond's Vanishing Cream on your face, hands, elbows. It isn't greasy, won't show. Just goes on invisibly . . . melting away every last roughness, softening your skin the whole night through!

8-Piece Package POND'S, Dept. F136, Clinton Conn. Rush 8-piece package containing special tube of Pond's Vanishing Cream, generous samples of 2 other Pond's Creams and 5 different shades of Pond's Face Powder. I enclose 10¢ for postage and packing.

friendship of such metal as would make friendship sacred to him. I think, too, that N. Carter Slaughter further explains the kindness which is so integral a part of Bart's personality. He has not forgotten the sensitive, great kindness once shown to him.

"And after that," said Bart, as his man lit the lamps in the twilit room and removed our tea things, "I began to get places quite rapidly. Frances Wetherall, an actress and a friend of mine, introduced me to Nigel Playfair—later Sir Nigel Playfair, now dead—and that meant the Lyric Opera House in Hammersmith, London, and wider attention than I had yet known. Then came the better theatres and bigger parts. And finally Sir Gerald du Maurier came along with the play 'Interference' and the memorable occasion when Sir Gerald literally turned the play over to me, reversed the order of the thing, made my part bigger than his own, made it the part in the whole play. It was definitely he, who established me as an actor, with capital letters. Odd, too," said Bart, smiling, "that I should have scored almost all of my stage successes in the roles of 'cads with charm,' whereas, in pictures, I have played, too consistently, the long suffering lover, the gallant martyr. I rather think I should like to play rogues again—'on relief,' that would be!"

Bart rose and together we stood for a moment and looked at the little gallery of framed pictures. "I really do owe whatever I am," he said, "to this little gallery of my friends. Their faces are fading a little, here in the powerful California sunlight, but their influence will never fade so long as I live. They are, really, the 'why' of me . . ."

And as I drove away my curiosity was appeased. I wondered no longer. I felt that the man had stepped from behind the actor and that the complete explanation of Herbert Marshall had been made.

Do Women Spoil Men?

they earn for non-essentials, or for anything that does not cut into the man's sphere of supporting his own family. And if they do have to use their money for essentials, they should do some super pretending—they should say that they want these silly, superfluous things which are not, of course, really necessary—dear me, no!

"But I don't call this sort of thing spoiling. I call it—loving. And there is such a fine art in loving," said Virginia gravely, "it's so easy to love too well. Not so easy to love wisely.

"If a man can take care of his wife and wants to do it, I definitely believe that the woman should 'spoil' him by giving in to him. Most of us would make far better wives and mothers than we make politicians, would-be artists or actresses. The world wouldn't really miss us if we just stepped out of the arena and stayed at home where we belong.

"I definitely believe that the man of the house is the one who should be waited on and catered to. (Ah, there, husbands!)

I BELIEVE that a man should feel free, pleasantly and without nagging, to go off and play golf Sundays, to go to smokers and stag dinners, to clubs and on hunting trips, because," continued Virginia, "and although I expect the Federation-of-Martyred-Wives to slay me for this, I do feel that a woman has a right to share his life but not to own it.

"I believe that most men are fairer than women. They are more apt to give too much, rather than too little. And you have, in extreme cases, that most pitiable exhibit on earth—the hen-pecked husband! I really think," said Virginia, with an amused twinkle in her wide blue eyes, "that I should like to open a home for hen-pecked husbands. I would like to run the home myself with the aid of a dozen pretty girls. And I'd give the poor fellows such a course of flattery and patting on the back as would turn a Mr. Milquetoast into a Mussolini over night!

"But I don't believe that women should spoil men by giving in to them in little personal matters.

"For instance, men I have known have objected violently to my using nail-polish and make-up, and some have objected to certain gowns or hats. More than once, I've gone about without a trace of make-up, with my nails a ghostly white, in order to please a masculine edict. I shouldn't have done that. If women want to use make-up, have manicures, go window-shopping and do other little 'silly' things most women enjoy, they should not spoil men by giving them up for a masculine whim. They certainly do not detract from a man's self-importance. On the contrary, men feel all the bigger and stronger because they can mock at such goings-on.

"Women should spoil men by deferring to them in arguments; by seeming, at any rate, to accept superior male judgment on such matters as politics and finance and things like that.

"I'm glad that I spoiled my husband. I'm glad that I waited on him. If I'd been older and wiser, I might have spoiled him more subtly and so, more successfully. But I'm glad that I tried, anyway.

"And because I am the type, I guess, who just does run upstairs and take the lipstick off when I am told, I'll probably always spoil men."

Just then Spencer Tracy came over to our table in the commissary—for the sole purpose, apparently, of telling Virginia how beautiful she is. Clark Gable shouted something lusty and admiring across the room to her—and Bill Powell sauntered by to make her his suavest bow, saying something about "Beautiful lady . . ." And then I departed before it became a case of S. R. O.

And I thought, as I walked across the lot, how seldom it is that such beauty as Virginia's is warmed by so honest and humble a heart; how very few girls of such exquisite, authentic beauty ever feel or even dream of "running errands" for men, or making sacrifices for them or of pampering them.

only a clever designer but a grand person, makes the most wonderful clothes for me and I wear them as if they were old rags. I'm much more comfortable in things like this.

I'M sloppy around my house, too. But I think there's a reason for that. My mother is the neatest person alive. When I was a kid I had to have everything in order. When I took off my clothes at night they must be hung over the back of a chair, neatly folded.

"I always said to myself, 'Just wait until I'm on my own.' Well, I'm on my own now so things fall where they may and my desk is piled so high I can't see the desk itself. I'm terrible about answering letters. I figure that, if you wait two months, the letter automatically becomes answered.

"Then I'm completely non-social. Even as a child I didn't have friends. I just wouldn't be charming when it was necessary. So now I shut myself up in my apartment and grouse about Hollywood. When I come back to Hollywood from a trip to New York, my manager meets me at the plane and starts in on me by saying, 'Well, if ever I see a smile on your face, when you land, I'll think the world is coming to an end.' That usually brings a laugh. But when I see the palm trees and all the sunshine I begin to crawl behind the wall I've put up for myself.

"I've lived in the same apartment for three years and I'll bet that not twenty people have been inside it. I have a few friends—people I admire tremendously, people I adore to be with, but I want no casual acquaintances. I'd so much rather be by myself. I'd so much rather get up early and ride horseback over these brown hills. I'm a nice person then, really I am. It's when I come in contact with all the intrigues and smallnesses of civilization that I get hard and cold and unhappy.

"You see, I refuse to take responsibility. I had a big house once and I couldn't stand it. When I'd be reading or thinking over a script, or just being alone with myself, there would be the gardener telling me that a rose tree had died, or the cook would suddenly pop up saying that the roof was leaking and I'd better call somebody about it. So I got rid of the house and have a small apartment now and somebody else worries about dying rose trees and leaking roofs!"

Sylvia nestled cosily in the corner of the booth. "I know that the first time I ever saw the man who directed 'The Trail of the Lonesome Pine,' he hated me. I couldn't work up any enthusiasm over the story and I showed it. Once I got into the picture I loved it. I enjoy working. I give a picture everything I have to give.

"But here's a curious thing. There are so many things people can say about me. I have so many real faults. Yet one of the things that has been said most persistently isn't true. I'm not troublesome on the set. Only once have I ever walked out on a picture and that was when I was very ill and needed an operation on my throat so badly that, if I had not had it, I might have died. But I've the reputation for walking out in the middle of pictures. On the contrary, I've worked when I was just out of bed with pneumonia and I was almost too weak to hold my head up. I've worked even when I had a sprained ankle.

"Of course, I enjoyed that. It makes a martyr of me and there's nothing so much fun as being a martyr. It makes your breakfast taste so good!

"But, when I'm being terribly martyred, I re-read a letter I got from my father recently. I asked him how the family felt about my divorce. He wrote back and said that my life was my own to live as I thought best, 'but,' he added, 'what people never can understand is how a girl, who made $110,000 last year, can be unhappy.'

"That should make every Hollywood actress sit up and think. We all complain, grouse, mumble and believe ourselves badly off emotionally and professionally—and yet we make all that money."

SHE stopped long enough to smile. Suddenly, she said, "I shouldn't be married. I'm not willing enough to compromise. I've too many faults. Marriage is always a compromise. Both parties have to concede certain things, don't they? It seems to me that it's always difficult when two definite personalities—two people who have lived their own lives, thought their own thoughts and worked out their own problems—get married.

"But I think it's better, when a mistake is made, to try to rectify it immediately and not let it drag on until everyone is made miserable. I've often been criticized for doing that but it's the only way I can do. I believe that, if your emotions get in the way of your intelligence and cause you to do foolish things, the sooner you set those things as right as possible, the sooner you let intelligence guide you once more, the better off you are. But, invariably, in Hollywood, you are misunderstood.

"In fact, perhaps I shouldn't even be in Hollywood—because there's so much compromising to be done here, too.

"The man I admire more than anyone in the world is my Cousin Albert. He lives his life with complete integrity. When he first came over from Russia, my father sponsored him and wanted to give him training to become a dentist. Albert walked out. He disappeared completely for six months. Everyone said he was terribly ungrateful. And then he suddenly reappeared. He had taken a job as a barker at Luna Park to get enough money to study what he wanted to study. He knew he would not stick to dentistry. Now he works in the Rockefeller Foundation and is completely happy. He is married to a lovely girl. They have very little money but their lives are ideal, for he is doing real work and living simply.

"Our lives are too cluttered with nonessentials. In spite of the money, we picture people haven't a chance for real happiness. We are living in too false a world."

And there is Sylvia Sidney—revealed and explained by herself. Do you see now why her marriage was doomed?

Sylvia gives herself no quarter. She has complete honesty. It is impossible, as she has told you, for her to lie to other people. It's just as impossible for her to lie to herself, and that's the rarest and truest form of integrity. Her intelligence is as keen and bright as a Toledo blade. She makes emotional mistakes but that's because her emotions are always at war with her intelligence. And that's apparently what happened when she married Bennett Cerf and was separated from him almost before you could take a deep breath. The emotional pattern of her existence intruded, but she was honest and courageous enough, in a town so eager for gossip as Hollywood, to correct the mistake as soon as possible. She often has stated that she has nothing but the greatest respect and highest regard for Cerf. An equation in her background complicated the problem.

Sometimes her emotions are not to be trusted. Her intelligence never fails her.

I said some of these things to her that day at luncheon. She laughed. "Listen, you're not supposed to be telling me about myself, I'm supposed to be telling you. But, anyhow, I feel better. This talk is like going to a psychoanalyst! Honest confession is good for the soul."

She gathered up her riding crop and gloves and, with her head held high, she threaded her way between the Vendome tables. She says she can't turn the charm on and off. As a matter of fact, she can't turn it off, because the charm of honesty and intelligence is something she has to a degree seldom found in Hollywood. For difficult as the feat is, Sylvia Sidney looks herself squarely in the face! And it's a very swell face.

That Beauty Called Smooth

for the lip rouge. Smooth on the lipstick, blot with tissue and look at the grand results in the mirror. The lipstick sets perfectly and lasts much longer.

If you want your make-up to stay smooth and remain fresh looking over a long period in hot weather, don't forget to use either a foundation cream or lotion. And if you like that fresh, outdoorish look that is so charmingly apparent in the picture of Paulette Goddard this month, try this trick. Dampen a piece of cotton with skin tonic and pat it lightly over your face after you have applied your make-up. It gives the skin that faintly dewy young look that is fascinating.

And before I wander off on other items, I want to suggest a boon to all of you who find that warmer weather increases perspiration. Liquid powders which have a slightly astringent effect are marvelous for leaving your skin with a smooth, dry and attractive finish.

Hair has a lot to do with this business of "smooth" good looks. And a skillful permanent is one certain way of insuring a trim, well-waved and curled top piece. But before you sally forth for your permanent, give your hair a break by toning it up in advance. Map out a regular routine for each day. Like this—use a good hair tonic and brush or massage your hair carefully. Plan to have a few hot oil shampoos or give them to yourself, using either one of the prepared oils on the market or just a good brand of olive oil. Always heat the oil before using. Any temperature that is comfortable for both your

THIS BRUNETTE GIRL IS ACTUALLY 3 YEARS YOUNGER THAN THE BLONDE!
No!

DO BRUNETTES LOOK OLDER THAN BLONDES

THE ANSWER IS THAT 7 OUT OF 10 BRUNETTES USE THE WRONG SHADE OF FACE POWDER!

BY Lady Esther

If there's one thing women fool themselves about, it's face powder shades.

Many women select face powder tints on the wrong basis altogether. They try to get a face powder that simply matches their type instead of one that enhances or flatters it.

Any actress will tell you that certain stage lights can make you look older or younger. The same holds true for face powder shades. One shade can make you look ten to twenty years older while another can make you look years younger.

It's a common saying that brunettes look older than blondes. There is no truth in it. The reason for the statement is that many brunettes make a mistake in the shade of the face powder they use. They simply choose a brunette face powder shade or one that merely matches their type instead of one that goes with the tone of their skin. A girl may be a brunette and still have an olive or white skin.

One of Five Shades is the Right Shade!

Colorists will tell you that the idea of numberless shades of face powder is all wrong. They will tell you that only five shades are necessary and that one of these shades will flatter your tone of skin.

I have proved this principle. I know that five shades will suffice. Therefore, I make Lady Esther Face Powder in only five shades. One of these five shades, I know, will prove just the right shade for you. It will prove your most becoming and flattering.

I want you to find out if you are using the right shade of face powder for your skin. I want you to find out if the shade you are using is making you look older or younger.

One Way to Tell!

There is only one way to find out and this is to try all five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder—and that is what I want you to do at my expense.

One of these shades, you will find, will instantly prove the right shade for you. One will immediately make you look years younger. You won't have to be told that. Your mirror will cry it aloud to you.

Write today for all the five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder that I offer free of charge and obligation. Make the shade test before your mirror. Notice how instantly the right shade tells itself. Mark, too, how soft and smooth my face powder is; also, how long it clings.

fingers and your scalp is right. The warmth of the oil aids its penetrating the scalp. Using a piece of absorbent cotton dipped in the oil, apply it all over the scalp, parting the hair about every two inches to make sure it doesn't miss a spot.

AFTER the oil has been applied, wrap your head up in a towel which has been wrung out in as hot water as you can bear. Do this five or six times. Then, in the shampoo and the final rinse water, use the strained juice of two lemons. Three or four of these treatments will leave your hair in wonderful condition for the permanent.

For the actual wave and curl, there's a new machine that is the last word in modern design. It has red and green lights like a stop and go traffic system plus a tinkling bell. It's all done up in a streamlined cabinet that looks like a radio when closed, and a huge adding machine when open. It works on the same principle as your electric refrigerator and believe it or not, it waves the hair in a minute and a half.

Here's how this tricky waving affair works. First the operator gives you two test curls. This determines how long the pre-heated clamps should remain on the head for the most satisfactory results. She sets the indicator on the dial to the exact time which the better of the two curls prove your hair should have. The second this time is up, a bell rings and the little clamp which supplied the heat, is lifted from your pate. Each clamp thus permanently waves a strand of hair in practically no time and with so little discomfort you'll hardly believe it's possible. Best of all, you are free to get up and move around as you please during the process. Another nice thing about this method is that every protector and pad used, is made so that it can be used only once. In other words, you get a truly individual permanent wave which, I am told, eliminates all possibilities of burns and it also waves the hair closer to the scalp than has been possible heretofore.

Before leaving the interesting subject of hair, how about a word or two on new coiffure twists? It certainly doesn't matter this spring whether your hair is long, short or medium for there is an infinite variety to the way, you can arrange your hair to bring out your best points. Often the mere changing of the part in your hair gives your face a new individuality. There are so many smart variations around the center part theme that if you do look well with your hair cleft down the middle, try it. And the simple dodge of parting your hair on the opposite side from the way you've been wearing it is another suggestion. Whatever way you do change your hair comb, be sure to go to an expert when you have your hair thinned—nothing spoils the contour of a head more than a botch job of hair thinning.

If you wear curls, wear them discreetly. And a soft swirl to one side at back is very flattering. You can have a swirl even with long hair; just turn the ends under on the side toward which the swirl goes. The whole effect of your head this spring should be sleek but soft—and your waves should look natural, never rigid and set. And for a final "smooth" dash, try spraying perfumed brilliantine lightly over your completed coiffure—it adds such a lovely glossy sheen.

A well-known nail polish manufacturer has your new costume colors in mind when suggesting a triumvirate of polishes to complement all your spring togs. They are rust, ruby and rose. The rose is suggested as a complement to pastels, the ruby for black or white and the rust for any of the costume colors on the yellow cast such as the new browns, yellow, tangerine etc.

Like your hair, your hands will benefit by a hot oil treatment. Smooth the oil in thoroughly and leave it in for fifteen minutes. And don't forget to use a manicure cream, every night, if possible. I found one that's elegant—it keeps the cuticle soft and smooth while it prevents your nails from becoming brittle. The same house which puts out this excellent cream, also has a cream for removing nail polish together with two good liquid polish removers. The latter two are made for difrent types of nails, one with an oily base for you who have dry, brittle nails and one without oil for normal nails.

They may not look very decorative, but a cheap pair of cotton gloves pulled on over your freshly creamed hands at night, will, when pulled off in the morning, reveal those lily white hands you yearn for. Any good lubricating cream, massaged into the hands, will do the trick.

There you are, my pets, with enough beauty cues to carry you through the spring and summer. And if you aren't termed "smooth" after such careful grooming and broad hints as to new ways to go about it, it isn't my fault.

Before I leave you, however, I want to ask you if you have been worried over what to give as graduation gifts? Brides and graduates have a way of turning up this time of year and what to give them is a problem. Turn to the cosmetic counter for ideas, there isn't a girl who doesn't adore perfume, toilet water, bath salts and bath powder as a gift. And there are those grand kits that are not only the last word in smart design, but the ultimate in the all 'round usefulness of their beauty contents. Then there are lipsticks, combination vanities and eye shadows for the more sophisticated of the sweet girl graduates.

And don't forget to turn back to page 20 for the free offer "Reminders from My Notebook."

be an actress. The screeching was Lady Macbeth! Want to hear more of her? . . ."

"Hush," said Mrs. Kies. "No more of that now please. If you're going to be an actress, I suppose that's what you're going to be . . . but please, darling, try to be a little quieter about it!"

On that day when Margaret announced that she was learning to be an actress, it was not just an idle dream that had occurred to her. Oh, no, indeed. Margaret had made a discovery. Deep inside of her a voice had said, "Margaret, you are going to be an actress"—and Margaret believed it. She didn't even stop to ask herself when or why or where or how. She just believed it.

"And that belief was the most important thing that ever happened to me," she told me recently. "Without it I'd have been doomed to Dubuque all my life. Without it I'd have bloomed only as a wall flower, and a perennial one at that! Oh, I know so, because except for that one buoyant bit of knowledge, I had very little confidence in myself. I was terribly shy and sensitive. Why, I remember how I used to dread walking past a gang of boys on the corner . . . how I'd walk blocks to avoid them if I could . . . just because I was sure they were talking about me. I know now, of course, that they probably never even saw me. But in those days, I only knew that my knees sagged, my face was hot and my feet dragged along the sidewalk! It was horrible. There was only that one soothing salve, that oft-repeated promise that I made to myself: 'Never mind, Margaret. Wait till you're a movie star. You'll show them then!'

"After a while, as I grew older, it became so fixed in my mind that I forgot about feeling inferior. Not completely, but a little. At a dance, for example, I learned not to worry about whether my partner liked me or not. Instead, I tried to concentrate on what a thrill this would be for him someday! Someday he'd see me on the screen and tell his friends, 'Oh yes, Margaret's an old friend of mine. Why, I remember one evening when we were dancing. . . .'"

Margaret Lindsay in her latest Warner opus, "Law in Her Hands," with Glenda Farrell.

MARGARET threw back her head and laughed at the recollection.

"Isn't that just about the goofiest thing you've ever heard? A poor, silly, self-conscious seventeen-year-old girl selling herself an idea—to make herself feel important. But wait! You haven't heard the half of it! The funny thing is that that attitude suddenly began producing unlooked-for results! Believe it or not, it began producing dates! I don't know why unless that precious knowledge that I would be a movie actress someday made me sort of radiant—I guess—and well, sort of attractive!

"Anyway, and seriously, while I'm not advising cockiness as a cure for unpopularity, I do say, and believe, that to be popular a girl has to feel that she's going some place, and that big things are about to happen! You know why I believe that? Because I think that anticipation is the greatest thing in the world! Especially as a beauty aid! We're more beautiful when we're young, because we expect more . . . !

"But to go back—who got me off on this charm lecture anyway?—my self-consciousness and my feeling of inferiority were far from cured by a couple of beaux at seventeen. They were still with me (the inferiority feelings I mean), some time later when I went to New York to live and to go on the stage. The first year I merely studied. Annie Jean Bouton, a friend of mine from school, shared an apartment with me, and we went to Sargent together. Sargent's one of the best dramatic schools in New York—you have to be 'invited' to go back the second year! Well, Annie Jean and I were both invited, but I was restless and didn't want to go. I felt it was high time I fulfilled my destiny and became an actress. But it seemed I was the only one who thought so! I couldn't find a single casting director to agree with me! Some of them didn't even want to talk to me about it!

"I was getting pretty discouraged when I ran into a friend-of-the-family's who owned a stock company in England. (Maybe you've heard part of this story—but not the details.) He advised me to go to England, pick up an accent, and then return as, 'that accomplished young English actress, Miss Margaret Lindsay—for example.' He said I couldn't blame a producer for not wanting plain Margaret Kies of Iowa. But Margaret Lindsay, of London, well, that was different!

"I thought it was a swell idea, except for one thing. Could I do it? Could I get away with it? Did I have the nerve? Suppose somebody found me out and laughed at me? That, more than anything, was the thing I was afraid of. I decided to sit down and write my mother all about it.

"I'll never forget that letter. It was fifty pages long. I spent half the night writing it. I explained everything in the minutest detail. But I might just as well have saved myself the trouble. Mother never read it. She got as far as the first line: 'What do you think, darling, about my going to England?' And three hours later she was on the train headed for New York.

WELL, we conferred for days. And by this time I had made up my mind that I was going. But at first Mother couldn't see it at all. Oh, she didn't mind my going on the stage—she'd always expected it, I guess. And she didn't mind my contemplated impersonation either. What she did mind very much was my traveling to England all by myself!

"You see, until then, I'd always led a pretty sheltered life. I'd always had a chaperone, someone to protect me from life or whatever it was I was supposed to be protected from. But if I went to England alone, well, you can see Mother's point. The problem was in making her see mine!

"Mine was simply this. I was going to England to acquire an English accent, and I knew I'd never be able to do it if I had to have somebody with me to listen to and to laugh at me all the time! I'd be too self-conscious, feel too silly. I'd either have to go alone, or not go at all.

"Well, eventually I went alone—and, thank heavens! Otherwise, I never would have succeeded in turning myself into a Britisher. Even a best friend would have cramped my style. You see, I had to keep constantly on the move, from one town to another, from one group of strangers to another—so people wouldn't wonder at my ever-broadening 'a.' You don't pick up an accent all at once, you know! You do it by degrees. And each time I acquired a new degree I had to find somebody new to try it on—or else be found out, and laughed at!

"It was complicated in other ways, too. For example, what was I to say when people asked me what town I came from? And had I known so-and-so there? And what street had I lived on? You see, I had to prepare myself for that. As soon as I arrived in England, I settled on Harrigate as my home stamping grounds—chiefly because it was quite a distance from London. I ran up there and stayed several weeks, memorizing it . . . its streets, its shops, the names of its best citizens and the names of all their children. Then later, I carried all this information in a little notebook for reference. And, as most girls give themselves a last inventory in the mirror before going out, so I used to take a last look at my 'I am Margaret Lindsay—don't forget it!' book.

LATER—two years later—I wished very much that I could forget it. At that time I found myself in Hollywood, under contract to Universal, as my friend had prophesied, as 'that accomplished young English actress, Miss Margaret Lindsay'—and I was hating it. It was perfect torture. Much worse than passing those hometown boys on the corner when I was ten. Now, every time I passed a group of people, I was certain I'd be recognized as plain Peg Kies of Dubuque, Iowa—and then all of Hollywood would be calling me the faker I was. In fact, it almost happened twice. Once at the polo matches, when Doris Warner (yes, of the Warner Brothers), whom I'd known well at National Park Seminary, spied me and chased me for three minutes through the crowd, calling 'Peg! Oh Peg Kies!'—and again, at the Cocoanut Grove. That second incident at the Cocoanut Grove will always stand out in my mind, for, having lived through it, I knew that at last I had my quivering inner self pretty much under control. I had to do the most difficult thing I have ever done. I had to look an old friend right in the eyes, and pretend I didn't know her!

"I'll never forget it. I was with Bill Powell that night. And no sooner had we stepped inside the door than I saw her—another old friend from school. She saw me at the same instant. She smiled and called my name—but I looked right through her and moved on. Then, as soon as we reached our table I took out a long cigarette holder and began smoking, and I pulled the little veil on my hat down over my eyes—hoping to throw her off the scent. Peg Kies didn't smoke—at least not with a holder like that—and Peg Kies wouldn't be seen dead done up in a veil!

"But she was still suspicious, because pretty soon she came over and stood right by our table, and stared right at me—silently accusing me and calling me names. What did I do? There was only one thing I could do! I looked at her. Then I looked behind me—as though to see who in the devil she was looking at! Then I looked back at her. Then I looked at Bill and I shrugged, whispering, loud enough so she could hear me: 'The girl must be crazy!' At that she smiled and relaxed her vigil. 'I'm sorry,' she apologized. 'You aren't she, but I could have sworn. . . .' "

Margaret sighed in relief at the remembrance.

"It wasn't until almost a year later that I was able to relax my vigil," she went on. "But finally I was able to break down and confess everything. That was just before I signed my present contract, and just after I finished playing the part of the doomed young wife, in 'Cavalcade.' Fortunately—oh so fortunately!—Hollywood figured it was fun to be fooled and forgave me. My career carried on!

"But the most important thing was what that impersonation did for me, personally. It was a terrific strain, but it taught me poise. It was an experience I wouldn't trade for anything!"

Of course she wouldn't, because poise pays—and how! Today Maggie Lindsay is just about the most popular girl in Hollywood. And the rumor persists that she is secretly married to Pat de Cicco. A rumor Margaret refuses to verify. But, she spoofed Hollywood once before . . . so?

A Lady in Love

decree was granted. I was horrified. 'It should be twenty years,' I declared. 'It's terrible, remarrying after a thing like that happens to you. I never shall.' And I really meant it, too."

Of course, that vow was the bitter reaction of a disillusioned girl. But even people who had not taken those words of Helen's seriously were surprised by her recent marriage. For, if she remarried, they expected Helen to choose a man with money. Fred Perry is certainly not a man of wealth. His only income is what he earns. And his only earnings are gleaned from playing amateur tennis.

HER father was a wealthy man. Her first husband was a millionaire. All her life she had moved in elite circles, surrounded by luxury. Her coterie of friends in New York are wealthy socialites. In Hollywood, naturally, she found her friends among a similar class. All the time Fred Perry was in Hollywood, he and Helen never met. Their paths never crossed.

"If we both hadn't happened to sail on the Berengaria for England, probably we never would have met," Helen admits. "Call it chance if you want. I say it was a miracle!"

I saw Helen Vinson and Fred Perry the first time their eyes met. Helen had invited all the newspapermen who had interviewed her down to the Berengaria for a little champagne party before the boat sailed. Her stateroom was jammed. Photographers crowded the doorways, and curious on-lookers pushed in from the corridor. Helen had just spent a tedious hour on the windy deck, patiently posing for pictures. Then she had battled through a barrage of autograph hounds and eager spectators to reach her stateroom. Her hat was askew, her hair mussed by the wind. She was tired and a little frantic.

A tall young man sauntered down the corridor toward the stateroom. What was all the excitement about? A movie actress. Oh, well, he had seen lots of movie actresses. He glanced into the room. And through the milling mob, his eyes looked into Helen Vinson's.

Forty minutes later the cry, "All ashore who's goin' ashore," had cleared the ship of the mob; the big boat was moving quietly out into the harbor. And Helen Vinson and Fred Perry were beginning to get acquainted.

It wasn't the kind of first-meeting Helen Vinson would have planned with her future husband. I have heard her say, "If you want to be attractive to a man, don't ever see him unless you are looking your best. See him only under circumstances in which you can be agreeable and pleasant. For every man loves a smiling woman. A woman with laughter is as welcome as the sunshine and a man will always turn to look at her again."

Comfort—Safety—Peace of mind

CAN'T CHAFE

The sides of Kotex are cushioned in a special, soft, downy cotton to prevent chafing and irritation. Thus Wondersoft Kotex provides lasting comfort and freedom. But sides only are cushioned—the center surface is free to absorb.

CAN'T FAIL

Kotex has a special "Equalizer" center whose channels guide moisture evenly the whole length of the pad. Gives "body" but not bulk—prevents twisting and roping. The filler of Kotex is actually 5 TIMES more absorbent than cotton.

CAN'T SHOW

The rounded ends of Kotex are flattened and tapered to provide absolute invisibility. Even the sheerest dress, the closest-fitting gown, reveals no telltale lines or wrinkles.

THREE TYPES OF KOTEX

1. REGULAR—IN THE BLUE BOX—For the ordinary needs of most women.
2. JUNIOR—IN THE GREEN BOX—Somewhat narrower—when less protection is needed.
3. SUPER—IN THE BROWN BOX—Extra layers give extra protection, yet no longer or wider than Regular.

NO, Helen—wise and knowing—would have set a different stage if she had had a chance. A new gown, perhaps, flowers, a charming room. I suggested this and she laughed. "Well, I never expected to fall in love amid the chaos of a press party on shipboard," she admitted, "and I still believe that the girl who wants to attract a man should see him only when she can be gracious and charming and well-groomed. But as I said before—this is a miracle. Rules don't count. It's different!"

At the end of their five-day voyage, Fred and Helen were secretly engaged.

Even when her American friends heard definite rumors that love was in bloom in England, that when asked if he was going to marry Helen, Perry had answered, "I hope so"—even then, those who knew her here wouldn't believe it.

"Helen isn't the type to do anything that rash and sudden," they said. "She has never acted on an impulse. She is at an important juncture in her screen career. Hollywood wants her, and she can't afford to miss the boat. Helen is too wise, too sensible to leap into such a marriage now!"

However, less than five months later, at midnight on September 12th, 1935, they were married.

I doubt if there has ever been a woman more eager to make a success of her marriage. This whirlwind romance struck deep into the roots of Helen's heart, and it is very precious to her. She knows that in a marriage such as hers there are many pitfalls.

She frankly admits that it has worried her a little because she is two years older than Fred, even though two years is a small difference, and she looks definitely younger than her twenty-six-year-old husband.

She realizes that the kind of a man who battles his way to fame on the tennis courts must be determined, stubborn, a fighter-to-the-finish. She knows that spending years batting around the world from one tournament to another must make a man irresponsible in a way, restless, eager to be on the go.

She realizes all these things, and she is willing and anxious to spend time and energy, wisdom and patience, in adjusting the problems which must inevitably arise.

She knows, too, that the very nature of their careers means that they must be separated a great deal. Furthermore, they are both constantly in the limelight—he in the world of sports, she in the film firmament. Their names are news. And the bright glare of publicity has withered many a romance. For several years, Perry's name has been linked with that of one of the most beautiful stars in Hollywood. They are still good friends, and Helen wants that friendship to continue. Yet, it is certain to creep into columns as nasty gossip, slip, as rumors, into the news.

Can their romance stand the gaff? Helen is determined that it shall!

"One thing to remember," she says, "is that love is not the most important thing in life. Life is. Love is that part of life which makes you enjoy living more, makes you more honest, and braver, and unselfish. I have heard women actually use love as an excuse for pettiness. 'I can't help it,' they'll say, 'I love him.' They'll excuse jealousy, for example, with that phrase. How foolish they are! Jealousy is the most futile emotion in the world. Besides, I've seen many a jealous woman put ideas in her husband's head that never occurred to him. Accuse a husband of being overattentive to the red-head at the next table, and it may sound like a good idea to him. It's a foolish risk for a woman to take

"BUT," she added hastily, "I don't believe in a woman's being too noble. A spark of spunk now and then keeps you human. After all, you salt your food and put a touch of vinegar in the salad dressing, don't you? But I believe, too, that the smiling graciousness which helps a woman attract a man will help her to hold him."

Plans for the future? They're vastly different from the plans she had in the spring of 1935, when she was sailing for England to make two pictures for Gaumont-British. She was temporarily deserting Hollywood for English films because Hollywood continued to type her in "other woman" roles. The English studio offered her two sympathetic roles—one in "Transatlantic Tunnel," and stardom as the heroine of "King of the Damned." When these two films were finished, she would return to Hollywood, having proved she could play leads. It was a wise plan.

When those films were finished, Hollywood begged her to come back. But while the Hollywood offers dangled, Helen kept her fingers crossed, hoping for another Gaumont-British contract. Fred would be in England . . .

She was offered the lead, opposite Clive Brook, in "His Majesty's Pajamas." She snapped it up. Hollywood is out of luck, unless Fred returns to the coast.

Neither do her plans for the future include a mansion-house where wealthy friends may be lavishly entertained. She who has known great wealth and success now asks for the simplest things in life—the man she loves and a quiet place where they may spend some time together. She talks dreamily of a small farm in Connecticut, a little old house with deep fireplaces to hold fat logs, a garden, a bit of woodland. The only luxury she asks for is fine tennis courts on the grounds for Fred.

May her dreams come true!

In New York for the first time in years, Ann Sothern came to see the shows and the shops before starting her first picture for RKO. She stayed at Manhattan's very smart St. Moritz Hotel.

ming. He is interested in taxidermy and sketching, besides. Gary is 6 feet 2½ inches tall, weighs 175 pounds and has dark brown hair and blue eyes. Mrs. Cooper is the former Veronica Balfe, who appeared in pictures under the name of Sandra Shaw. His most recent picture is opposite Jean Arthur in "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town." Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Los Angeles, Cal., is his address.

ANNE D. PHILLIPS, Quincy, Mass.—Gordon Jones played the part of Butch in "Strike Me Pink." His latest picture is "Devil's Squadron." "Under Two Flags" with Ronald Colman, Victor McLaglen and Rosalind Russell will be Claudette Colbert's next picture.

JANET GAYNOR—Formerly Laura Gainer, Janet was born in Philadelphia, Pa., October 6, 1906. Six years later the Gainers moved to Chicago where she attended the Graeme Stewart grade school. The next leap was to San Francisco and the Polytechnic High School, after which young Janet worked in a shoe store, then as an usherette in a movie theatre. One of the few film players who have been successful without previous stage training, Janet made her first movie appearance as an extra in 1924. Work being scarce, she took a secretarial course, but the studio lure was too great and she returned to movieland, gradually getting better and better roles. Her first real leading role was in "The Johnstown Flood," and she helped make movie history with Charles Farrell in "Seventh Heaven." Much to everyone's distress, she and Charlie did not marry. Instead, he married Virginia Valli and Janet became Mrs. Lydell Peck. They were divorced, however, and now there doesn't seem to be any particular "Mr. Gaynor" in view. Miss Gaynor is 5 feet tall, weighs 100 pounds and has copper brown hair and brown eyes. She plays the piano and her favorite sports are golf and swimming. She is very fond of Chinese dishes, and yellow and blue are her favorite colors. "Small Town Girl" was her most recent picture, and she is tentatively scheduled to be in "Banjo on My Knee," for 20th Century-Fox Studios, where you may reach her at Box 900, Beverly Hills, Cal.

JO ANN KEMP, Baltimore, Md.—The part of Buzz, the gum-chewing radio operator in "Ceiling Zero," was taken by James Bush—and a nice bit of acting he turned in, too. Write him at Warner Brothers Studios, Burbank, Cal.

JOHN BOLES—Love is his middle name, and no kidding. The rest of it is authentic, too. The son of a banker and cotton broker, John was born in Greenville, Tex., October 27, 1900. Greenville schools and the University of Texas gave him the preparatory courses necessary to entering Johns Hopkins, where he intended to begin the study of medicine. The World War interrupted these plans, however, and Mr. Boles enlisted in the intelligence division of the army. In France he became a great favorite by singing at the A.E.F. entertainments, and on his return home decided to study voice. First, though, it was necessary for him to earn the wherewithal by working in a local bank, then by teaching French in a girls' academy in New York. Later he returned to France, this time to study, and came back to New York after 2 years determined to get a leading role or nothing. Nothing it was, until "Little Jesse James" came along. An instant success in this, John appeared in several other Broadway productions until Gloria Swanson offered him the lead in "The Loves of Sonya." After making several other silents, he began to get leads in such pictures as "Rio Rita" and "The Desert Song" in which he was very successful. John is 6 feet 1 inch tall, weighs 185 pounds and has brown hair and gray eyes. John likes all outdoor sports, especially hiking and tennis. Mrs. Boles is the former Marcellite Dobbs and they have two daughters, Marcellite and Joanna. 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box 900, Beverly Hills, Cal., is his address. "A Message to Garcia" is Mr. Boles' most recent production.

JANE KINGSLEY, New York, N. Y.—Yes, Nino Martini is going to make another picture. It will be the second of the Pickford-Lasky productions and is tentatively titled "The Gay Desperado." No supporting cast has been assigned as yet but you may be assured that he'll do plenty of singing.

GINGER ROGERS—If it hadn't been for the Charleston, we might never have known there was such a person as Virginia Katherine McMath, alias Ginger Rogers. Born in Independence, Mo., on July 6, 1911, she spent her girlhood in Fort Worth, Tex., where she attended school. There at the age of 15 she won the state Charleston championship, which resulted in her being signed to a vaudeville contract. Coming to New York, Ginger joined a stock company and then took part in a musical revue, "Top Speed." Forty-five weeks in the New York company of "Girl Crazy" won her a chance in Hollywood. Her first picture, "The Tip Off," followed this in 1931. Ginger is 5 feet 4 inches tall, weighs 110 pounds, has gold-red hair and blue eyes. Her hobby is dancing, she plays a fair game of tennis and is fond of riding, swimming and golf. Edward Jackson Culpepper was her first husband, when she was very young, and she has been happily married to Lew Ayres since November 14, 1934. She and Fred Astaire will be teamed again in "Never Gonna Dance." Write her at RKO-Radio Studios, 780 Gower St., Hollywood, Cal.

ROMOLA BILLINGS, Passaic, N. J.—No, Leslie Howard's children have never actually appeared in pictures to date. However, his son, Ronald, will be seen as a page boy in "Romeo and Juliet." Mr. Howard's daughter, Leslie Jr., has appeared over the ether waves with him, and in so doing gave every evidence that she inherits some of her father's versatile ability.

HERE'S one—remember the old days. This might not be much of a cure if the actor happens to have been born with a silver spoon in his mouth. I wasn't. And I remember days when I didn't have enough to eat. I remember days when I wasn't sure where I'd sleep at night. Days and nights in Putnam, New Jersey, where, after I was expelled from high school for smashing up some school furniture, I got odd jobs to do, and sang in church on Sundays. Days in Camden, when I worked for the Victor Talking Machine Company as shipping clerk for four years and tried to take singing lessons and spent money I should have used for board and lodging on shows in New York. Days when I purchased a service station in Haddenfield, Pa., and tried to operate it while I took more singing lessons. The venture failed, of course, and I hiked to Philadelphia and got a job as a newspaper advertising salesman. Then I got a break with the La Scala Opera Company, making infrequent appearances and singing, even more infrequently, over the radio.

"No one seemed very much aware that I was alive in those days. I haven't forgotten that feeling. I haven't forgotten the pangs of hunger or how it feels to be thinly clad and cold. The man I was then I still am. That fellow is forever with me, plucking at my sleeve, laughing in my ear. He's me, too. You're not in much danger from the enemy when such a starved, unimportant little 'I' is with you.

"A normal childhood is a very good antidote for an 'I' attack. Mine was perfectly normal. I was born in Ocean City, N. J. I went to public school. My folks were in very moderate circumstances. I sold newspapers. I ran errands. I wore some hand-me-downs. I played hooky occasionally. I scrubbed the backs of my ears and put on my 'good suit' and went to Sunday school. There was absolutely nothing to distinguish me from Tom or Joe or Harry. I was just one of the gang.

"A girl I used to know back in those days said to me recently, 'I nearly died when I read about your being an actor. You were a nice looking, decent enough kid, Pres, always very polite when you had to be and always with a broad grin all over your face. You sure were one of the very last boys in town I ever thought would go into the movies.'

"Ocean City is, of course, on the ocean. And the ocean is the greatest antidote I know against the personal puny conceit of man. The sea plays no favorites. President and ploughboy are one and the same to the sea. It wipes out prince or pauper with magnificent impartiality. And I've always spent a lot of time on the water. Now, between pictures, or late Saturday afternoons, any time I can get away, I run down to Balboa where I keep my boat. There are no actors down there on the water front, just a crowd of business men and fellows who like boats. We never talk about pictures or Hollywood. Some of them don't even know that I'm in pictures, so far as I know. If they do, they don't figure it's important enough to talk about. And they certainly don't get it from me. We talk boats and weather and fishing and tides and tackle. We talk politics and swap stories and I forget that my name has ever appeared in electrics. I'm back in Ocean City, N. J., again—one of the gang.

"A happy marriage," said Preston, his very dark blue eyes amused, "is another and a most effective prescription for curing any signs of head-swelling.

"I have," grinned Preston, "a very usual marriage—the boy-marries-girlhood-sweetheart brand. I popped the question a short time after I'd begun singing with the La Scala Opera Company in Philadelphia. I began in the chorus. Then I was given some leading parts, singing with some of the stars whose vocal records I'd packed while I was a shipping clerk with the talking machine company. I began to think I'd better do things about improving my voice, considering that the Metropolitan Opera Company was my modest goal. So I entrained for New York for further vocal instruction.

ON the way I thought it was high time to bring a climax to a childhood romance. She was Gertrude Warren, who lived in Woodbury, N. J. We'd gone together since our high school days, to movies, picnics and on long walks in the woods. She was, always has been, and still is the only girl for me. We were married at The Little Church Around the Corner in New York. We set up housekeeping—very light housekeeping for a time. Singing engagements didn't drop in my lap. I finally got a part in a play, 'The Silent House,' and played a deaf and dumb man whose entire role was in pantomime! That sort of deflated whatever little sprouts my ego might have put out, too. Me, candidate for the Met, deaf and dumb!

"Then luck, the main ingredient in any actor's success, began to leaven the lean loaf. I had a part in 'Two Seconds' in New York. Mervyn LeRoy saw the play. He must have liked me because he recommended me for a picture contract at Warner Brothers and I was on my way to Hollywood.

"I played the lead in the screen version of 'Two Seconds' and for the fourteen months I was on that lot appeared in 'Dr. X,' 'I'm a Fugitive From a Chain Gang,' 'Alibi Ike,' and 'You Said a Mouthful.' I was loaned to Tiffany and made 'The Last Mile' which I hoped would bring me stardom. It didn't. But I did get some recognition from Fox Films and got a break there. Spencer Tracy was to make 'The Man Who Dared.' But he couldn't do it and I got the part. It was the sort of thing I'd been praying for. The picture was swell and it got good reviews but I was still more than the last mile away from stardom. I was turned over to Paramount. I went back to Warners. And then I was shunted into some 'quickies.' I cooled my heels and felt down at the mouth. I arranged for a cancellation of my Warner Brothers contract. M-G-M offered me a contract. I accepted. Cooled my heels some more. I made one picture in five months. I'd about decided to chuck it all and go back to New York and the stage when RKO decided that they wanted me. I told them I wanted work and that unless I could be kept busy I'd go right on with my packing. If I'd known how busy they'd keep me, I might not have been such a fiend for punishment! I signed my contract January, 1935, and since then I've appeared in six major films, with scarcely time off between films to lift anchor on my power cruiser—'Strangers All,' with May Robson, 'The Last Days of Pompeii,' 'The Informer,' 'The Arizonian,' 'Annie Oakley,' 'Muss 'Em Up.' I've hit top billing and I'm on my way . . .

"But to get back to my marriage: Gertrude takes my job as any wife takes any man's job. She never gets excited about it. She isn't especially curious about it. She never comes to the studio. And she's paid me two compliments on my work since we've been in Hollywood. Once after the preview of 'The Last Mile' she said, 'I really forgot it was you I was watching, Pres, the performance carried me away,' and the other time after seeing 'The Last Days of Pompeii,' she exclaimed, with a catch in her voice, 'You were grand . . .' Otherwise she makes no comment other than to remark that I was good enough in this or that picture to have rated a better part. That's all.

"I'm pretty darned sure," said this big, genial man slowly, "that Hollywood's Public Enemy won't find a chink in my defenses. . . ."

Reviews

He has a mania for fishing all the year 'round. Studios have learned that if they want him in a picture they'd better notify him at least a week ahead of time. It's easier than to track him down at the streams in the wilds.

★★★ Sutter's Gold

(Universal)

Californians will love this pictorial history of its most colorful character, John Sutter, and natives of other states will find the tale engrossing, too. It deals, of course, with the Swiss, Johan Souter, who was forced to flee his country and who came to California with dreams for the future. Forcefully depicted are the struggles which he goes through to attain his ever-increasing ambitions, and his final ironic downfall with the discovery of gold on his land. Edward Arnold gives a masterly characterization of John Sutter, a man with a peculiar make-up of ruthlessness, kind-heartedness, generosity and greed. Lee Tracy, as Pete Perkins who stuck to Sutter through good and bad, is not so happily cast. No amount of snowy whiskers can disguise this wise-cracking youth, while Arnold seems to grow naturally grayer with every reel. Binnie Barnes is seductively lovely as the Russian countess who falls for Sutter, but with method in her madness. The cast as a whole is well selected and adequate in performance. The picture is interesting from an historical standpoint, which has been carefully worked out in every detail, with excellent photography.

Several acres in the San Fernando Valley were used for the principle set of this picture—the famed Sutter's fort of 1845 and 1849. An exact replica was made of Sutter's Mill, perhaps the most famous structure in the history of the West. A heavy wall of adobe surrounded the four-acre compound, and the parapet supported several cannons, gathered from museums, which had seen actual service at the fort. Inside the enclosure were stables, blacksmith shops, wells, barbecue pits, etc. Prop men were kept busy building and collecting the rudely fashioned carts, enormous wine casks, huge hand-looms on which the Indians wove rugs, antique furniture and military trappings. The costume department had some research of its own, too, what with garbing the most varied cast ever collected for one picture, including South Sea Islanders, Hawaiians, Maoris, Samoans, Tahitians, Russians, Italians, Span-

★ Things to Come
(London Films)

You're in for a pretty grim time if you go to see this English opus. It's an adaptation of H. G. Well's prophetic book on what we can expect to have happen to the world beginning (and so son!) in 1940! Little boys, scientifically minded, will get a huge kick out of the truly amazing inventions—and so will you, if you aren't too depressed. The story concerns Raymond Massey, a young aviation engineer in 1940. He manages to survive the wars that last from 1940 until 1966, and, when civilization has been practically wiped out, he, with a band of surviving scientists, start to rebuild the world. What goes on until 2036, when you see Mr. M. again as his great grandson—and still carrying the scientific torch—is most amazing. The cast, all English, does the best it can. You feel Mr. Wells should try to be a little less imaginative.

★★★ Robin Hood of El Dorado (M-G-M)

If you like action in your movies, here is a rousing, old-fashioned western in costume, full of all the shooting and the shouting that go to make up exciting screenfare. Its star is Warner Baxter, in a sombrero and his "Cisco Kid" accent. Background is California in the gold rush days, when Mexican settlers were being pushed off their own property by Americans with a lust for gold. Baxter, as Joaquin Murietta, is a peaceful peasant until his home is ravaged by raiding '49ers. Seeking vengeance, he becomes an outlaw and declares a personal war on all "gringoes." Teaming up with a killer named Three-Fingered Jack (J. Carroll Naish) he terrorizes the countryside until a thrilling gun battle puts an end to it all. The picture is full of scenic beauty and is charged with excitement and fast gun play. Next to Baxter for acting honors is J. Carroll Naish with his excellent portrayal of a murderous renegade. Others in the cast are Bruce Cabot, Margo, Eric Linden and Ann Loring.

"A good time was had by all" on this picture. Most of it was taken on location around Lake Tahoe and in the San Fernando valley. Wherever there's gun-play in a film you can be sure the cast had an even better time off-screen than on. Principals, extras, cameramen and prop boys enlisted in the target tournament which sprung up the first day on location. Bruce Cabot was the winner and among the ladies—for of course they had to get in on it—the best shot was Margo . . . Ann Loring came to the screen via M-G-M's "travelling studio." A co-ed from Brooklyn College, New York, she was studying to be a journalist when the travelling studio came to town. Ann took the test purely for the fun of it, hoping that there would be a story in it for the school paper. She won first place over 25,000 applicants, and a try-out contract at the studio. She celebrated this, her first role, by marrying Louis Schor, an attorney. In her spare time, Ann studies theology and numerology . . .

★★ Snowed Under
(Warners)

The problems of a playwright are contemplated here with considerable mirth, due to the presence in the cast of such experienced handlers of comedy as Glenda Farrell, Genevieve Tobin and Frank McHugh. The whole situation revolves about George Brent, who sits in a Connecticut hideout trying to finish a play which a Broadway producer already has in rehearsal. His first wife, Miss Tobin, arrives to lend a helping hand, and things run smoothly until the appearance of Patricia Ellis, a gal from a nearby college who feels that she's in love with George. More additions to the household arrive when a deputy sheriff (Frank McHugh) and a lawyer for Glenda Farrell, Mr. Brent's second wife, drop in to slap Mr. B. in jail for failure to keep neck and neck with his alimony payments. Then, just to make things merrier, Miss Farrell arrives in person. Add to this a gallon of Mr. McHugh's finest applejack, and you have a real situation. In the middle of all the bickering Brent quietly slips out, spends the night with his housekeeper and her husband and finishes his play. The play brings cash, George reweds Genevieve, Glenda collects her alimony and Pat Ellis falls in love with the young attorney.

George Brent established a precedent with this film—claims he'll never work again without three leading ladies. He was kept pretty busy what with Glenda Farrell, Pat Ellis, Genevieve Tobin and the problem of moving from his Toluca Lake home to a new one in the Hollywood hills. Mr. Brent is its sole decorator and is carrying out the color scheme principally in a lapis blue—said by those in the know to be Garbo's pet color. It seems also that Mr. Brent is the only one to have received letters from la Swede on her recent visit to the fatherland . . . Genevieve Tobin became so interested in camera work while on this picture that it was practically impossible to get her off the set. . . . The four stars in this picture have all had the same stand-ins for over five years. Carter Gibson is George Brent's secretary, besides doubling for him on the screen. Ann Sparling is la Tobin's stand-in, and off-screen is an amateur artist. Frances Waverley is not only Glenda Farrell's stand-in but her closest friend, while Dale Jensen and Pat Ellis are practically inseparable at the studio or away from it. According to the scenery, overcoats, earmuffs and galoshes were the correct costume, but actually the temperature for that corn-flake snowfall was around 80 degrees. Arthur Todd, cameraman par excellence, undertook to instruct Miss T. in the mysteries of the camera, so she can add photography to her line of accomplishments.

★ Give Us This Night
(Paramount)

Good music is all very well in its place, but in a poorly presented moving picture it is apt to sound canned and insincere. Which is the fate of the excellent singing of Gladys Swarthout and Jan Kiepura in "Give Us This Night." The story is weak enough at best, having to do with an Italian fisherman (Jan Kiepura) who is "discovered" by the star of an opera company (Gladys Swarthout). That Miss Swarthout could make him a singer is believable enough, but that she should fall in love with Jan brands the whole thing as just another movie. Mr. Kiepura's voice is splendid, but he seems to be under a constant strain when in front of the camera, while Miss Swarthout not only suffers from self-consciousness but also from the director's decision to play up the male lead at her expense. Alan Mowbray does the only really competent acting in the picture, as the would-be opera singer. Philip Merivale makes his camera debut in too small a role for accurate judgment, but what he did do was unconvincing. Gladys Swarthout is as pleasing to look at as to hear, but given another picture of this calibre and movie audiences won't care about her at all. The photography is good and the music grand, so you may get your money's worth.

"Set builders' paradise" was how they referred to this picture. Seldom has a motion-picture taken up as much space for sets or required as much work as this one. A crew of two hundred carpenters and artisans worked 24 hours a day to keep ahead of Director Alexander Hall's shooting schedule, and the studios of two separate movie companies as well as an outdoor location were used. Eight different sound stages were used at Paramount, while the permanent opera house set at Columbia studios was borrowed for the occasion, too. Approximately 60 sets were used in all. The Italian fishing village church was built under the supervision of Catholic priests and is accurate in every detail . . . Jan Kiepura would be happy in Hollywood if he could get some barszcz, or zrazy z kasza. The former is beet soup in Polish and the latter mystery turns out to be goulash. Ogorki kwaszone is Jan's favorite dish—just pickled cucumbers to you. Kiepura was born in Poland, and graduated as a lawyer from Warsaw University, working his way through school by singing in movie theatres. Instead of hanging out a shingle, he accepted a minor role with the Warsaw Opera Company and at 22 found himself a

★★ The Farmer in the Dell

(RKO-Radio)

The farmer you see in the title is Fred Stone, and the dell is really no dell at all—it's Hollywood. For this is a story of an Iowa farm family which auctions off its cattle and its chattel and moves to the cinema city. Settling in Hollywood isn't Fred's idea, for he had planned on Long Beach, where all good Iowans go. But mama (Esther Dale) wants to get daughter (Jean Parker) into the movies, so Hollywood becomes their new home. However, when Fred takes daughter Jean to a studio, the movie people pass her up and hire him, much to everyone's surprise. Mama immediately goes Hollywood in fine style, with a swimming pool and a crowd of free-liquor guzzlers and all the trimmings. Everything ends well, though, with mama deciding the simple life is best, and daughter marrying Frank Albertson, an honest young citizen of Des Moines. The picture has its dull spots, but most audiences will like Fred Stone's homely touches, which are sometimes reminiscent of Will Rogers.

You'll see the only trained canary on the screen in this picture. $150 a week is the salary pulled down by "Dicky," owned and operated by Curley Twiford. He started training the bird before it had feathers, and it will now take a bath, come when called, go back to its cage and shut the door, and sing on command. The last talent was the hardest one to teach his protegé, so Curley affirms . . . "Fearless Freddy Stone" comes from Kansas. The name comes from his famous acrobatic act, copied from a travelling tight-rope walker who visited his home town, Wellington. The Stone boy was so impressed by the daring feats that he practiced every day for a year on a wire strung across the barn, then borrowed a pair of his mother's silk stockings and applied for a job with a neighboring circus. The act was so successful that he earned six dollars a week for the next year. Then with his brother, Ed, Fred started out to see the U. S. A. This act continued until Ed injured his leg, then followed the days of the famous Dave Montgomery-Fred Stone team, which played command performances before kings, queens and such. After that airplane crack-up a few years ago it looked like Fred was through to everyone but Fred. And now he's starting a brand new career in celluloid . . . Moroni Olsen is six feet three, Norwegian descent. Born in Ogden, Utah and it was naturally supposed that he would be either a prize-fighter or dance-bouncer. But Moroni took to teaching elocution at seventeen, then travelled with Chautauquas, and finally landed on Broadway with the Theatre Guild.

★★ Petticoat Fever

(M-G-M)

You'd hardly expect to find Robert Montgomery keeping a lonely vigil in a cabin up in the frigid wastes of Labrador, but there he is. He, it seems, is a radio operator—that's his station and he's stuck with it. Trust a Montgomery not to be lonely for long, though, for out of the sky comes Myrna Loy, her plane forced down, fortunately, in the immediate vicinity of his cabin. There is a slight complication in that she is accompanied by Reginald Owen, who happens to be her fiancé. What follows is typical Montgomery drawing-room comedy. The rustic setting is novel, and some of the situations are amusing, but one knows from the beginning that poor Reginald hasn't a chance against the nonchalance and charm of the dashing radio man. Reginald thinks Bob is merely suffering from "petticoat fever" due to his long hermitage, but Bob and Myrna and you and I all know that it's love. All in all, it's a pleasant little comedy competently played by the three principals and by an Eskimo gentleman named Otto Yamaoka.

Two extra firemen were on duty on the set every minute this picture was being filmed. They were there to see that the snow didn't catch fire. Hollywood snow is made of uncooked cornflakes and ground goose-feathers—a very combustible combination. Mike O'Hara is the man whose vocation is putting foot-prints in snow. This is done by means of a plaster cast of a foot, which is ground down into the corn-flakes and goose-feathers making a perfectly good foot-print in the snow. Though there were no fires on the set, there were plenty of colds. Dust from the "snow" is hard on the nose and throat. . . Visitors to the set annoyed the stars by spending most of their time lost in admiration for an extra. Pete is the name, and Pete is the polar bear who hails from the California Zoological Gardens. He's a contract player, being signed on the dotted line to the studio at twenty-five dollars a week, work or play. If other studios want him in a picture, they must pay Metro a good fat sum for the privilege . . . Otto Yamaoka is an old-timer in the fillums, having been one of the principal players in "Eskimo." But his sister Iris made her camera debut in this one. They're both from coldest Alaska and in no hurry to get back . . . Robert Montgomery, Jr., celebrated his first month's birthday by having his first picture taken—and a moving one at that. Papa won't let the studio get a look at it. Says one Montgomery in the movies is bad enough. The Montgomery menage now consists of Elizabeth, aged four, a half-dozen scottie terriers, seven cats—all black—and Mr. and Mrs. M., besides Jr.

★ Silly Billies (RKO-Radio)

The less said about this latest Wheeler-Woolsey epic the better. But one thing that should be said is that it is far, far worse than any of the preceding ones. This time we have the Messrs. W. and W. out in the wild and wooly West, in the era when the Indians and buffaloes ran wild. Our two heroes set out for the West, too. They are painless dentists and convinced that even though the settlers may not have long to live, they should die with their teeth filled. En route they meet Miss Dorothy Lee, of course, who is a schoolmarm going West to teach the natives a thing or two. Unreeled from then on is a series of harrowing events—Indian raids, tooth-pullings, death-defying escapades, etc. Mr. Woolsey takes his cigar out of his mouth long enough to make some perfectly turrible wisecracks, while Mr. Wheeler hasn't much to say, either. You will like Bert's exposition of horsemanship, though, when he flees across the plains in pursuit of aid for the pioneers. But even if you're a Wheeler-Woolsey addict this will be hard to take in any man's town.

Preview Postscript

According to box-offices, than which there's nothing more infallible, the Wheeler-Woolsey combine is tops in movie comic teams. The Marx Bros. have threatened plenty, but to date haven't outdone them . . . It takes five to six hundred cigars to get Woolsey through a picture. He estimates that's about 75 pounds of tobacco per pic. Off-screen, Bob wouldn't touch one of them . . . Born in Ohio of poor parents, Bob drifted down into Kentucky looking for a job. Landed one finally as a jockey and was going good when a broken leg stopped any ambitions in that direction. Drifted into cheap vaudeville and played every tank town in the States before he finally landed a job on Broadway. "Rio Rita" and the first teaming with Bert Wheeler brought him to sudden fame and Hollywood . . . Wheeler also started earning his living at a tender age. Newsboy, bootblack, street singer and fruit-swiper were among his earlier leanings. Now he's Hollywood's amateur golf champ and has every mantel in his hillside home laden with trophies . . . Dorothy Lee, 23-year-old native Californian and daughter of a Los Angeles attorney, has just married for the fourth time. It's a verra wealthy Chicago broker this time. She's been in all but one of the Wheeler - Woolsey fillums — making eighteen in all.

★★★ Little Miss Nobody

Little Miss Withers can chalk up another score for her portrayal of Miss Nobody, orphan of the storms. The opportunity to display all her histrionic gifts is provided Jane in this story, which has an orphanage locale. She starts right out by battling the marketman in the first reel. He's really an awful meanie but that doesn't keep our heroine out of children's court. Then through another good intention gone wrong Jane finds herself en route to the reform school. She runs away from it all and finds refuge with an ex-convict, but Jane can't stay clear of the law. She doesn't waste much time before getting mixed up in a crime that's a humdinger. There never was a child who could get into so many difficulties with such amazing dexterity. But the irresistibility and warm-heartedness of a Jane Withers can be convincing enough to overshadow the weak spots of any story. All the children in the picture give good performances, particularly Betty Jane Hainey and Jackie Morrow. The adults take a back seat, but Jane Darwell and Sara Haden, as the orphanage matrons and Ralph Morgan, who plays the role of Jane's long-lost father, give competent performances. It's a Jane Withers picture from first laugh to last.

Preview Postscript

Directing one child is a task which most directors alibi themselves out of, but Director John Blystone took on 25 of them. Not without a qualm, however. He laid his plans carefully, first becoming "Uncle Jack" to all the youngsters and letting them know that they could play and enjoy themselves every minute that the camera wasn't in action. Then he arranged a shooting schedule which would permit filming of scenes in sequence, with which he credits the authentic performance of the children. For technical reasons, most pictures are begun with the finishing scene and on the last day of shooting the introductory scenes are completed. His only error was in moving up the turkey dinner scene to one morning. He figured the children had just finished breakfast and wouldn't consume the turkey in the first "take" of the scene. He underestimated their talents. The dinner disappeared in a flash. For the next "take" the astute Mr. Blystone stationed a studio doctor in a prominent position on the set with a large bottle plainly labelled 'Castor Oil.' . . . Donald Haines, 15-year-old film bad boy, is a vet of over a hundred and fifty pictures. He made his debut at the receiving end of a series of mud pies, in a silent picture starring Jack Dempsey. Since then he's become known as "Hollywood's Human Target" and for the next few years appeared in "Our Gang" comedies liberally messed up with everything from pies to pork chops. Donald really enjoyed having Jane Withers empty that bucket of water on him, since he generally has to do that for himself at the end of every scene in order to remove the last vestiges of ice-cream cones, etc., which have been splattered over him.

★★ Everybody's Old Man
(20th Century-Fox)

Writer Cobb's histrionic career should be a cinch after this picture. Actor Cobb may never startle his audience, but he's sure to satisfy. He has all those solid, genial qualities that we like to think typical of "Everybody's Old Man." In this tale, Mr. C. portrays a retired meat packer. He has nothing against the world except that it harbors a rival packing plant. Then he meets the inheritors of the rival business, Rochelle Hudson and Johnny Downs, and learns that the present operator of the concern is taking them for a short and snappy ride to the poorhouse. Alan Dinehart is the gent and you know what a meanie he can be. The astute Cobb comes to the rescue and incidentally shows his nephew, Norman Foster, a thing or two about the business. Norman has an eye for business—and Rochelle Hudson—from that time on.

Preview Postscript

Irvin S. Cobb was bitten by the cinema bug a few years ago when he consented, against his better judgment, to appear in a series of shorts. He made more money from stories extolling his experiences in gay Hollywood than he made from the studios, however. Then his pal, Will Rogers, convinced Cobb that he should hang around the "Steamboat Round the Bend" set and help pass the time by swapping yarns. Before he knew it, Cobb was playing the rival steamboat captain in the picture as well. Always an ardent movie fan, he's developed now into Hollywood's most ardent movie actor. Though he claims he's no hot shot at emoting, Mr. C. doesn't miss a chance to improve his technique by looking in on as many sets as can possibly be squeezed into a day. A native of Kentucky, Cobb went into newspaper work at an early age. He covered the World War for New York papers and the Saturday Evening Post . . . Johnny Downs has just returned to a screen career after appearing on Broadway and various tanktowns throughout these United States. But that doesn't make him so old, except in experience, for Johnny was the first hero of "Our Gang" comedies back in the 1920's. He hankers now to do deep, dark and dramatic roles.

★ Moonlight Murder (M-G-M)

One thing this murder mystery can never be accused of is simplicity. There's not a clue in a carload. No matter what your sleuthings, you're guaranteed to be wrong. For the killing is a brand new type of thing—a mercy slaying. What might be unsatisfactory as a trick story, is made believable by an excellent cast. Chester Morris and Madge Evans supply the love interest, with Chester handing in a good performance as an astute detective besides. Leo Carrillo is the singer struck mysteriously dead in front of the mike while warbling to thousands in Hollywood Bowl. The plot thickens with a bang right there for never was there an opera singer whom so many would like to see done wrong. Among the suspects are J. Carroll Naish, a composer whom Carrillo has snubbed, Katherine Alexander and Benita Hume, warblers who have it in for Carrillo, Duncan Renaldo and Leonard Ceeley, rival tenors, and several others including an evil-eyed Hindu swami who has predicted Mr. Carrillo's demise. Frank McHugh and Grant Mitchell come in for their share of suspicion.

Preview Postscript

A close friend of Leo Carrillo was Will Rogers. He lives on a ranch adjoining the Rogers' estate in Santa Monica, and the pair often met for a morning ride together. For Carrillo's convenience, Will always kept a key to the gate of his ranch on a certain fence post. The other day, Leo decided to take a ride through the trail which they used to enjoy so much. Letting himself through the gate, he rode a short distance before hearing the thud of horse's hoofs behind him. It was Will's horse, "Soap Suds" come to welcome them as he always did and escort them up the trail . . . One of the loveliest sets ever built on a studio lot, for scenic beauty, was the one of the Hollywood Bowl. The huge amphitheatre was faithfully reproduced on the largest outdoor set which the studio could provide. Trees, plants, flowers and grass were transplanted, and the orchestra played from behind a screen of trees just as they do in the famous Bowl. H. B. Warner spent many a harrowing hour learning to conduct an orchestra for the occasion. He hates figures but said he'd rather study public accounting than music any day . . . This is Duncan Renaldo's first appearance on the screen in years. In the meantime he's been busy appearing in the press and the Federal Prison. Duncan was sent to the latter spot by U. S. sleuths who claimed he was in this country illegally and was really a Roumanian citizen. The Roumanian government said Renaldo was no such thing. While Renaldo claimed that his father, who should know, had told him he was born on good old U. S. terra firma. A presidential pardon was finally obtained, and Roumanian or American, Metro has a good actor back in the fold.

Why Hollywood FEARS the second day

IT'S no secret out in Hollywood that more than one famous star has lost her job because of constipation.

Movie directors simply can't stand for lack of pep, dull eyes, pimples, sick headaches caused by constipation.

That's why you should follow Hollywood's example and not let a second day pass without coming to nature's aid with a beauty laxative.

Olive Tablets are popular in Los Angeles, and everywhere else, because they are dependable, mild and non-habit-forming. And because they gently help Nature restore normal action in the intestines.

playboy, Warren William. Mr. William doesn't have a chance to do much besides run around in shorts waving a cane. Gene Lockhart again proves himself a capable comedian, with Mrs. Lockhart a perfect team-mate. Their marital battlings ring with a sincerity that is almost uncomfortable at times. June Travis is engaging as the night-club singer over whom the controversy rages, since Mr. Lockhart refuses to be best man at her wedding to Warren William, having decided that she is nothing but a gold-digger. Furthermore, he is convinced that June's mama, papa and brother are nothing but four-flushers. The fact that they all have hearts of gold, really, weakens the story considerably. And the long-drawn-out discussions before action finally takes place is wearying in spots. However, there are plenty of good laughs, and if you haven't met the Lockharts you'll welcome this opportunity.

Everyone has an hour, sometime in his life, when it would be impossible to account for every move made should he be placed under suspicion. If you don't believe this, just see what happens to Franchot Tone in this exciting story and you'll be convinced! Franchot, a brilliant English lawyer, hopes to become the Attorney General, but unwittingly he becomes in-

FAT VANISHES
17 lbs. in 4 weeks by SAFE FOOD METHOD NO DRUGS

Just Like Eating Candy!

● Get rid of fat in a hurry! And here's the best part of it ...you can now reduce with absolute SAFETY...no dinitrophenol...no thyroid... NO DRUGS whatsoever! Not laxative. Miss Anna Goodrow, 13 Highland Pk., Thompsonville, Conn., writes: "I reduced 17 lbs. in 4 weeks with SLENDRETS. My flesh is firm and solid. I cannot recommend them too highly!" Miss Nolan (Calif.) writes: "Lost 41 lbs.! I look and feel like a different person." A N. Y. lady writes: "36 lbs. of fat gone! I never felt better!" SLENDRETS remove fat by a new principle which converts fat and food into energy. You feel better, look years younger. Absolutely SAFE ...even if a child should eat them by mistake it would not be harmed, because SLENDRETS only change fat into vitality. Delicious too . . . they taste just like candy.

REDUCE QUICKLY...OR NO COST!

If you are not entirely satisfied with the wonderful results from the very first package of SLENDRETS, you get your money back in full. You can't lose one cent.

ACT ON THIS OFFER TODAY!

Don't give fat another day's start, but be sure you reduce the safe SLENDRETS Food Method Way. Don't use drugs! volved in a mysterious scandal which threatens to ruin him. Loretta Young is his loyal wife and Roland Young is his closest friend. It's an absorbing picture, well acted, even to the smaller roles contributed by Lewis Stone, Aileen Pringle, Dudley Digges and E. E. Clive.

★★ O'Malley of the Mounted
(20th Century-Fox)

As O'Malley of the Mounted, George O'Brien has his best role to date. The William S. Hart westerner gives Mr. O'B. plenty of opportunity to display both brain and brawn to good advantage. This time George doesn't confine himself to wrestling with one or two toughies, but takes on a whole band of desperadoes. Needless to say he licks them within an inch of their worthless lives, thereby winning the undying devotion of Irene Ware, whose brother is mixed up with their dirty doings. Irene Ware adds considerably to the scenery of the wide open cinema spaces, while James Bush is convincing as the young brother for whose safety she risks her life. You'll get some genuine guffaws from Victor Potel's characterization of the camp cook and a few honest-to-goodness chills when Stanley Fields goes into his sneers and leers.

★ Murder by an Aristocrat
(Warners)

The only mystery about this would-be chiller is why it was released. Even the competent cast doesn't prove alibi enough. Their gallant screaming and sleuthing are to no avail with such a feeble tale on which to work. The most blood-curdling aspects of three murders only brought gales of giggles from the audience. A weird storm, with all the lightning and thunder props at Warner's studio going full blast added another note of hilarity. Marguerite Churchill, as a female Holmes, makes the most of a bad assignment. She is the nurse employed in the family of the aristocratic Thatchers, a happy family group of hypochondriacs and dope addicts. Claire Dodd is the wife of one of the Thatcher boys, Gordon Elliot, who prowls around loaded with ammunition and morphine, finally taking an overdose of both. William Davidson and Joseph Crehan enact the supposedly subtle crooks and Lyle Talbot is the medico who's kept busy inspecting the corpses.

(20th Century-Fox)

Mr. Oland generally gets around a bit with jumps to Paris, Shanghai and points every which way. But he's staying at home with the family this time. And you won't want to miss the family—they all have the Chan charm. We counted eleven of them before giving up, from the eldest son, Keye Luke, to the youngest Tai Wo Kung. Charlie takes them all for a pleasant evening under the Big Top, but unpleasant events soon begin popping up as they always do around Mr. Chan. This time it's the gruesome murder of the circus manager. There are plenty of suspects this time, too, for it develops that said unfortunate was cordially loathed by almost everyone in the circus, including the hairy apes and elephants. It's all so baffling that you'll suspect everyone in the crowd, including Tai Wo Kung. Warner Oland, as always, gives a flawless performance, and is ably supported by Keye Luke and the circus folks, notably George and Olive Brasno, the midgets.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE—WITHOUT CALOMEL

And You'll Jump out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

THE liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile onto the food you swallow every day. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

A mere movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c at all drug stores. © 1935 C. M. CO.

They Love to Save

mind, so that she might know the whereabouts of her dearest treasure.

Finally, at two o'clock in the morning, Voight, hearing of the search for him, 'phoned Miss Shearer at her hotel. He had carried her precious keepsake, $10,000 worth of diamonds and platinum, all evening in his side pocket, without being conscious of it. The actress was so relieved to recover her prize that she placed it in her safety deposit box immediately she returned to California, and there it has remained.

Binnie Barnes, too, cherishes most highly a set of amethysts her husband gave her and which, because of the sentimental value attached to them, she keeps in her vault.

When Binnie first came to America some years ago, she developed so acute a case of homesickness for her husband that she turned right around in New York and sailed on the next boat for England. Her mate, hearing of this, scoured London several days for an appropriate gift with which to greet her—and found the amethysts in a little shop. Do you blame Binnie for being so proud of them?

Walter Connolly regards the original manuscript of the first three-act play ever presented in America as his lucky talisman. Whenever he starts a picture or opens in a play, he withdraws the script from his vault, invariably returning it the following day so there will be no danger of its being lost.

FOR old times sake, W. C. Fields has the tramp juggler outfit he wore in his vaudeville days . . . baggy pants, ragged coat and vest, battered top hat and broken-down shoes. Keeping it amounts almost to a fetish with him. Fire nearly destroyed the "ensemble" several years ago, so now he keeps it in the safest place he knows . . . his safety deposit box.

As a memento and a warning, Charles Butterworth retains the deed to a lot in a certain Illinois town. The lot is under ten feet of water—and always has been!

"My father gave it to me," declares the comedian, "and said, 'Charlie, keep this and pass it on to your children. Let it be a reminder never to buy real estate that you don't see with your own eyes.'"

The "call sheet" for the first day of "Riders of the Purple Sage" is cherished by George O'Brien. A call sheet, in case you are unfamiliar with the term, is a sheet of paper tacked up in the studio on which appear the names of those players called for the following day's scenes.

This particular sheet bears the name of pretty Marguerite Churchill, who played O'Brien's leading lady in the picture. George had never met the young actress, although he had glimpsed her from a distance on the lot, but as he read her name on the eve of the film's starting date a sudden thrill suffused him.

"I had a certain premonition that I would marry her, the moment I saw her name," the athletic star explains. "Just for luck I took the call sheet—and a few months later Marguerite changed her last name to O'Brien."

The other O'Brien of the movies, Pat, has had his baby's first shoes bronzed—now a popular custom—and they rest in solitary glory in a separate vault, especially preserved for little Mavourneen's keepsakes.

Both Helen Hayes and Virginia Bruce treasure highly concrete memories of their children. Her daughter's first tooth will always remain dear to Miss Hayes, while Miss Bruce keeps all baby Susan Ann's pictures.

A number of celebrities cherish above all else chattels of their childhood. Grace Moore looks upon her red baby shoes as a good luck omen, and will never go through an opening night of the opera season without these at hand. When she goes to California for a picture, she transfers them from a New York to a Hollywood safety deposit box, taking the tiny slippers with her on the first day's shooting.

Jean Harlow has kept her baby ring, together with that of her mother; and one of Ginger Rogers' most prized possessions is a rag doll she called "Tuttles" as a little girl; and two broken dolls she loved in her childhood, lie in Sylvia Sidney's safety vault.

Cesar Romero treasures a picture with a bullet hole through the middle of it, showing his mother holding him on his baptismal day. Cesar's godfather, Jose Marti, was killed during a Cuban revolution and after his death a wallet found in his breast pocket was sent to Mrs. Romero. The bullet that had pierced his heart went straight through the wallet . . . and in it was the picture!

BUCK JONES and his wife were married in a circus ring. Just before the ceremony, Mrs. Jones-to-be picked up a horse-shoe and jokingly asked Buck always to keep it. To this very day, he has the rusty shoe in his bank box.

A lace fan originally carried at a famous Colonial ball and of tremendous monetary value was given to Irene Dunne by Laura Hope Crews. It was in Miss Crews' family for more than 150 years, but her friendship for Irene led her to make the presentation.

Harold Lloyd still retains the horn-rimmed spectacles he wore sixteen years ago and keeps them in a special humidor to prevent the shell from drying out. Mae West cares for a picture of her mother, when the latter was a strikingly-handsome young woman, with an affection approximating a phobia. And Josephine Hutchinson owns and cherishes a locket once worn by the immortal Duse.

An article that he seldom removes but treasures as he does his life is the passport John Boles used in France during the World War. Although only an identification card, it entitled him to go everywhere in France and Belgium without question.

Carefully wrapped and deposited in William Gargan's vault is the christening robe he wore as a baby, a long handmade dress, trimmed with rare old lace. Both his own two children were christened in it, as well.

The friendship involved in the offering of a jade heart by a Chinese actor a number of years ago makes this trinket one of Warren William's most highly valued keepsakes.

Actors may be persons apart from the mob, they may be elevated to the highest pedestal in popular opinion, but when it comes to saving—well, they're just like other folks. They love it!

"HOW I ENDED CONSTIPATION"

This advertisement is based on an actual experience reported in an unsolicited letter. Subscribed and sworn to before me.

Bernice G Ruttingh
NOTARY PUBLIC

"I was miserable with constipation. My husband suggested yeast, but I hated the taste."
"Then I discovered Yeast Foam Tablets. I liked them, and they have certainly helped me."
"Now my weight's normal and I'm like a new person. I wouldn't be without your tablets."

WHY LET constipation keep you run-down, listless, nervous and tired when permanent relief may be yours so easily? Take comfort from the above true story of another sufferer. For this is not just advertising promises, but the actual experience of one of the thousands who write to tell how Yeast Foam Tablets have ended their suffering and restored them to vigorous health.

There's no more need to make yourself the victim of habit-forming cathartics. Yeast Foam Tablets help restore natural digestive and eliminative functions without irritation. Rich in needed tonic elements, this pleasant, pasteurized yeast has banished constipation, headaches and other symptoms for thousands—bringing back the normal healthy glow of the skin—the natural pep—and the surging energy of buoyant health!

Director William Keighley, at Warner Brothers, was giving last-minute instructions to his cast before calling for the cameras. He shot a final order at Glenda Farrell, then asked, "Now, is that clear in your mind?" "Oh, yes," answered Glenda dutifully, "everything is clear except my mind."

Questions Without Answers: Who is the young leading man who has taken to the demon rum on account of a very blonde and very beautiful young star? Seems the young lady's mother doesn't approve of the young man, for various reasons, so he's drowning his sorrows, or at least submerging them for awhile.

Watched Kay Francis do a scene for "Angel of Mercy" on one of the dirtiest sets we've ever seen. Straw mattresses were strewn around the floor, and dust and filth was everywhere. It was supposed to be like that, for signs around the stage said, "Do not clean this set." Director William Dieterle always wears white gloves. When angered he throws them on the floor and stamps on them. When he doesn't like the way an actress has done a scene he approaches her and with a low bow says, "Darling, that was lousy."

[UNTIL SHE SMILES]

She evades close-ups . . . Dingy teeth and tender gums destroy her charm . . . She ignored the warning of "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

Here's loveliness and youth—a vision to stop and hold the admiring eye. And her smile, when you see it, should put a final, flashing highlight upon that youthful charm and loveliness.

But if it doesn't . . . if her smile reveals a glimpse of dingy teeth and tender gums—how quickly that loveliness disappears!

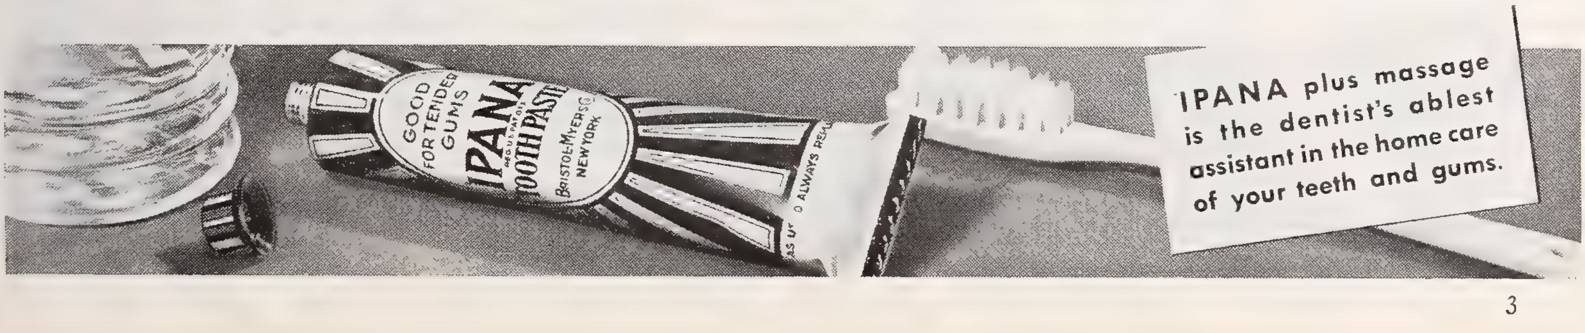
"PINK TOOTH BRUSH" IS A SERIOUS WARNING

Never ignore "pink tooth brush"—never dismiss as trifling that warning "tinge of pink." When you see it—see your dentist promptly. It can mean trouble—a serious gum disorder. But usually it only means gums robbed of exercise and work—the victims of our modern soft foods—gums that will quickly respond to the healthful stimulation of Ipana and massage.

Today dental science repeatedly stresses the threat to our gums of our modern soft food menus. Gums grow flabby and tender simply through lack of exercise. And modern dental practice turns naturally to Ipana and massage to supply the exercise they need—the stimulation they must have.

Ipana Tooth Paste is especially made to benefit your gums as well as your teeth. Every time you clean your teeth, rub a little extra Ipana briskly into your gums, with brush or fingertip. You'll feel them grow livelier, firmer, more resistant. New circulation brings them new life. They feel better. They look better.

Change today to this simple, easy routine. Give your gums the advantages of this better care. Keep "pink tooth brush" a stranger. Keep the really serious gum diseases far in the background. Build better oral health, find new beauty in your smile, make yourself a more attractive person—with Ipana and massage.



IPANA plus massage is the dentist's ablest assistant in the home care of your teeth and gums.

The M-G-M Lion is the Symbol that signifies Joy on the Screen. Miss Entertainment picks Leo to ride to victory!

THE WINNER!

METRO - GOLDWYN - MAYER

We're taking space in this magazine to tell you to keep your eye on Leo, the M-G-M Lion!

He's had the best year of his career what with grand entertainments like "Mutiny on the Bounty", "China Seas", "Broadway Melody of '36", "A Night at the Opera", "Rose Marie" and all the other great M-G-M hits! And of course there's "The Great Ziegfeld", now playing in selected cities as a road-show attraction and not to be shown otherwise this season.

But (pardon his Southern accent) Leo says: "You ain't seen nuthin' yet!" . . . On this page is just part of the happy M-G-M family of stars. Look them over. You'll find most of the screen's famed personalities and great talents on Leo's list. They will appear in the big Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer productions that are now in the making and planned for months to come.

Ask the Manager of the theatre that plays M-G-M pictures about the marvelous entertainments he is arranging to show. And when Leo roars, settle back in your seat for real enjoyment!

PARAMOUNT brings you America's beloved comedian, W. C. FIELDS, as the one and only Professor Eustace McGargle in the musical comedy "POPPY" with Rochelle Hudson . . . Directed by A. Edward Sutherland

Dancing, singing and acting are the least of Shirley Temple's accomplishments. She's an all 'round athlete, and to prove it, Shirley showed us her own bag of outdoor tricks. First, there's her bike, which she rides like a whizz, thanks to her two doting brothers. Then Miss T. would have you know she's a runner-up in golfing matters, despite the sandtrap we caught her in! And croquet—Shirley pounds the stake down so it'll be there when she goes through all the wickets. Beaming broadly, our future Olympics champ gathers the tenpins for some bowling. And shades of kind Will Rogers, Shirley shows you she can twirl a lariat.

HER PIMPLY SKIN MADE ANN FEEL LIKE A TOTAL LOSS
HERE'S WONDERFUL NEWS, ANN — AUNT MARY WANTS YOU TO SPEND TWO WEEKS WITH THEM AT THE SEASHORE
OH, MOTHER — D-DON'T MAKE ME GO, P-PLEASE. I JUST C-COULDN'T — NOT WITH MY FACE ALL BROKEN OUT LIKE THIS IT MAKES ME LOOK AWFUL
WHY DARLING — THOSE PIMPLES DO SEEM TO BE GETTING WORSE. I THINK WE'D BETTER ASK THE DOCTOR WHAT TO DO FOR THEM AND YOU REALLY THINK I CAN GET RID OF THESE PIMPLES?
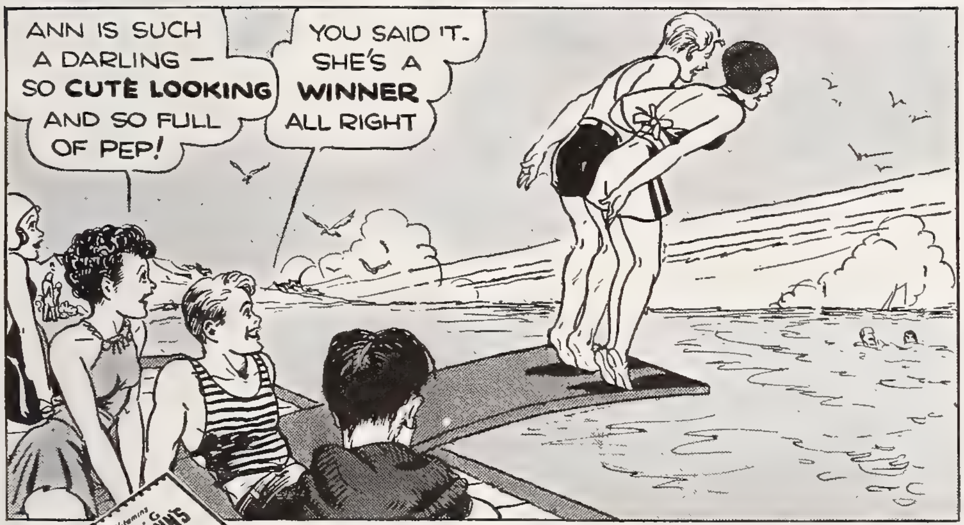
INDEED I DO. EAT FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST FAITHFULLY JUST AS I TOLD YOU, AND YOUR SKIN SHOULD CLEAR UP NICELY
LATER
ISN'T THIS DRESS JUST TOO DUCKY? AND NO PIMPLY FACE ON ME TO SPOIL IT — THANKS TO FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST — OH, I'M SO HAPPY — NOW I KNOW I'LL HAVE A GOOD TIME AT AUNT MARY'S!



ANN IS SUCH A DARLING — SO CUTE LOOKING AND SO FULL OF PEP!
YOU SAID IT. SHE'S A WINNER ALL RIGHT

Don't let Adolescent Pimples spoil YOUR vacation plans

A BROKEN-OUT skin is no help to any girl or boy who longs to be popular and have good times. But unfortunately, many young people are victims of this trouble.

After the start of adolescence—from about 13 to 25, or even longer—important glands develop and final growth takes place. This causes disturbances throughout the entire body. The skin gets oversensitive. Harmful waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin. Pimples break out.

Thousands have found Fleischmann's Yeast a great help in getting rid of adolescent pimples. It clears these skin irritants out of the blood. Then, the pimples go!

Eat 3 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast regularly—one cake about ½ hour before meals—plain, or in a little water—until your skin is entirely clear. Start today.

Her Tennis Stroke is Correctly Timed —too bad her laxative wasn't!

HER SWING is a marvel of precision and timing . . . What a pity she didn't know that correct timing is vital in a laxative, too!

You see, when you take a laxative into your system, you can't afford to take chances. Look out for harsh, over-acting cathartics that might upset you, nauseate you, cause stomach pains, leave you weak and dragged down. Such laxatives abuse you internally. Their after-effects are unpleasant, sometimes dangerous.

DEMAND CORRECT TIMING

Just what is meant by correct timing in a laxative? Simply this: a correctly timed laxative takes from 6 to 8 hours to be effective. Its action is gentle and g-r-a-d-u-a-l, yet completely thorough.

Ex-Lax is just such a laxative. It won't throw your system out of rhythm. No stomach pains, no nausea. No unpleasant after-effects of any sort. Ex-Lax works so naturally that, except for the relief you enjoy, you scarcely realize you have taken a laxative.

PLEASANT TO TAKE

Ex-Lax is not only kind to your system —it's kind to your taste, too. Its flavor is just like smooth, delicious chocolate. All druggists sell Ex-Lax in economical 10¢ and 25¢ sizes. Get a box today!

Each coupon has been tabulated, so if you have requested any of these, kindly consider yours automatically responsible.

FRED ASTAIRE—Fred and his sister, Adele, were practically born dancing. When they were only about 8 years old and still Fred and Adele Austerlitz, they were earning a tidy $200.00 a week. Fred was born in Omaha, Neb., on November 26, 1900, and received his earlier education in private schools. Shortly after beginning their footlight careers, this young team became very popular. Three of their musical productions took the Astaires to London, where they became the rage both in society and the theatre world. There Adele met Lord Cavendish and retired in 1931 to marry him. This left Fred without a partner but, nothing daunted, he returned to America and continued to turn in hit performances in "The Bandwagon" and "The Gay Divorcee." He also appeared in these same shows in England. It was at this time that Phyllis Livingstone Potter, a society girl, became his wife. Fred's debut on the screen was anything but auspicious. His roles in "Dancing Lady" and "Flying Down to Rio" were both minor and unworthy of his talents. But a break finally came in the form of "The Gay Divorcee" and now the team of Astaire and Rogers ranks fourth in box-office popularity. Off the screen Fred has dark brown eyes and hair, likes tennis, golf and prize fights. He is 5 feet 9 inches tall, and is very slender, In January he became the father of a boy, and report has it that he is the proverbial doting parent. After "Follow the Fleet" he and Ginger will be in "Never Gonna Dance." Write him at RKO-Radio Studios, 780 Gower St., Hollywood, Cal.

EVELYN C., Waterbury, Conn.—Paulette Goddard, Charlie Chaplin's leading lady in "Modern Times" and maybe his bride, is not French. She was born in Great Neck, L. I., N. Y. Ruby Keeler couldn't very well marry Dick Powell on account of she has been married to Al Jolson since 1928. (Where have you been?) Dick, however, is currently interested in Joan Blondell. During the World War Herbert Marshall served with the British Military Service. At Arras, in 1915, he was severely wounded in action, losing a leg, and was cited for bravery.

SHIRLEY TEMPLE—On April 23, Shirley Jane reached the ripe old age of 7 years. That day in 1929 at Santa Monica, Cal., was an auspicious one for her parents, Mr. and Mrs. George F. Temple. When she was only 3, she was sent to a dancing class and it was during one of these lessons that she was spotted by a talent scout. Rather reluctantly at first, her parents agreed to her playing in a series of 7 Baby Burlesk Comedies for Educational. Then Shirley played a small part in "Frolics of Youth," following which she went to Paramount for a brief role in Randy Scott's "To The Last Man." It was about this time that Fox decided the wee Temple child was just what they needed for the dancing and singing role in "Stand Up and Cheer." It was Shirley's first big assignment and she more than proved her worth. Result—she was signed to a contract and has appeared in the following pictures: "Now I'll Tell," "Change of Heart," "Little Miss Marker," "Baby Take a Bow," "Now and Forever," "Bright Eyes," "Little Colonel," "Our Little Girl," "Curley Top," "The Littlest Rebel" and "Captain January." You know as well as I do that her hair is blonde and delightfully curly and that her eyes are blue. She is getting along nicely in her studies under a tutor, and will soon be able to read her fan mail all by herself. Shirley hasn't any real hobbies yet, but she is very fond of pets and has almost enough to start a small zoo. Her two brothers, John and George, like to play with her and tease her, just like all older brothers do. Recently, Miss Temple completed "The Poor Little Rich Girl," which you will be seeing shortly. Write to her at the 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box 900, Beverly Hills, Cal.

CHARLES NORTON, Dorchester, Mass.—Tom Brown was in "Annapolis Farewell," not Johnny Downs. The other academy picture in which Tom played was "Tom Brown of Culver," in 1932. His next picture will be "And Sudden Death," tentative title. Write him at the Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Hollywood, Cal.

FRED MacMURRAY—Named for his father, a noted concert violinist, Fred was born in Kankakee, Ill., on August 30, 1908. When only 3 weeks old his parents moved to Beaver Dam, Wis., where their young son attended grade and high school. Fred also went to high school in Madison, where he went in heavily for athletics. Ten letters proved his proficiency in football, baseball, track and basketball. Upon graduation he enrolled at Carroll College, Waukesha, Wis., for one year, earning his tuition by playing in orchestras. The next jump was to Chicago and a dance band in which Mr. MacMurray served both as a saxophonist and soloist. Then came Hollywood and a theatre band in which he also sang and played, sometimes making recordings. When the opportunity presented itself he took an extra role or two in the movies as a side issue. New York came next, with Fred among the California Collegians, a musical comedy stage band. In 1929 Fred was featured with this orchestra in a singing sketch with Libby Holman in "Three's a Crowd." For the next 5 years he stuck with this group and appeared regularly in New York's most popular night clubs. The band was booked for featured billing in Max Gordon's hit, "Roberta," where, in addition to his singing, MacMurray was understudy to the leading man. Paramount spotted him and in April, 1934, he was signed to a contract. Fred is 6 feet 3 inches tall, weighs 185 pounds and has dark brown hair and eyes. "13 Hours by Air" and "The Princess Comes Across" are his most recent films. P. S. You'll hear some of Fred's singing in this one. "The Texas Rangers" will be his next. Lilian Lamont is his best girl, and he certainly picked a pretty one. Write him at the Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Hollywood, Cal.

SANTINA MERANDINO, East Rutherford, N. J.—You win! Sid Silvers played the part of Jack Benny's side-kick in "Broadway Melody of 1936." Loretta Young is not married now, though she was once the wife of Grant Withers.

DOUGLASS MONTGOMERY—A lot of you have been wondering what has happened to this splendid young actor. Well, he has been giving England a break and has just been scheduled to appear in "Everything Is Thunder" with Constance Bennett for Gaumont-British. And here's something funny. Douglass is really Robert Douglass Montomery, while Robert Montgomery is actually Henry Montgomery, Jr., and they're no relation. Also, Douglass used to call himself Kent Douglas in his early screen days. Now that you are properly confused, we'll get on with the facts. Born in Los Angeles, Cal., on October 29, 1909, Douglass attended grade school there and later the Polytechnic elementary school in Pasadena. He graduated from the Los Angeles high school, and during his school days worked at the Pasadena Community Playhouse. His first part was given him when he was only 14, and when he was 16, Douglass played a leading role in "Desire Under the Elms" in San Francisco. Young Mr. Montgomery continued on the stage until he was cast opposite Joan Crawford in "Paid." Since then he has divided his time successfully between stage and screen. He is 5 feet 11½ inches tall, weighs 178 pounds and is very blonde with blue eyes. He is not married and swimming is his favorite sport. Write him at the Gaumont-British Studios, Lime Grove, Shepherd's Bush, London, W.12, England.

ANGELINE BUSCEMI, Pittston, Pa.—Here are the addresses you requested: Jimmie Ellison, Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Hollywood, Cal. Bob Steele, Supreme Pictures Corp., 1509 N. Vine St., Hollywood, Cal. Tom Tyler, RKO-Radio Studios, 780 N. Gower St., Hollywood, Cal. Dick Foran, Warner Bros. Studios, Burbank, Cal.

PHIL REGAN—Did you know that Phil is none other than the one-time "Singing Cop" of radio? Well, he was just that before the movies claimed him. He was really a cop, too, on the New York Police Force, and probably would be still if it hadn't been for that marvelous tenor voice of his. Phil was born in Brooklyn, May 28, 1908, and was so like his brother Jim it was hard to tell them apart. He attended parochial school and planned to be a policeman when he "grew up." This he did, even getting a promotion for capturing a murderer. A voice instructor heard Phil sing at an entertainment and encouraged him to train his voice, which he did. When Abe Lyman heard him he was invited to be "guest artist" on that orchestra leader's program in 1932, and shortly after was given a contract of his own singing with Guy Lombardo's band. Casting his eye Hollywoodward, he attained that desire, too, and appeared in his first picture in 1934. From cop to crooner in three short jumps. This young Irish-American is 5 feet 10 inches tall, has hazel eyes and black hair. He is interested in all outdoor sports. There is no Mrs. Phil Regan. "Laughing Irish Eyes" is his most recent picture. Write him at Republic Studios, 9336 West Washington Boulevard, Culver City, California.

RONALD COLMAN—Born in Richmond, Surrey, England, February 9, 1891, the son of Charles Colman, a non-professional. Ronald attended the Hadley School in Littlehampton, Sussex. When he was 16 his father died and the boy was forced to leave school, taking his first job with a steamship company as office boy at $2.50 a week. He became a bookkeeper for that firm and later a junior accountant, being employed there for 5 years. During his school days Ronald had played in amateur theatricals, and continued them during this period. For physical diversion he joined the London Scottish Regiment, to which he belonged for 4 years. In September, 1914, as a private, he saw action in the World War, but was wounded by an exploding shell and was sent home to do clerical work. Mr. Colman's first appearance on the London stage was in 1916 in a small part, and his screen debut was made the same year in a two-reel comedy. In 1920 he came to America, finally getting a role on the stage in support of Robert Warwick and later with George Arliss in "The Green Goddess." Followed several other plays, then a screen contract. His first important picture was opposite Lillian Gish in "The White Sister." Mr. Colman is 5 feet 11 inches tall, weighs 158 pounds and has dark brown hair and eyes. His pet pastimes are tennis, motoring, reading and swimming. He is divorced from Thelma Ray. Fortunately for us, this sterling actor has been very busy in Hollywood of late. Having recently completed "Under Two Flags," he is now working in "Lost Horizon." His address is 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box 900, Beverly Hills, Cal.

ROBERT WHITE, Wilmington, Del.—We quite agree with you that color films are fast improving. There are several important technicolor pictures on the docket. The first is "The Dancing Pirate" with Steffi Duna and Charles Collins. The second is "The Garden of Allah" with Marlene Dietrich and Charles Boyer, the third, "Ramona," with Loretta Young, and last but not least, Gary Cooper in the technicolor remake of "Beau Geste." You'd better accustom yourself to the rainbow flickers, because it's only a question of time before the black-and-whites will be as outdated as the silents of yesteryear.

IRENE DUNNE—The role of Magnolia in "Show Boat" is one to which Miss Dunne is especially suited for two reasons. In the first place, she was the star of Ziegfeld's stage hit, "Show Boat," and secondly, she was born in Louisville, Ky., the daughter of Captain Joseph J. Dunne, a ship builder and owner of Ohio River steamboats. July 14, 1904, was her birthdate. Educated at the Loretta Academy in Louisville, then in a convent in St. Louis, she began her musical education there and later attended the Chicago College of Music. There she studied language, voice and music, graduating in 1926. Miss Dunne has a lyrical soprano voice and a singing record that includes prima donna roles in such stage successes as "Sweetheart Time," "Irene" and "Clinging Vine," and was under contract with the Metropolitan Opera Company for one season. While appearing in "Irene" she was given a screen test and signed to a long term contract. Her film debut was made in "Leathernecking" followed by "Cimarron," in 1930 and 1931 respectively. Reading, dancing and golf comprise her diversions, and she is interested in the study of astronomy. Miss Dunne is 5 feet 4 inches tall, weighs 115 pounds and is a brunette with blue-gray eyes. She has been the wife of Dr. Francis Griffin of New York since July 16, 1928. Write her at Universal Studios, Universal City, Cal., where she recently completed the aforementioned "Show Boat" with Allan Jones and Paul Robeson.

BING CROSBY—Did you know that "Bing" stands for Harry Lillis? Well, it does, and Harry Lillis Crosby was born in Tacoma, Wash., May 2, 1904. When H. L. was but a mite of a boy, the whole Crosby tribe transposed itself to Spokane, where Bing, his two sisters and four brothers received their earlier education. The nickname "Bing," by the way, is a hangover from the days when our hero used to play "Cowboys and Indians" and used his voice in noisy imitation of a gun. During his high school days Bing appeared in plays, but his family had a lawyer's future in mind for him and shipped him off to Gonzaga College. There he played a little football, but was principally interested in the glee club. With Al Rinker, another student, he organized a seven-piece orchestra which became very popular—so much so, in fact, that they decided to abandon law and enter the entertainment field. Through Rinker's sister they got an engagement in Los Angeles, after which they toured the Coast until Paul Whiteman adopted them and, with Harry Barris, formed that group known as the Rhythm Boys. They toured with Whiteman until 1930, when they went to California to appear in "The King of Jazz." The Rhythm Boys were engaged to sing at the Cocoanut Grove in Hollywood; Bing started to make records which became best-sellers; then signed a radio contract—and after all that, a screen contract. Crooner Crosby is 5 feet 9 inches tall, weighs 170 pounds and has light blue eyes and light brown hair. Dixie Lee is his wife and the mother of three-year-old Gary Evan Crosby and the two-year-old twins, Phillip Lang and Dennis Michael. Right now Bing is working on a "different" sort of picture (for him). It's called "Rhythm on the Range" and will smack of the wide open spaces and cowboys. Mr. Crosby can be reached at the Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Hollywood, Cal. Note: the usual charge for a star's photograph is 25 cents.

MARY WILSON, Hope, Ark.—The first moving picture with a plot was made in 1903 by Edwin S. Porter. It was "The Life of an American Fireman" and was such a success that Porter was fired with ambition to make a train story. The result was "The Great Train Robbery," one reel in length, with a sustained, suspended plot. It was a sensation, and the beginning of the "story picture" as we know it on the screen of today.

By Leo Townsend

★★★ The Moon's Our Home (Walter Wanger)

The presence of Margaret Sullavan in a picture practically guarantees it worth your time and money. In this particular case, she has transformed a too whimsical story into good entertainment. She is aided and abetted by Henry Fonda, who proves that he can look and act charming without a plow in sight. Here he is Anthony Amberton, alias John Smith, sophisticated author of adventure books. Finding the world is too much with him, he determines to take refuge on a New England farm, as does Cherry Chester, alias Sarah Brown, movie queen who wants to get far, far from the mad crowd. Cherry is subject to tantrums. One is never sure what she will do next, but can be sure it will be worse than expected. However, she meets her match in Anthony John and is surprised enough to marry him. The ceremony gives Miss Sullavan an excuse—not that she needs one—to throw the biggest tantrum of her career. Others in the cast who give top-notch performances are Charlie Butterworth, Walter Brennan, Margaret Hamilton and Beulah Bondi. It's a Faith Baldwin fantasy, made palatable by Dorothy Parker's dialogue and excellent acting.

Preview Postscript

Margaret Sullavan and Henry Fonda unwittingly knocked two experts out of jobs while working on this picture. The experts were ski-professionals, hired to teach the star and her leading man the fine points of the sport while on location in the High Sierras on the California-Nevada border. The experts were also to double for them in the long-shots, thereby avoiding accidents. But after a day's work Director Seiter sent the professionals back to Hollywood. "They kept falling down and getting tangled up in their skis, while Margaret and Hank performed like they'd been sailing down mountain sides all their lives," he explained. It seems that Miss Sullavan spent her school days in New England and Fonda learned the sport from Scandinavian aces while attending the University of Minnesota . . . One of the 25 costumes designed for Margaret Sullavan was locked in the safe at night, while armed guards kept an eagle eye on the star every moment that she wore the costume on the set. The outfit was covered with jewels and hung with silver fox furs. The fox heads had large diamonds for eyes. It was Miss S's pet antipathy, since she loathes any kind of costume except slacks and cotton shirt. On dress-up occasions she sometimes breaks down to the extent of donning a white crepe evening dress, of which she has fifteen, all made exactly alike. Funny gal, Mag Sullavan.

Allan Jones and Irene Dunne during a romantic moment from "Show Boat."

★★★ Show Boat

(Universal)

This amiable musical can be classed with "The Great Ziegfeld." Paul Robeson's magnificent rendition of "Ol' Man River" and two songs, "Can't Help Lovin' That Man" and "Just My Bill," by Helen Morgan, are grand numbers. When Miss Morgan puts that tear in her voice you know that Hollywood has been neglecting one of the theatre's most compelling personalities. "Show Boat" is one of the better screen musicals with Irene Dunne and Allan Jones in the romantic leads and Charles Winninger and Helen Westley heading the supporting cast. Miss Dunne fills her assignment capably, and even manages to get into blackface and tear off a low-down shuffle or two. Good in the smaller roles are Donald Cook, J. Farrell MacDonald and Hattie McDaniels.

★★★★ The Great Ziegfeld (M-G-M)

The great and late Mr. Ziegfeld would no doubt heartily approve of this cinematic version of his life and times, for it contains everything that he himself held dear. It has opulence, tremendous production numbers, hundreds of pretty girls, and is decidedly lacking in humor. Running over three hours, it highlights the career of the great impresario from his early barn-storming days with Sandow, through the palmy period when "The Follies" made fortunes, to his death, a broken and rather pathetic old man. Injected into this are several production numbers which have the Ziegfeld touch administered by the bountiful hand of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Notable among them is Irving Berlin's "A Pretty Girl Is Like a Melody," which has always been more or less a theme song for "The Follies." Ray Bolger stops the show in one spot with his stepping, and Fannie Brice would have done the same had the camera given her number more attention. Of the cast, Luise Rainer's "Anna Held" is by far the most memorable performance. William Powell is his usual suave self in the title role, Myrna Loy is a charming Billie Burke, Frank Morgan, as Ziegfeld's friendly rival, is richly comical and A. A. Trimble furnishes a breath-taking resemblance to the late Will Rogers. "The Great Ziegfeld" is a lavish, eye-filling musical.

M-G-M spread themselves to the extent of over a million dollars for this celluloider. Although the actual filming took only five months, the idea had been brewing around Hollywood for several years. Several studios had an eye on the master showman's life for a film, but it took writer William Anthony McGuire to collect all the information, visualize the magnitude of the production, and get it all boiled down to scenario form. Billie Burke and daughter, Patricia, loaned a helping hand to the author many times . . . One of the most collossal jobs fell on the shoulders of Adrian, studio designer, and his corps of workers. Over a hundred extra seamstresses were hired to help out on the costumes, and for two months they worked in crews, day and night, sewing on the intricate and elaborate costumes. Thousands of yards of velvet, tulle, satin, chiffon and other materials were utilized for costumes and also stage settings. A carload of ostrich plumes was ordered from Australia for the production. The costumes didn't feel as beautiful as they looked, however. Luise Rainer swears she never drew a breath all the time she was on the set, due to iron stays which girded her waist. Virginia Bruce wore one costume with a glass head-piece weighting 22 pounds, and the train of her gown was wired so that it weighed 46 pounds. It took three men to carry her up the steps to pose in one scene. They were plenty of complaints from the Ziegfeld chorus girls, too.

★★★ Under Two Flags (20th Century-Fox)

Repetition hasn't marred the charm of Ouida's beloved story of French Legion and this version tops the two previous pictures made in silent days. You couldn't ask for a more perfect Sergeant Victor than Ronald Colman. He is every inch the English gentleman who has sought forgetfulness of an unhappy past in the daring life of a Legionnaire. Claudette Colbert's Cigarette benefits by Miss C's own French lineage. And Rosalind Russell makes the most of the sympathetic type of role not usually her lot. As for Victor MacLaglen, the hard-boiled Major Doyle, you don't need to hear more. He's tops! You probably know the exciting story set against the background of Africa at a time when France and England were the prey of the Arab chieftains. There's romance and fighting galore. All in all a swell evening's entertainment.

★★★ The Ex-Mrs. Bradford

(RKO-Radio)

It's good to see Bill Powell return to the sport of crime solving, even though in this case he acts more or less in an amateur capacity. Powell is Dr. Bradford, whose only connection with crime is that his ex-wife, Jean Arthur, is a writer of mystery yarns. She is also an inveterate collector of alimony, and in the interest of this lucrative hobby she moves in with a good doctor, just in time to get her ex-spouse mixed up in a lovely murder mystery. The crime involves the strange death of a jockey, the first of a series of mysterious killings. When Mr. Powell lends his talents to the solving of the crime he finds himself at the head of the list of suspects. Having a distinct aversion to being hanged, he goes after the thing in earnest and winds up, as you can well imagine, with the situation well in hand. Incidentally, he escapes his alimony payment by the simple expedient of re-marrying Miss Arthur. "The Ex-Mrs. Bradford" is a fast-moving comedy-drama in the best "Thin Man" tradition, with Powell and Arthur keeping the piece in high gear throughout. In the supporting cast, there are good performances by Eric Blore, Jimmy Gleason, Robert Armstrong, Ralph Morgan, Lila Lee, Grant Mitchell and Erin O'Brien-Moore, whose work should entitle her to much better roles.

Preview Postscript

Jimmy Gleason was overjoyed at the prospect of playing detective in the same cast his wife, Lucille, was cast as a murder suspect. He says it gave him a chance to have the last word. Frank Morgan and Mrs. Gleason had one grand reunion the first day on the set. For they had not played together since 1918, when Morgan was the villain and Lucille the lady in distress in an intense mellerdrammer . . . Among the better paid "extras" on this picture were ten black widow spiders. For three days' work they each received ten dollars. S. U. Allman is their manager. His ranch outside of Hollywood in the San Fernando valley is a paradise for reptiles, insects and weird animals, of every description. Allman hunts these out in deserted mines, out of the way places in desert and mountain, and caves all over the state . . . That modernistic apartment was even more dazzling in real life. Designed by Van Nest Polglase and furnished by Darrell Silvera the whole apartment was built as a unit on one set, instead of scattering the various rooms in many different corners of the set. Brown, beige and silver was the color combination, and so enamored was Jean Arthur of it that she is having an apartment of her own decorated exactly the same way.

★★★ I Married a Doctor

(Warners)

Based on Sinclair Lewis' "Main Street" this film depicts just as aptly the disgreeable phases of the American small town. Therein lies our one objection to the picture. For it shows only the gossiping, narrow-minded tendencies of the small-towner, and none of the genuine neighborliness which can be found

Bette Davis, our Modern Hostess, presents her tempting native dishes

By Marjorie Deen

Bette and Barbara Davis, all set for their native New England Boiled Dinner, with an Indian Pudding to top it off.

new england favorites

IT HAS long been a cherished notion of mine that interviewers should form an association of their own whose purpose it would be to give ratings to those they have interviewed during the past twelve months. If such a scheme is ever adopted I shall be the first one to stand up and cast my vote for Bette Davis, giving her a four-star rating and the right to place after her name the initials P. S.—meaning Perfectly Swell. And she will have earned her rating in my opinion, not only because she is a regular person with no airs and with a keen sense of humor, but also because, from a cooking editor's standpoint, she is swell copy. Bette possesses a down-to-earth attitude on any subject which she bothers to talk about, and one of the things that I found she was willing to discuss with authority and enthusiasm was the justly famous dishes of New England.

This was grand news to me because Bette of all the Hollywood stars, is best qualified to hold forth on any question pertaining to New England—whether climate, customs or cuisine! For Miss Davis, you know, is a 100 per cent New Englander herself. She was born in Massachusetts (Lowell, to be exact), was brought up in and around Boston and spent several summers on Cape Cod.

The Cape, of course, was named for the fish that abound in the waters off the coast there—these same fish being prominently featured in several of the well-known dishes that originated in that part of the country. We will have occasion to refer to Cod again later on in this article.

One of the things that the Davis gal looked forward to most on her recent visit to the East, she told me, was the all-too-short visit she paid to Boston, where, as you can well imagine she was feted and made much of. And where, she also informed me, she was able to enjoy the native dishes for which she had become really "homesick."

I WANTED to see if they were really as grand as I used to think them," she told me. "And they were, there's no doubt about that. Somehow they never seem to taste quite the same to me any place else, even though I give our cook in Hollywood specific directions and old-time recipes to follow.

"I think my mistake lies in not hiring a Yankee cook," she continued, laughing, "but I keep on trying although foreign servants think me somewhat mad to want such basically simple, prosaic foods. Fortunately for me, my husband enjoys the same dishes (Continued on page 72)

NED WAYBURN'S

Dancing Teachers choose Nonspi

TO BE SURE!

● Ned Wayburn's charming dancing teachers are careful in choosing a preparation to overcome under-arm moisture. They must keep themselves fresh through a strenuous evening, guard their frocks against under-arm stains...and yet use a deodorant that does not irritate their flawless skin.

They've found that when deodorants are used half-strength, they give only half-way results. So they choose Nonspi which can be used full strength, because:

1. Nonspi has been pronounced entirely safe by highest medical authority.
2. Nonspi can be used full strength by women whose delicate skin forces them to use deodorants half-strength, with only half-way results.
3. Nonspi protection lasts from two to five days...and you can depend on it.
4. Nonspi's siphon-top bottle prevents contamination. And there's no dripping or waste with this patented Nonspi applicator.

To be sure of protection...to be safe from skin irritation...insist on genuine Nonspi at all drug and department stores in the U.S.A. and Canada. It's 35c and 60c a bottle.

THE MARCH O'TIME

An Iowa reader congratulates the producers of "The March of Time," the non-fiction branch of pictures.

$5 PRIZE LETTER
Glorified Newsreel

I want to say how thoroughly I enjoy "The March of Time." Last week I saw "Father Divine" of Harlem, which was presented with all the staccato, directness and verve of a short-short story.

It seems to me that its editors have certainly developed a technique for glorifying the newsreel. Instead of scattered, haphazard, fragmentary shots here and there, they confine themselves to several subjects which they develop interestingly and unusually. Their episodes show definite build-up, compactness, care in photography and sometimes sheer genius in composition. I like the narrator, too; his comments are dramatic, yet impartial.

"The March of Time" presents a valuable method for keeping up on the most colorful, flavorful monthly happenings, and I, for one, want to congratulate those responsible for a definite forward step in the non-fiction branch of moving pictures. —Mrs. Harry Godley, Davenport, Iowa.

Why Producers Go Mad

Aren't movie stars funny? Just as soon as they make a big hit as a certain type—they want to change that type. Ginger Rogers, the super-perfect song-and-dance girl, yearns to play drah-ma. Aline MacMahon, who panicked us with her wise-cracking, hard-boiled roles, now accepts only dramatic parts, such as in "Kind Lady." Another little comedienne, Isabel Jewell, has turned tragedienne recently, much to the disappointment of many fans.

I suppose soon we'll hear that Nelson Eddy wants to become a tap-dancer, Charles Laughton will yearn to play juveniles, and Fred Astaire will burst forth with a yen to do "Hamlet."

OH, I WANNA PLAY CAMILLE!

Read a San Francisco reader's wise observations on stars eager to change their types.

A desire to achieve something entirely different from one's own particular style, is natural, but changing one's screen type is a sure-fire way of losing popularity. Think it over, Miss or Mr. Star!—Tona Swan, San Francisco, Calif.

Thank You, Thank You

It is not a habit with me to invest my money in the purchase of any motion picture magazine, but it is a habit to get MODERN SCREEN even though it sometimes means going without a sandwich or walking instead of riding some distance, once a month. Why do I make this sacrifice?

Well, the movie world is the chief topic of conversation anywhere one goes today and your magazine is the most reliable source of obtaining that information. Its pictures are the best, posed or caught unawares, your criticisms of the movies are very frank, your interviews are most amusing and direct. I enjoyed your recent feature on Maureen O'Sullivan because it took the usual paint off the star's public and private life and thoughts. Sylvia's contributions also remove that perfection so many stars claim. And Scotty's pictures certainly show some awful defects. That is what I like to know about the celebrities, not a lot of trash about this star's love life and that player's "mysterious glamor" (à la press agent), and thanks to MODERN SCREEN I am getting what I want.—Vanet Lindauer, Philadelphia, Pa.

$1 PRIZE LETTER
Picture Spoilers

"Trailers" of pictures, flashed on the screens of our local movie emporiums the week before the entire picture is shown, are in my opinion "picture spoilers," instead of well-planned advertising that the exhibitors intend them to be.

How many times, finding myself unable to get laughs out of humorous pictures where mirth was intended, have I discovered the seeming stale humor due entirely to the fact that I had been "treated" to the humorous high-spots in the trailer that preceded it. Personally, as an adult movie fan, I've never enjoyed seeing a picture for the second time, and it is just this effect upon my enjoyment that the trailers, in their present form, have had.—Mrs. U. A. Stone, Jr., Brooklyn, N. Y.

$1 PRIZE LETTER
Stars' Alibis

"A much needed vacation," "Find a suitable story," "Time needed to make this production" . . . With excuses like these coming from our best loved stars, no wonder new faces are always being sought for the screen. Loss of popularity is nearly always attributed to "poor stories" and the "fickle public"—all of which may be true enough, but can we be expected to sit and wait until a player makes another picture when that wait extends from one year upward? I'm still waiting for Mary Pickford's promised movie; I'm trying to be patient while Ruth Chatterton finds a suitable story; and Norma Shearer has kept us on needles while she made "Romeo and Juliet."

Since we fans don't possess the traits of Tennyson's brook, it's rather difficult to expect us to wait when people like Irene Dunne make "The Magnificent Obsession" and Fred Astaire is giving us

There's one of each in every family and the Barrymores prove no exception

By Muriel Babcock

TO SKEPTICAL Hollywood's utter amazement, John Barrymore has picked up the role of Mercutio in "Romeo and Juliet" and simply tossed it over his shoulder. He is magnificent in the part.

Of course, when you see the picture, Barrymore may not have the footage the brilliance of his performance would indicate. For after all Norma Shearer is the star of the film, and Leslie Howard is her Romeo and the cutter will probably bear this in mind.

Six months ago he had completed a thorough job of making a profound fool of himself. He had been the target for snickers and giggles in every section of the country. The ludicrous spectacle of the great and handsome John Barrymore chasing and then being chased by a girl young enough to be his granddaughter was a picture painted on the minds of practically everyone old enough to read.

After such a performance even from a Barrymore, Hollywood considered John through as a romantic idol of the screen.

Barrymore was also sick and tired. When he returned to Los Angeles after the Caliban-Ariel episode, he was so weak he had to hang on to the coat of a newspaper reporter while camera men took his picture. Bad Boy Barrymore, everybody reckoned, had at last reached the end of his rope.

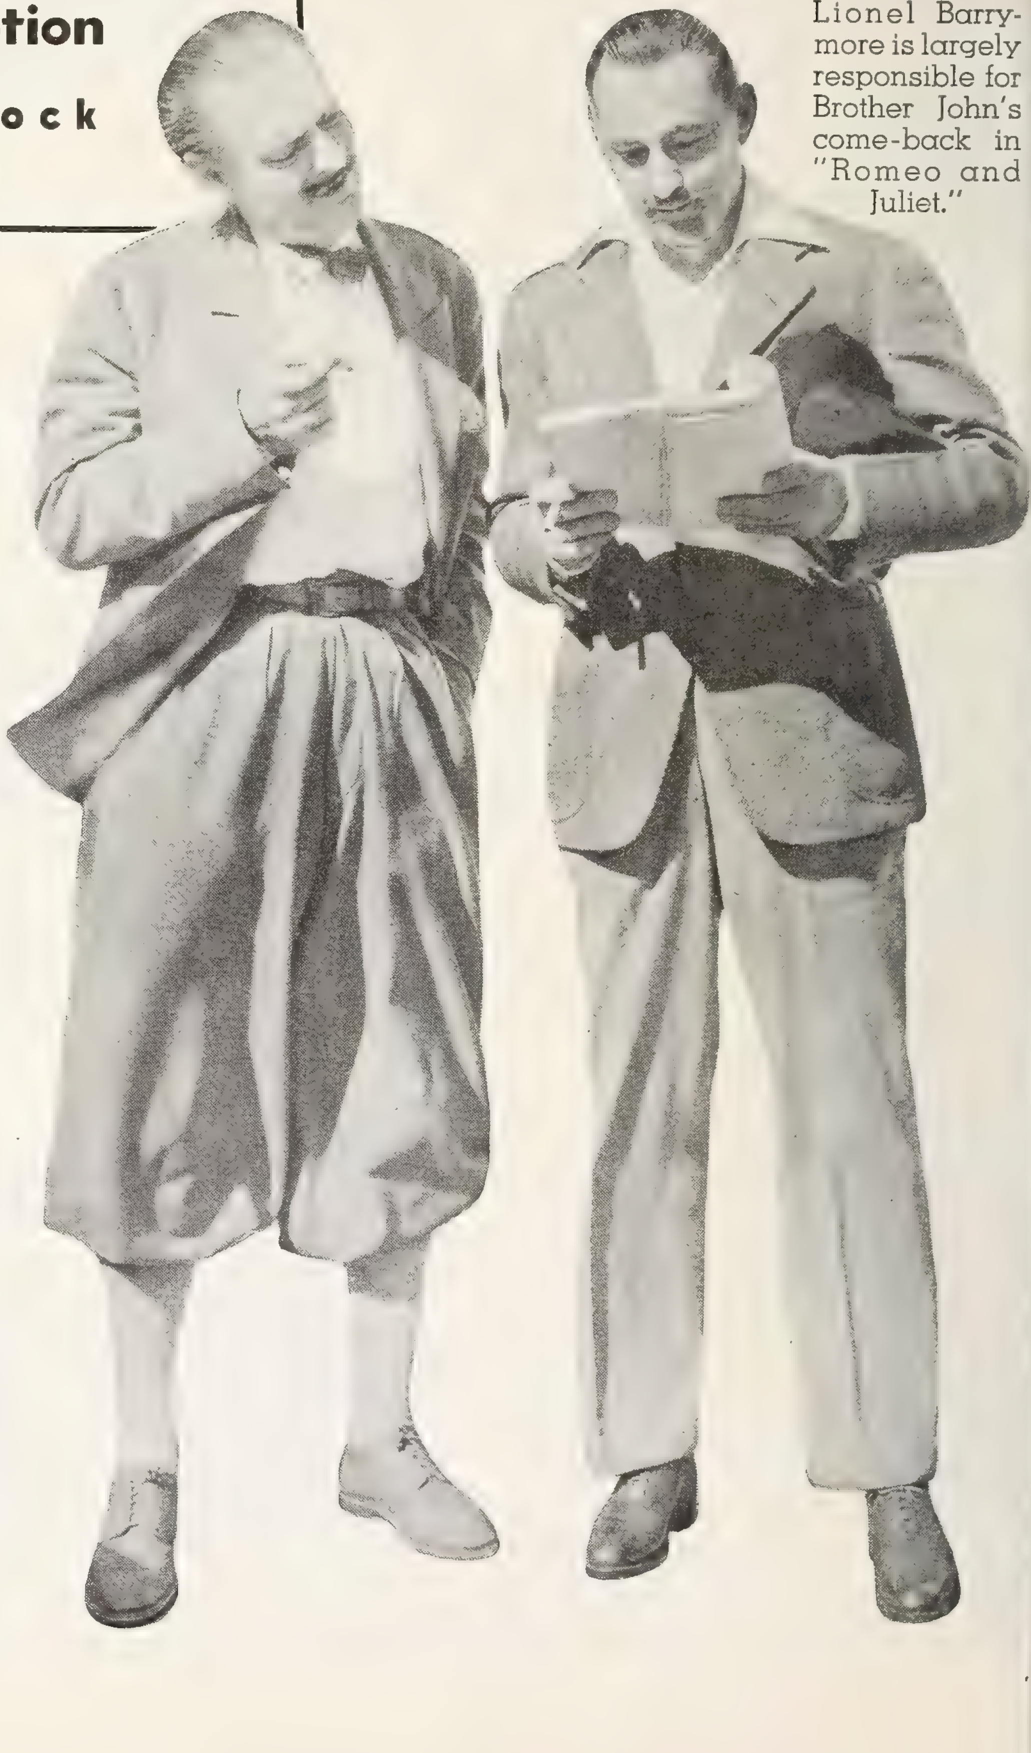
BUT THEY reckoned without the Barrymore spirit and without the loyalty that exists in the family. They reckoned without Good Boy (how he hates to be so labeled) Lionel Barrymore, who emerged from his secluded life in Beverly Hills to take the errant John in tow and put him back on his feet.

So the inside story of John's come-back is also a tale of Lionel's faith, loyalty and ingenuity in time of stress. It is also closely connected with Elaine (Ariel) Barrie, the young girl who chased him so wildly across the continent. But more of that later.

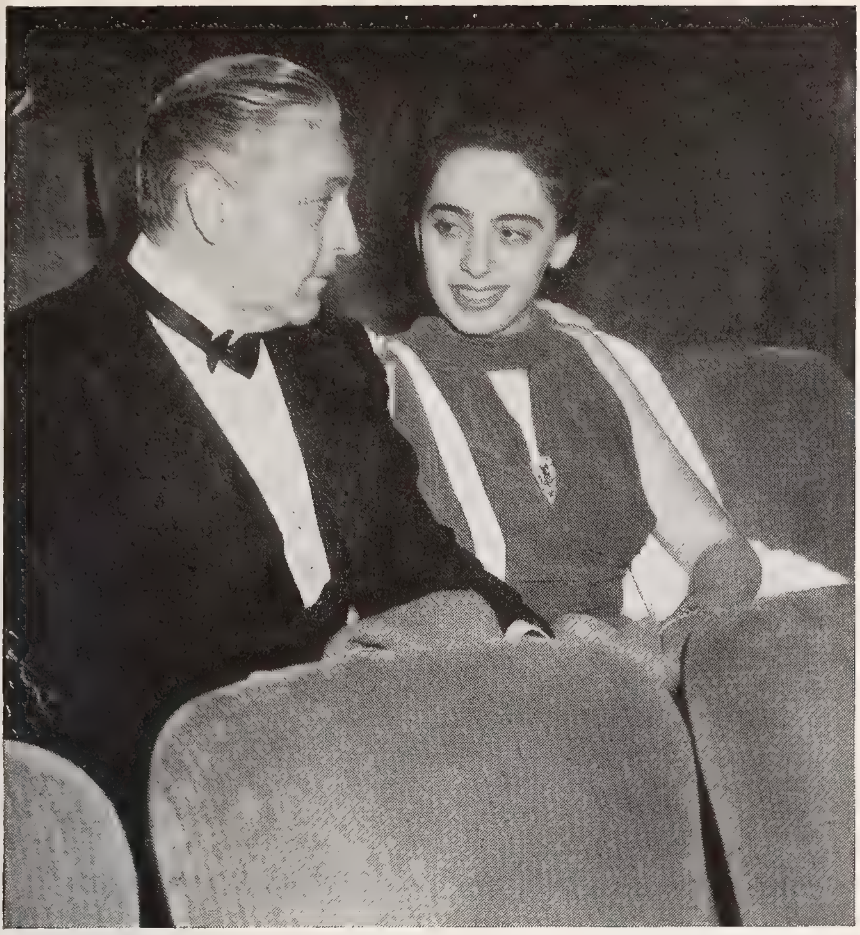
As John stumbled off the train that day in Los Angeles to be met by Lionel, a girl reporter inquired how he felt. "Madame," he replied, "that is none of your damned business."

"Here, here," quickly and diplomatically interposed Lionel, "that's no way to talk. These are the Los Angeles reporters. They are your friends."

With great dignity, John turned docilely to the young lady, gave her a pleasant pat and raised his beautiful left eyebrow in the



Lionel Barrymore is largely responsible for Brother John's come-back in "Romeo and Juliet."



Ariel and Caliban at a recent concert.

Though she ran out on him once, Elaine Barrie still has a strange fascination for John Barrymore, and nothing seems to keep him from seeing her. They are constant companions at Hollywood social gatherings.

gesture he has used since he first found out how to charm women.

"Madame, I am sorry if I am rude," he said. "In answer to your question, I feel fine and am glad to be home again among my friends."

John had put himself in Brother Lionel's hands, for he knew he could trust everything to him.

WHICH GOES to prove that you can't write a story about one Barrymore boy without writing about the other, totally different as they may be—John, seething, restless, temperamental, unstable, spoiled, and Lionel, amiable, indifferent, stable, sweet-tempered and alive to responsibility. Bad Boy and Good Boy, but when a crisis comes they stick together.

The first thing Lionel did was to get John home, into a bath tub and into bed. Then he sent for a doctor, a nurse and Joe Rideaux, the trainer. And then I imagine, he told John simply and effectively and in the best Barrymore manner what he thought of him.

Well, you know that before John was completely on his feet, two things happened. He got an important job, that of Mercutio in "Romeo and Juliet," largely not only through the efforts of Lionel, but because Irving Thalberg believed in Lionel's assurances that John could make a come-back in pictures.

The second important thing was that Ariel and her Mama arrived in town. To Lionel and the people who were working to restore John to a semblance of his former self, this looked like a major catastrophe. But, reader, confidentially, it has been a surprise boon and a blessing! Ariel and Mama worked right along the lines laid down by Lionel; they, too, have been keeping Jack away from the hectic night spots, have urged him to watch his diet and rest carefully. These last few months in Hollywood, they have been a good influence in Barrymore's life!

And I wouldn't be surprised if Miss Barrie, now that she has achieved a nice film contract, will make a place for herself in pictures. John has always insisted that the young lady had great talent and anyone can see she has great ambition and will follow through to a goal.

As a matter of fact, there is no predicting how this romantic chapter in the life of Handsome Jack will turn out. Ariel has still an indubitable fascination for her Caliban and nothing can keep him from seeing her. There are those who predict that he will eventually marry Elaine. That Mama Barrie, with this in mind, has insisted on being Mrs. Grundy in

See if the Shade You Are Using Is Really the Right One for You!

By Lady Esther

You're pretty sure about the shade of face powder you use, aren't you? You're quite certain it's the right shade for you.

What would you say if you were to find out it was the wrong shade entirely for you? Don't be so sure that this isn't the case. As any artist or make-up expert will tell you, many women use the wrong shade of face powder entirely. The result is, they look years older than they really are.

The reason so many women use the wrong shade of face powder is that they select their shades on the wrong basis altogether. It's a mistake to select your shade of face powder according to your so-called "type." You are not a "type." You are an individual.

One Way and Only One!

There is only one way to tell your most becoming shade of face powder and that is to try on all five basic shades. Any other method is only theory and guess-work.

To make it simple and conclusive for you to ascertain your right shade of face powder, I have invented a game called: "Find Your Right Shade of Face Powder." It's as enlightening as it is fascinating. Here's all you need do: Just send me your name and address and by return mail I'll send you all five shades of my Lady Esther Face Powder, free of charge. Take the five shades and sit down before your mirror. Start with the shade you think least suited to you and try that on. But don't stop at any one shade. Go through all five and observe the effects in your mirror in each case.

You don't have to be any seer to recognize instantly that one of these five shades is more suited to you than any other. You will see immediately that one shade, more than any other, makes you look your youngest and most attractive. What that shade is, neither I nor anybody else, can tell you. You must see for yourself.

A Surprise May Be in Store for You!

Maybe the very shade you think least suited to you, the very one you would never think of using is actually your most becoming shade. Thousands of women have been amazed with the results of this test.

Decide today that you are not going to be in the dark any longer as to the shade of face powder you should use. Decide today that you are going to know once and for all which is your most becoming shade. Mail the coupon today and play the game that tells—my game of "face powder shades."

(You can paste this on a penny postcard.) (24)

a deep secret about Nelson

. . . which reveals the real reason for this star's over-night

By Faith Service

HERE IS an untold story of Nelson Eddy which there is no need to dramatize. The bare facts are rich enough to prove that men are, sometimes, like gods.

It's this: One of the major studios wanted Nelson Eddy for one of their outstanding musicals. And because they wanted him terribly, they offered him a king's ransom for two weeks of his time. His home studio agreed to the loaning of their star. They were, indeed, all for it, realizing the value and importance of the picture. Nelson loved the story and knew very well how many laurels it would add to the thick-foliaged crown he already wears. But—he had signed for his concert tour. In Spokane, Kansas City, Denver and in fifty other cities throughout the country, definite commitments had been made.

That would be easy, his associates argued. All he would have to do would be to pay a thousand here, two thousand there and the managers of the various local theatres would be handsomely reimbursed for their efforts. As for the public —they could have their tickets refunded at the box office and—Nelson would be free for the picture. And after the managers had been reimbursed, after subtracting what he would net from his concert tour from what he would make for his role on the screen, he would have an extra fortune in the bank. If he did not make the picture, but persisted in going on the tour, he would throw that fortune into the millstream of Quixoticism.

Learn why Nelson Eddy has won the hearts of millions.

NELSON'S mother alone refrained from comment, save to say that she wanted Nelson to do what he felt it right to do.

Nelson Eddy lost the money. He did not cancel his concert tour. He did not make the picture.

Why?

I knew the facts and I faced Nelson with them as we sat and talked in his dressing-room. I said, "That's a lot of money to throw away."

Nelson replied, "That would have been a lot of friends to throw away, too. We can do some mathematical calculations, if you like. It might come to about $1,500 the friend. I don't figure things that way. If I had cancelled my tour, people who had bought their tickets in good faith would have been let down. True, they could have got their money back, of course, but they, and I, would have lost something more precious than money.

"In one mid-Western city they are booked with a series of six concerts. They have used me as the key and people bought the series in order to catch my concert. They had to take a bigger house than the one originally planned for and are sold out. I take it that that means people want to see and hear me.

IT HAS been argued that these same people would just as soon see me and hear me in that motion picture. Perhaps. I haven't thought that aspect of the question through. Perhaps it is the still small voice of my natal New England which is doing my thinking for me. And anyway, I can't ask them all, individually, which or what they prefer. I only know that I committed myself to definite dates in certain cities and that people bought tickets with these committments in mind. They knew, most of them, that they were going to see me and hear me in 'Rose Marie.' They still bought the tickets. Radio fans know that they are going to hear me over the air every now and again. The tickets were sold. There is something about a personal appearance which still means more to many people than the appearance of a shadow on the screen or a voice over the ether.

"Many of the managers have, in the past, been very kind to me. I could have reimbursed them financially, true, and still come out ahead. But how could I reimburse the people? Think of the work alone it would have meant to them! Thousands of them trudging down to the various (Continued on page 105)

Premieres, parties and elephants! The prize Hollywood

Even with the Joan Blondell-Dick Powell romance rumors running rampant, it should be reported that Joan harbors no ill feelings toward her former spouse, George Barnes. When Joan's working, her daily routine includes morning coffee in her dressing-room for herself and all her pals. George, one of the ace cameramen at Joan's studio, is always on the guest list. Having coffee with one's former wife is probably a great convenience. She knows how many lumps you take.

The premiere of "The Great Ziegfeld," the first since Chaplin's "Modern Times," drew a hundred per cent turnout of the Hollywood lights, both Kleig and social. Some 10,000 citizens gathered 'round the entrance of the Carthay Circle to watch this favorite or that one step up to the lobby microphone to tell the audience just how much he or she was going to enjoy the picture. As an added touch, roses were given to each of the paying customers until the watching fans grew restless, stormed the flower department and walked away with the roses themselves. And in all the excitement Billie Burke, whom everyone was waiting to see, slipped in a side door completely unnoticed.

To top everything off, Bill Powell, the title role himself, didn't even show up at the premiere. It wasn't because he didn't want to—he simply couldn't make it. Seems Universal picked premiere night to start production on "My Man Godfrey," Bill's new picture. An exact report is that the Great Powell missed "The Great Ziegfeld" due to a pressing engagement in a setting marked "City Dump."

When you see "The Great Ziegfeld," a lot of you gals will want to know the identity of the handsome young gent in white tie and tails who "sang" "A Pretty Girl Is Like A Melody" (Allan Jones did the actual singing). The young man is Stanley Morner from Wisconsin, who studied opera for a number of years and is now under contract to Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. And he probably likes Henry Fonda and Mag Sullavan (she got the broken arm playing pranks) all set to broadcast with Margaret Hamilton. Uh huh, still romantic!

Clark Gable and his studio have just patched up a minor feud with both sides apparently victorious. There were rumors about that Clark was attempting to run the studio, while Mr. G. contended that just the opposite was the case. The battle was a short one, however, for both Gable and his studio are nice people. No shots fired, no lives lost, no hard feelings.

Nosey, Jean Harlow's favorite gentleman (he's a dachshund), is growing up. Here's the evidence: Nosey had a special door on Jean's dressing-room, it's six inches high, and when closed it kept him from wandering onto the set, and possibly from getting into pictures. While we visited Jean recently a carpenter arrived, took off the six-inch door and replaced it with one exactly a foot high. Personally, we don't think it was necessary. Nosey's much too smart a guy to want to leave the Harlow dressing-room.

Watched Kay Francis do a scene for "Angel of Mercy" a few weeks ago. Kay, playing Florence Nightingale, was being awfully solicitous to a group of crippled soldiers, all of whom were on crutches. We happened to be wearing a pair of crutches ourselves, although our injury was not from the wars, nor were we working in the picture. Anyway, Kay was so tender and kind to all these guys that we almost forgot ourselves and got in line with them. The scene was finally shot, and we were hobbling our weary way up the studio street when a fancy limousine swished by. In it was Kay Francis, through work for the day and entirely out of character, for she didn't even stop to give us a treatment. We have registered a protest with the Nurses' Union, the American Medical Association and the Red Cross.

Hearts and Flowers: Now that Carole Lombard spends her free evenings with a Mr. Gable of this city, her pal Fieldsie is being squired about by Addison Randall. The four of them had a swell time at the circus one night recently . . . Jimmie Stewart and Wendy Barrie have been casting favorable glances in the general direction of each other . . . Bob Taylor continues to be attentive to Barbara Stanwyck . . . and now that Jack Oakie has taken himself a bride, his mother wants to adopt another comedian.

Bob Burns, the Van Buren, Arkansas boy who made good on Bing Crosby's radio program, has just finished work on "Rhythm on the Range" with the same Mr. Crosby, and he's complaining. Bob signed up for the picture, he says, with the understanding that Bing was to handle all the romance. In the middle of the picture Bob found himself, much to his chagrin, forced to make love to a young lady. "It isn't that I mind kissing the girls," explains Mr. B. "It's just that it spoils my lip for bazooka playing."

Perhaps you didn't know that Marlene Dietrich, in addition to her other talents, is also the most beautiful mayor in the world. Marlene is Mayor of Allah City, and she rules a community of some 400 actors and technicians on location in the desert near Yuma, where they're making "Garden of Allah." Director Richard Boleslawski is chief of police, Basil Rathbone is sheriff, and Charles Boyer is "right hand man," whatever that is. Marlene turned out to be such a swell mayor that now she aspires to higher offices. How about Dietrich for president?

While we're on the subject of politics, it might be mentioned that Merle Oberon is a bit miffed because she isn't Mayor of Allah City. Merle demands a recount to the tune of $125,000, for she claims she was promised the lead in the picture. When it was handed to Dietrich, Miss Oberon is said to have suffered $125,000 worth of humiliation. Other reports have it that Merle originally turned down the part, then later decided that what was good enough for Dietrich was just about right for Oberon.

Gastronomic Note: In one evening—in fact, at one sitting—at the Trocadero Oyster Bar, Kay Francis and her gentleman friend, Delmer Daves, consumed 96 clams. There is no particular reason for recording this feat, except that 96 is a lot of clams.

Dick Powell's throat trouble must have been a lot more serious than his producers thought, for they were forced to take him out of "Cain and Mabel" in which he was scheduled to co-star with Marion Davies. With his singing voice in delicate condition, Dick may have to fall back on his acting for a while. There are those who say that would be quite a fall, and there are those who say 'twouldn't.

Last month we detailed a Pinkerton man, three movie detectives and S. S. Van Dine, in a heavy black beard, to discover the brand of perfume used by Mae West. Innocent bystanders had told us Mae's particular preference bore a heavy bouquet which drove men mad and drugged Miss West's immediate vicinity with the very richness of its presence. Four of our operatives, alas, never returned, but the fifth, a man with a wife and family, finally staggered in with a faint cry which must have been "Eureka." In other words, we have it on unimpeachable authority that Mae's choice is Sinless Passion.

The Most-Beautiful-Gesture-of-the-Month was that of Arline Judge and Wesley Ruggles, who, about to take up separate abodes on a certain Friday, suddenly remembered they had invited guests to dinner on the following Monday. They separated on Tuesday. Moral: the show must go on. Or, don't plan too far ahead.

You probably know that Carole Lombard spent $40 on a rattletrap car which she wrapped in red ribbon and presented to Clark Gable on Valentine's Day. It turned out to be a good investment, for Clark spent several hundred bucks getting the thing to move, and now guess who goes riding in it with him? Little Miss Lombard, of course. If she had known that in advance she'd have probably bought the guy a Packard.

More ornate than any of the scenery on Katharine Hepburn's "Mary of Scotland" set is a fancy portable dressing-room with peach satin upholstered walls. Everyone thought it was Hepburn's, until a little research developed that it belonged to Ginger Rogers. Ginger lent it to Florence Eldridge, whose "Queen Elizabeth" needed a setting slightly more regal than the ordinary dressing-room offers.

Hollywood night clubs are rapidly drawing most of the trade away from the Legion Stadium's Friday night fights. The bouts in the cover charge places are generally shorter, more exciting, and the talent is better. For instance, on one evening last month a Mr. Riskin socked a Mr. Ruskin. Mr. Riskin and Mr. Ruskin are both writers, and rumor has it that Mr. Ruskin went around telling people he was Mr. Riskin. The whole thing was sort of a gigantic typographical error, with Mr. Riskin victorious. If he fells Mr. Ruskin three times in a row he gets to be Mr. Riskin for keeps.

On the same fatal evening another one-round one-punch battle occurred, with Frank Woody, Helen Twelvetrees' estranged spouse, the winner. Seems Miss Twelvetrees was emerging from a night club with a Mr. Forest (no relation) when Mr. Woody stepped up and let him have it. If you were smart you could probably think up something screamingly funny about those three names, but if you're that smart you won't bother.

The price of home and fireside is high in Hollywood. Take the case of Frances Dee, for instance. She's happily married, as you know, to Joel McCrea. They have two children, two homes and a swell time together. She recently finished a picture, her first in quite a while, in which she worked for a salary not much more than half what she earned when she was single. Being married, according to the producers, takes away about fifty percent of a gal's glamor. Imagine looking at Frances and saying them words?

Last month we mentioned the fact that Joan Crawford, when she wasn't working, went in for two singing lessons a day. Joan is still serious about her music, and she harbors a desire to sing before an audience one day. Right now several of her friends say she has an excellent singing voice when she tries it out on people she knows, but before a crowd of strangers her throat muscles tighten and nothing happens. Nothing but fine old Crawford embarrassment.

Beautiful English Madeleine Carroll, here to make a picture, gets the rapt attention of Hollywood's chief beauer-of-beauts, George Brent.

Now that Carole Lombard and Bill Powell are making "My Man Godfrey" together at Universal, rumors are about that Carole may once more become Bill's off-screen leading lady. At the moment, though, there seems to be little foundation for the story. Carole and Bill remain pretty much interested in a Mr. Gable and a Miss Harlow, both of this city.

the Mayfair ball

The sociable cinematown crowd turns out for the Mayfair "shindig." This time Joan Bennett was the hostess and asked the gals to dress in prints. Remember when Carole Lombard was hostess everyone was supposed to dress in white and there was that tidbit of excitement over La Shearer's wearing red? Well, anna-hoo, this time Miss MacDonald was one of the hold-outs.

You know these two people whose real romance is stranger than the plots of their pictures

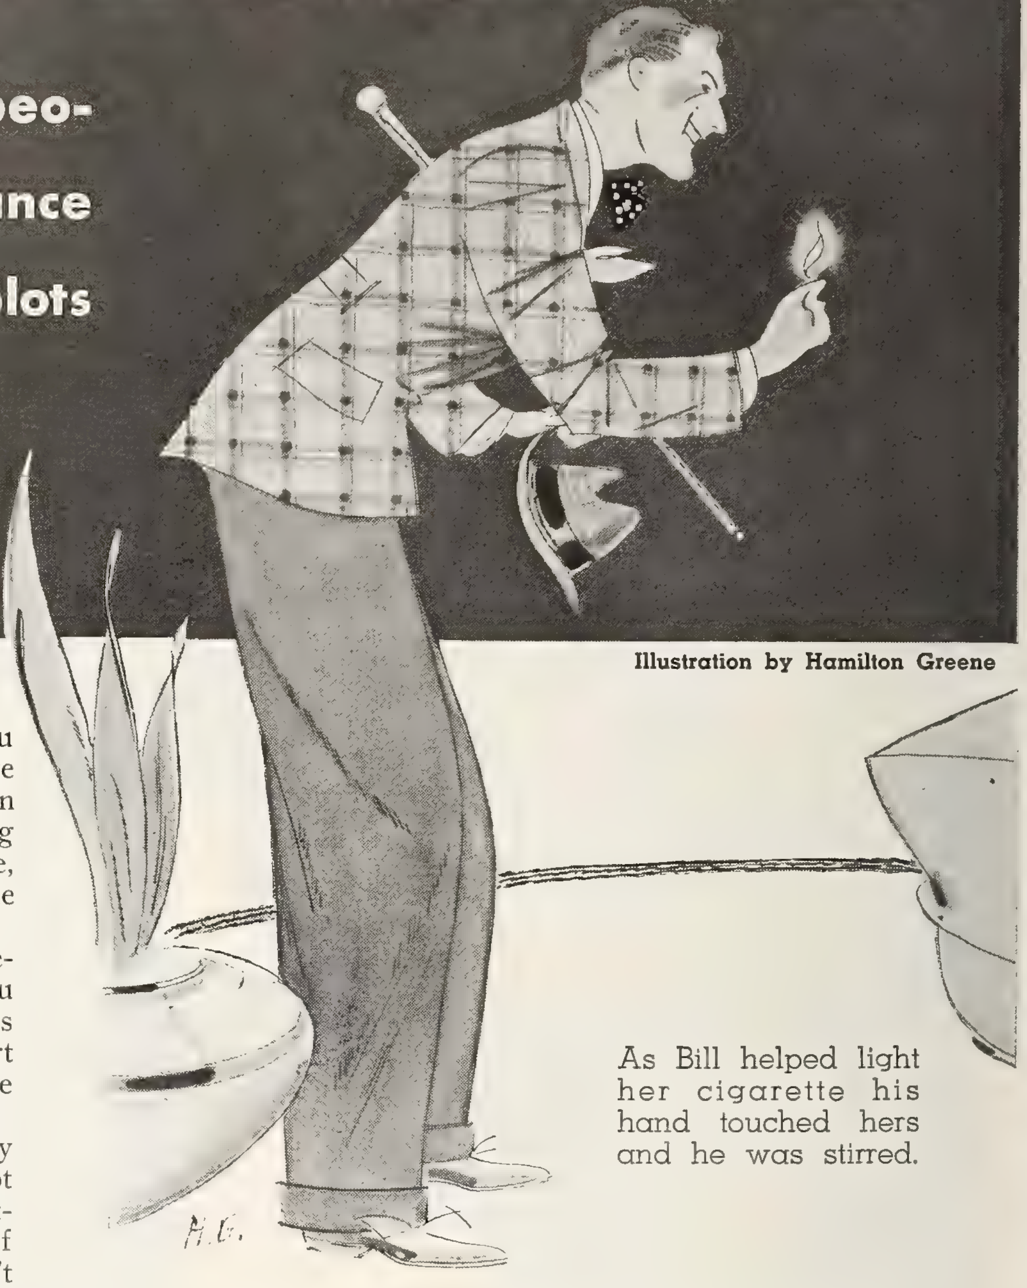

Illustration by Hamilton Greene

As Bill helped light her cigarette his hand touched hers and he was stirred.

IF I were to give you my true name, you wouldn't believe me. You wouldn't believe that the gay, carefree boy you've watched on the screen, the boy whose name goes up in big electric lights over your favorite picture house, hides heartbreak and sorrow behind his wide grin.

I'm supposed to be one of the screen's irresistible young lovers. Perhaps some of you even have said, watching me, "My but he's handsome! My, but his real life sweetheart must be proud of him!" If you have, then the joke is on me.

For the girl I loved in real life has calmly taken my heart and walked all over it. Not wantonly, perhaps, but cruelly and thoughtlessly just the same. She may do it again if I give her the chance. Perhaps you wouldn't believe that, either, for she looks so sweet and gentle on the screen.

Oh, yes, you've all seen her, too. She's a famous star herself. And her name isn't Mary Lee any more than mine is Bill White. But it's the story of Bill and Mary that I'm going to tell you, the years of it that have been hell and heaven and purgatory for me.

It all started four years ago in New York, when we were both nothing but stage-struck kids. In those days, no one had ever heard of either of us, except our own folks in our home towns, and the friends who'd rooted for us at high school plays. We hadn't even heard of one another.

That first season in New York was a pretty drab one for me. A cheap room in the theatrical boarding house. Cafeteria meals. Loneliness. Cooling my heels in managers' offices, day after day. Trying to persuade someone to give an eager boy with no professional training a part—any part—in any kind of play.

I was serving the apprenticeship all troupers must serve. I did get bit parts. But there was nothing glamorous about any of it. I just plodded along. Until, one day, Mary Lee walked into my life. Literally, she walked in. The door of a manager's waiting room opened for a slim blonde girl. From then on, in spite of the sorrow and the heartbreak her coming was to bring me, she seemed to banish drabness from my life forever.

Mary carried glamor with her wherever she went. It did not matter that she was a small-town girl whom no one knew. It did not matter that she did not yet have gorgeous clothes to set off her beauty. She stood out. She had the kind of sparkle that you couldn't have hidden even with a mother hubbard and flat heels.

She walked in and even the hard-boiled receptionist, who could spot newcomers and discourage them faster than anyone I'd ever seen, smiled at her. "Stick around, kid. Even if the boss won't see you today it won't hurt him any to give you the once-over as he goes out. That's the only way to get on in this business." It didn't seem credible. Later, I was to realize things always worked out like that for Mary. People saw her, were charmed, and somehow pushed her upward.

HOW COULD you resist her? When she smiled, it was as if all of youth were smiling at you. Her wide grey eyes seemed to deepen, her curved mouth parted slightly, as if she were hungry for life. As if her white teeth, healthy like a young puppy's, wanted to bite into life and learn its taste.

I thought, as I watched her push open the little railing gate by the receptionist's desk, "I'd give anything to have her smile like that just for me." But all I could do was sit and stare admiringly. After a while I managed, "Won't you have a cigarette?" And wanted to shout hosannas when she accepted one.

Then, as I bent forward to light it for her, our hands touched. A swift hot current seemed to flow from her to me. I remember how I caught my breath sharply, audibly. I tried to search her eyes. Had she felt it too?

If she had, she gave no sign. I guess she was used, even then, to the instant homage of men. She just said, "A cigarette helps, doesn't it? Thanks." Then, "A gentleman in a theatrical office is quite a novelty."

We laughed. I wished she would go on and on talking to me in that soft Southern voice that was like a caress. I thought of questions to ask her that wouldn't sound impertinent. In the end, though I couldn't really afford it, I was asking her to Sardi's to lunch.

She accepted. She said lightly, "I was just trying to decide whether to have lunch or buy a pair of hose. I guess that settles it." Which gives you a clue to many things about Mary. To her startling frankness. The way she never bothers to camouflage her reasons for doing things.

I must say this for Mary. In all the time I've known her she has never once lied to me about her feelings. Always, her attitude has been, "This is the way I am. Take me or leave me. But don't, for heaven's sake, accuse me of pretending!"

Oh, no, she never pretended! But how many times, in the months that followed, did her frankness wound and torture me! For, of course, I did take her out again. Many times. I pleaded for dates whenever she would see me.

And Mary gave me dates. When other plans fell through, when evenings she had kept open till the last minute remained empty, she would accept my invitations. She did not always keep them. How often that winter did I wait in the lobby of her hotel, an hour, two hours, only to discover that she had stood me up!

Sometimes I even saw her sail past me on the arm of another man! Perhaps you will say that my abject behavior warranted such treatment, that I invited it. But what else could I do? What stand could I take, I who had so little to offer this lovely girl?

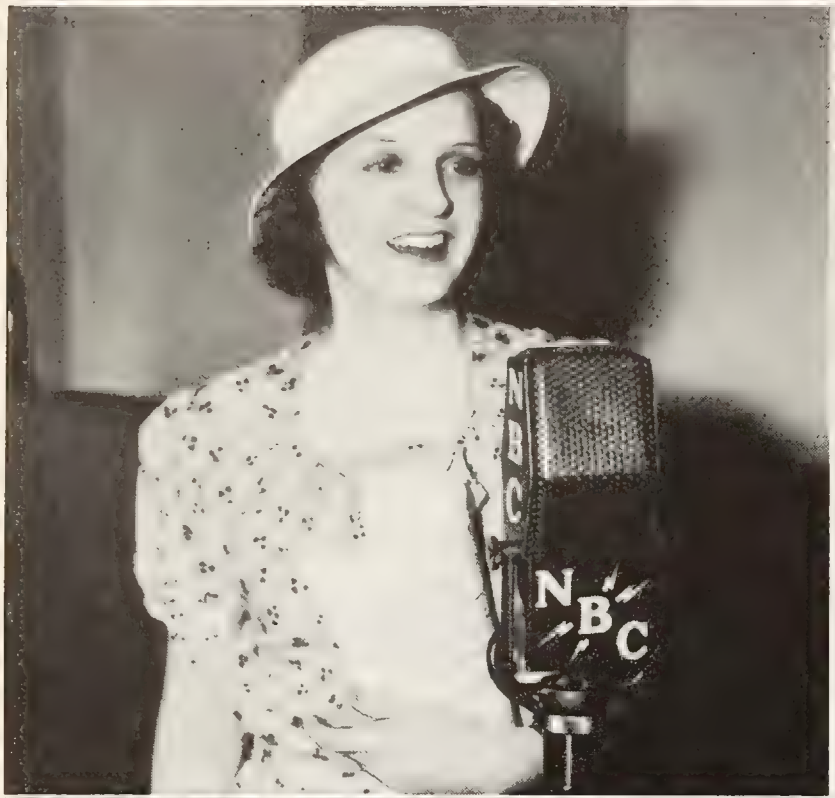
I knew that if I tried to raise a fuss, she would simply say, "Well, Bill, if you don't like it you know what you can do." I knew that to raise a fuss would mean to lose Mary altogether. And I loved her so much I couldn't bear to lose her.

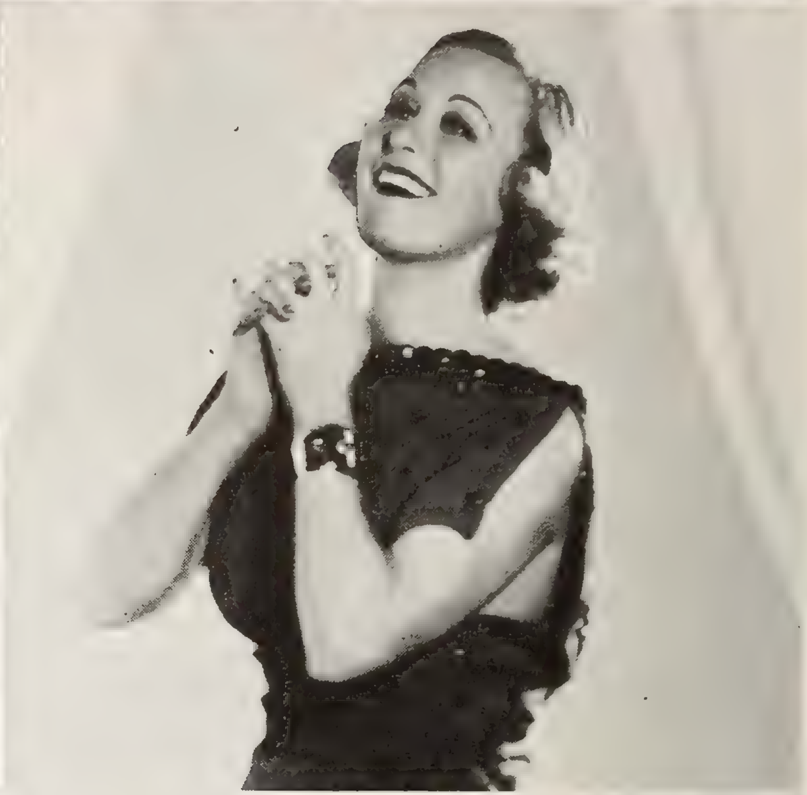
SO I was satisfied with crumbs. Oh, there were times when in my heart I rebelled. I made resolutions. I'd tell myself, "No man should put up with such treatment. Next time I see her I'll tell her we're through."

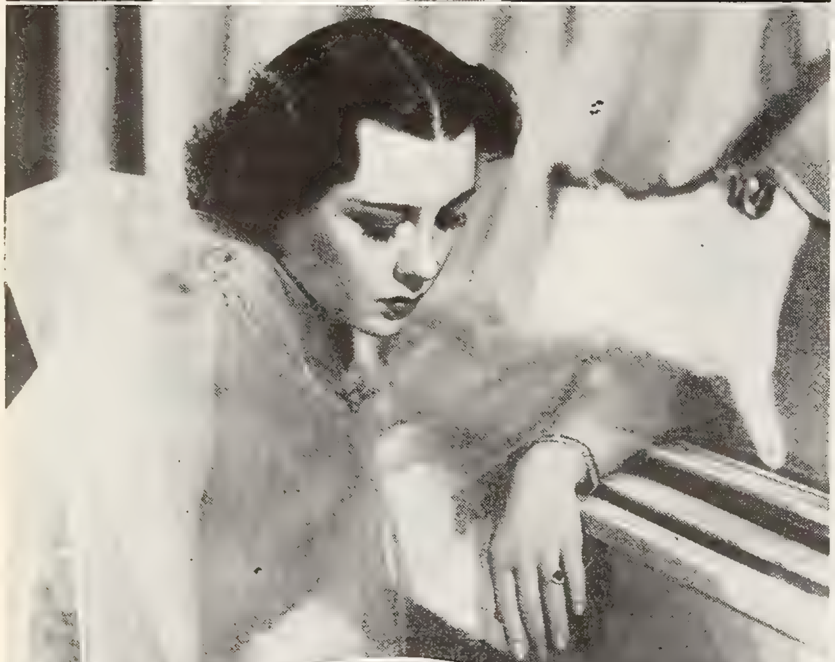
And for a while I really thought I meant it. I'd vow, I will get over this insane passion! Forget her. You could forget anything—anyone—in time. I'd bury myself in work. A man who wanted to get places had no time for women, anyway!

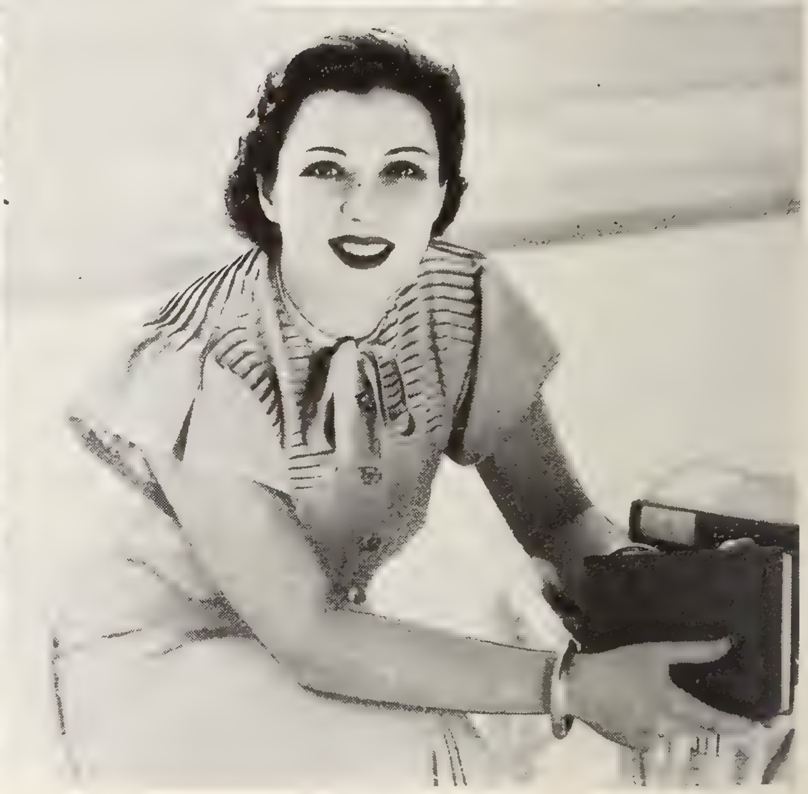
I told myself all this. And then I would see Mary. She would smile at me. She would put her cool slender fingers on my arm. She'd say, (Continued on page 106)

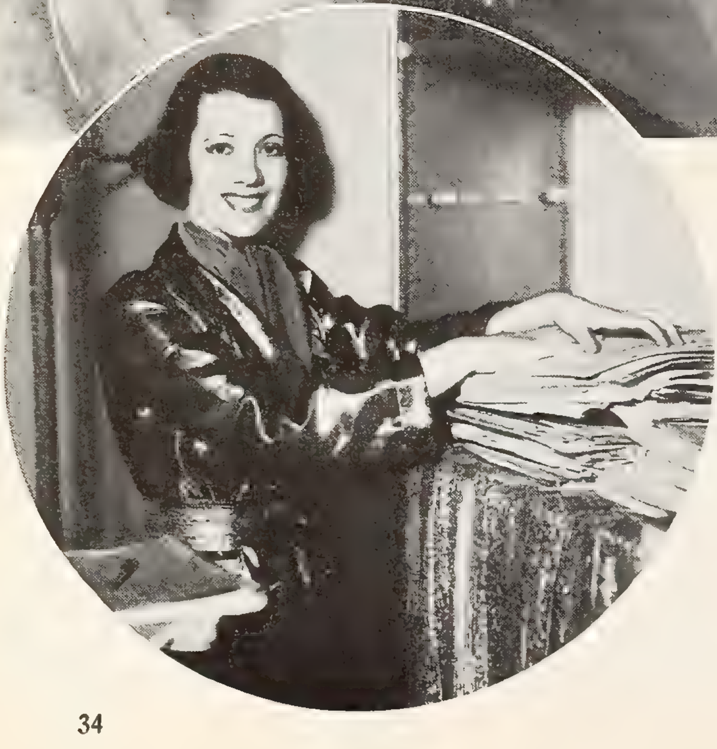
from 'met' to movies











The migration of opera songbirds to Hollywood still goes on, and there will soon have to be a society organized under some such name as "Sisters of the Met!" Five beautiful and talented former stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company are charter members.

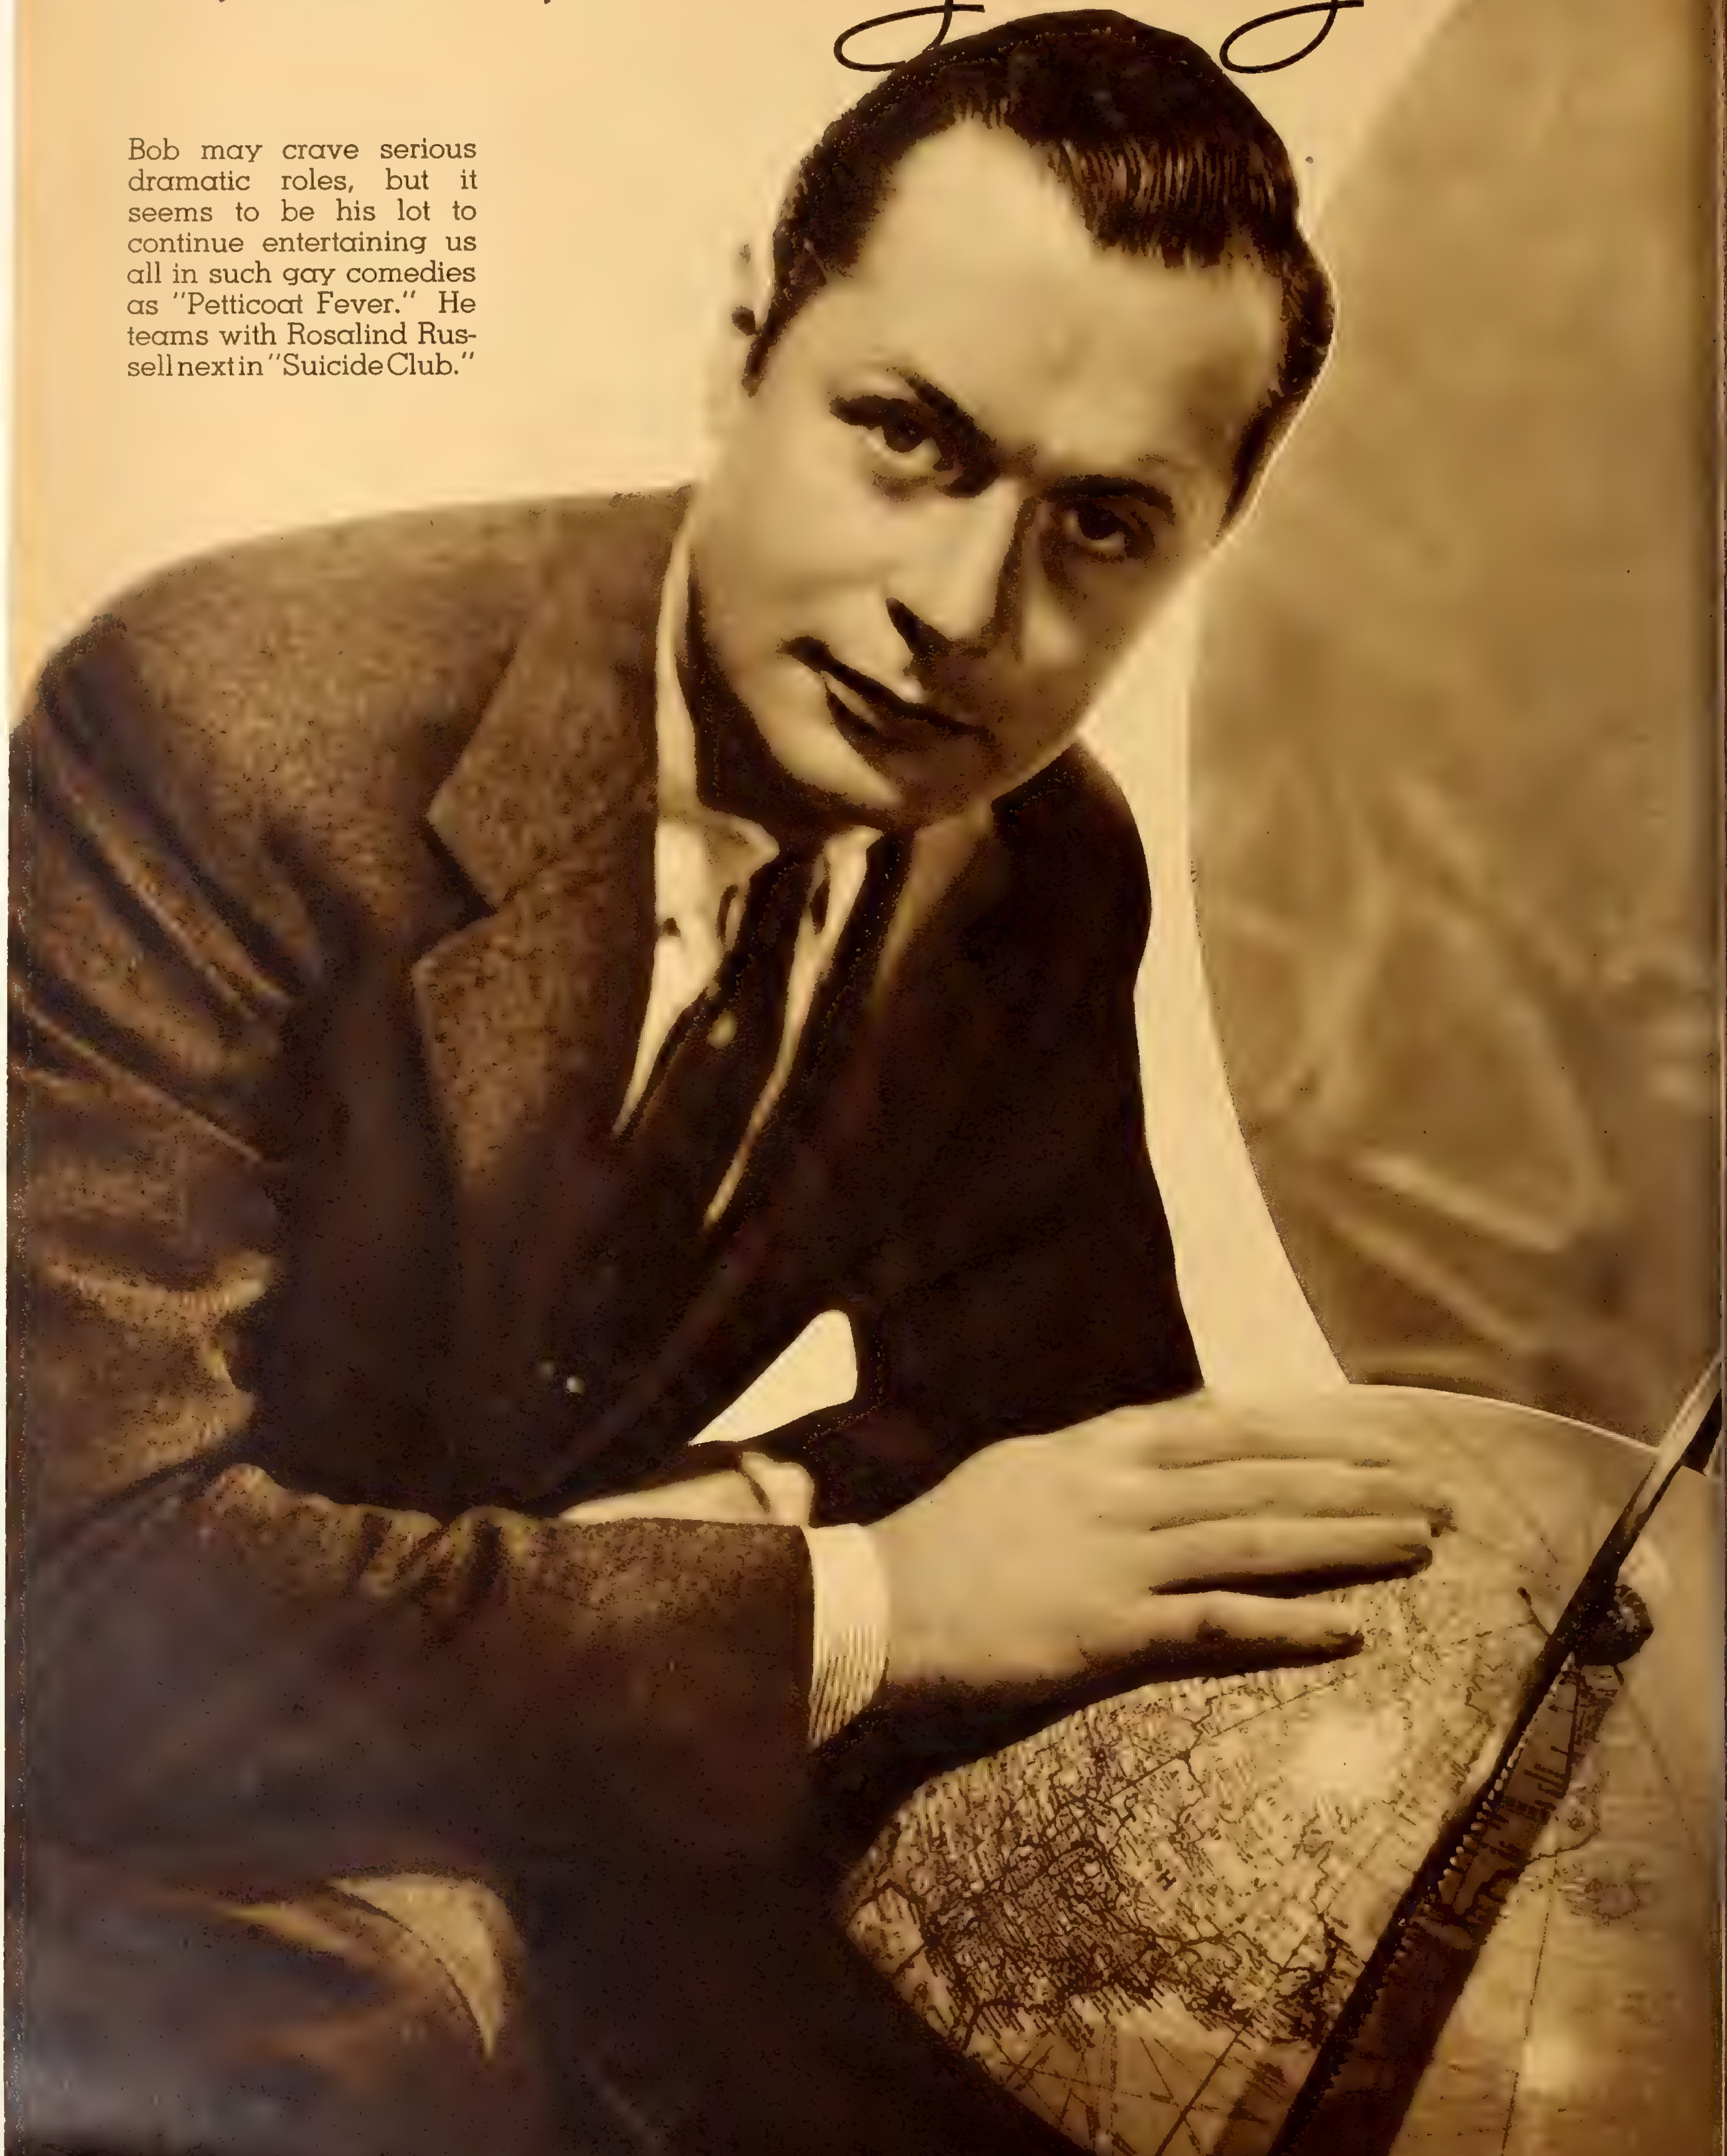
Reading from left to right, above, you see: Marion Talley, who has lost pounds to become the svelte screen type. The lovely Grace Moore has the advantage of beating the others to the screen and having her public all set when the rest were hardly getting their camera angles. Below Marion, comes exciting Gladys Swarthout, returning to the screen with high hopes, after a short absence. Next is Mary Ellis, who has had the poor movie luck of Gladys, but also is a fine actress and singer. And last, Lily Pons, petite and charming with more pictures waiting.

Loretta Young

Everyone is glad to have Loretta back again, looking so well and so radiant. "The Unguarded Hour" proved a happy come-back role for her and now she is busily involved with Bob Taylor in making "Private Number." On its completion, she will do "Ramona," an all-color production. The two spotted gents at her feet are special fans!

Bob Montgomery

Bob may crave serious dramatic roles, but it seems to be his lot to continue entertaining us all in such gay comedies as "Petticoat Fever." He teams with Rosalind Russell next in "Suicide Club."



Fred MacMurray AND Fay Wray

The genial Fred MacM. continues to be tops with his fans and the most sought after young gent by leading gals at his studio. He's doing "A Princess Comes Across" with Carole Lombard. As for Fay, after much junketing back and forth between Hollywood and England, she's landed here long enough to do "Roaming Lady," and sign a contract with Columbia

Johnny Downs, Paulette Goddard

Smiling Mr. Downs, now busy with "The First Baby," is one of Hollywood's promising young chaps. As for Paulette, Charlie Chaplin has big screen plans for her after her swell work in "Modern Times." Paulette, her mother and Charlie have just returned from the Far East.

lowdown on a Lady

Is Irene Dunne just a bit ritzy or merely very lonely —or is she the good scout her intimates claim?

By Dorothy Spensley

IRENE DUNNE has a secret fear. She also has a dimpled chin, light auburn hair, a passion for baked potatoes (why, we'll tell you later), tiny feet, a new Holmby Hills house with four bedrooms, no swimming pool, no tennis court, a weakness for sports clothes, plaid coats, a German shepherd dog (named Colonel) with a sense of humor.

Colonel shares his mistress' sense of humor. Dunne (her middle name is Marie, and we'll bet you didn't know that) will never forget that time in Paris, on her honeymoon, when she ordered "spaghetti with meat sauce." Garçon brought her spaghetti, all right, with mint sauce! These crazy Americans, he probably thought. "Mint sauce!" giggled Dunne, telling it. "They thought I said 'meent' sauce." And Dunne with all those foreign languages at her disposal.

You don't get through the Chicago Conservatory of Music, in the rigorous training that she took, nor St. Louis' Loretta Academy, without a coating of French, Spanish, and German. What good is voice training if you can't warble in at least four languages?

Another sample of the Dunne humor occurred when her publicity office, with heartfelt wishes, sent her a huge bouquet of flowers to commemorate her birthday. It arrived on July 18th. Her birthday falls on December 20th. Universal Studio's biography sets it at December 8th. The biographers had better get together on our heroine's natal day.

Anyway, her publicity office cornered her and she confessed that her birthday didn't fall on July 18th. They were apologetic. With those qualities of the gentlewoman that set her apart from most Hollywood actresses, Dunne told them the flowers were most suitable. She was soon celebrating a wedding anniversary (which one, she didn't say) and she would save the blossoms for it.

Irene Dunne is a lady, no mistaking it. There are so few bona fide ladies in the film profession that she stands out like a beacon. She has good birth in her favor. She is a Kentuckian, and you know the far-famed reputation of the Southern women. When society's Elsa Maxwell, casting around for another front-page story, named Dunne as one of the contemporary world's ten greatest ladies, she merely smiled her short-upper-lipped smile. It was equivalent to the street's "So what?"

"Don't you ever tire of being set forth as an example of ladyhood in Hollywood?" we asked, a little wistfully. That day, Dunne was wearing turf green, a soft woolen dress, a modified Homburg hat. It set off her exquisite coloring, her light auburn hair, gray eyes.

One of Irene's greatest joys has been the revival of her stage role in "Show Boat." Here she is with Allan Jones in the screen version.

"No," she answered, frankly. "There are a lot worse things than being considered a lady by Hollywood."

"What are they?" we countered.

"We won't go into that," she said with a grin.

DESPITE THE overwhelming handicap of being a lady in a town where personality, and not breeding, is of vital importance, Dunne has carved out a pretty niche for herself in films. She has made nineteen or twenty films since her arrival in Hollywood in fatal 1929. At least one-third of them have been box-office record-breakers. Irene's films are steady money-makers. There's something comforting to a studio in a star like that.

Dunne is a strange mixture of extreme femininity and business ability. Until a year ago she was her own business manager. She arranged her own contracts, consulted with producers, dashed about from studio to studio for executive conferences, rejected parts and accepted them. It's a seldom seen picture of Irene Dunne. She quit the role of off-screen business woman only when she realized that she was losing both time and energy in being what her friends told her was "terribly smart."

"It wasn't smartness. I was foolish. But I rather liked the novelty of being able to say that I arranged my own contracts and attended to my own business affairs," she said.

It probably was not only the novelty that appealed to her, but it was an expression of her independence and self-confidence, traits very strong in Irene Dunne, in an utterly feminine way. Besides, she was one of the few actresses in town who did handle (Continued on page 84)

how much money

The Dionnes are high-powered wage earners at two years, but they have responsibilities and expenses, even as you and I Left above, Emilie, Marie, Annette and Yvonne inspect a camera with Nurse Leroux. Cecile has her own fun at a distance! And below, the jolly quintet with Dr. Dafoe.

HOW MUCH money altogether have Yvonne, Annette, Cecile, Emilie and Marie—those dark-eyed Dionnelles whose quintuplet role in "The Country Doctor" netted them fifty thousand dollars?

Ten thousand apiece, yes, that's the sum each of these "get-rich-quick" diminutive beauties received. And for what? Rehearsing, acting, saying lines? Not at all. Simply for each being herself in a thirty-eight minute daily workout—a "playout" it was, really—over the very brief period of six days.

Ten thousand dollars for two hundred and twenty-eight minutes or three and four-fifths hours of playing, laughing, toddling, cutting quintuplet capers, pulling quintuplet antics—easy money that, wasn't it?

Very easy. But these incredible babies who, on May 28th, 1936, celebrated their second birthday, are used to making money easily.

So easily that today their collective fortune, entirely self-earned, has been variously estimated at from two to three hundred thousand dollars, a hundred and twenty thousand of which is said to be invested in Government bonds.

But supposing, conservatively, that the quints' fortune is two, and not three, hundred thousand. That would mean, wouldn't it, that each baby in her own right is worth forty thousand dollars? And forty thousand at six per cent interest—let's do a little more figuring—is two hundred dollars a month, isn't it? An income not to be sneezed at even by grown-ups who start from scratch to earn their own livings.

From their cradles, though, from their incu-

Quintish antics! Above, the five little rascals line up along the nursery wall. First comes Yvonne, a little weary of it all, then Annette with a rag doll, Emilie singing to a trumpet, Cecile with blocks and Marie bent in a courteous bow to the cameraman! bators rather, these amazing, premature babies born of parents who had been very hard hit by the depression, revealed themselves as potential earners as a quintuplet gold mine, if only death didn't claim them. And the struggle they had at first, with the physical odds all stacked against them! What chance had they, frailest of the frail, unless the "survival of the fittest" law could be made non-operable in their case? Only a ghost of a chance, certainly, since no other quints, of whom there was any record, ever had survived. So how could these just-barely-alive French-Canadian quintuplets achieve the impossible?

How? Everybody asked that question.

JUST THE same, the French-Canadian babies, who seem to have a way of springing surprises, aided and abetted by loving and scientific care, astounded a waiting and incredulous world by achieving the impossible. They lived and thus established a quintuplet precedent and made history.

All of which showed right then and there that Yvonne, Annette, Cecile, Emilie and Marie were evidently born to be different. Different from all other quints, even.

But while making quintuplet history and waging that incubator battle against the Grim Reaper, the fragile Dionne demoiselles did another thing.

They won for themselves an enormous and sympathetic public and actually laid the foundation for their fortune. For their public of men, women and children, who anxiously waited for newspaper bulletins and radio reports of the newest "world's wonder," soon wanted to see pictures of the little objects of their sympathy.

So quintuplet pictures there were. Pictures galore, bought and handsomely paid for, thanks to the business acumen of the little ones' guardians, by news and pictorial agencies which in turn sold them to papers, magazines and periodicals everywhere.

The world became quint-conscious and quint fans. Captivated by their bewitching quintuplet likenesses, the public clamored for more pictures and still more. Supply kept pace with demand. Money poured in and it soon became obvious that the "spotlight babies" about whom reams and reams were being written, had struck it rich.

AND THE syndicated pictures, which are still going strong, are only one source of the growing revenue.

Other important sources are, and these are not all-inclusive:

1. Advertising endorsements of certain foods on which the little two-year-olds have thrived and grown healthily and prettily plump, and of nursery supplies in the Dafoe Hospital, home of the babies.
2. Colored quint pictures, framed and unframed.
3. 1936 quintuplet calendars.
4. Quintuplet dolls, purchased by the hundreds of thousands for little girl "quint fans."
5. Newsreel motion picture contracts.
6. And last but far from least, the fifty-thousand-dollar contract for appearance in "The Country Doctor," the feature-length picture in which the starlets made such a hit that their public became even more adoring.

The rave notices the critics gave them, too! Which means, of course, that the quints will play many return engagements.

But getting back to money—since money does talk—how much will this constellation (Continued on page 70)

gene, marry ? well-

Raymond answers this much-asked question definitely

MARRIAGE is not for me—yet," said Gene Raymond. "Staying single is the easiest thing I do. The reason being that I want to stay single. It has been said that a man can have anything he wants if he wants it badly enough. Well, I want to stay single badly enough.

"Please," laughed Gene, "please don't get the idea that I'm having a terrible time dodging matrimony. It's not a case of S.R.O. or anything like that. I haven't had to erect any barriers or dig a moat around the old homestead in Beverly Hills. I haven't had to go into seclusion or wear a black beard in order to avert a trip up the smilaxed aisle. Staying single happens to be a passion with me and I haven't had to overcome any violent prejudices against it. Besides, I have defenses against the too-lovely ladies who might well prove devastating to the unarmed."

All of which sounds very discouraging for Dora Cupid. For there are only about three eligible bachelors in all the Hollywoods—Gene, Nelson Eddy, Dick Powell . . . And these three have to "do" all the Janet Gaynors, Jeanette MacDonalds, Betty Furnesses and others in town.

Gene is seen dining and dancing with Janet Gaynor now and again. He is at once reported to be engaged to her. Gene is seen here and there with Jeanette MacDonald. And the press dish up a romance between Gene and Jeanette. Wherever Gene is seen, whomsoever he is with, is good for at least two paragraphs in any man's column. The same is true of Nelson Eddy and Dick Powell. Nothing ever really happens. But you can't blame the press —the drought in bachelors being what it is.

AND IF Gene is to be believed nothing matrimonial will happen, so far as he is concerned, for some time to come. And I believe that he is to be believed. For this young man says what he means and means what he says. His youthful blondness is misleading, for when you sit and talk with him, face to face, you realize that his mouth can become a straight, rather grim line of determination. His blue eyes can become as hard as agates. There is nothing soft, nothing of the parlor esthete about this muscular young man who wants to play Sabatini roles. You have the feeling that while the female of the species may be more deadly than the male, few femmes can be as determined as this male.

"I started on the stage," Gene told me, as we lunched at the Vendome, "at the ripe old age of five. I attended the Children's Professional School. I was on the stage for keeps, because my mother had decided that I 'had talent' and because the stage was where I wanted to be.

not subject to change

By Franc Dillon

Luise Rainer's shy manner is a grand smoke screen

LUISE RAINER does exactly as she pleases: She isn't troubled with inhibitions, with wondering what people will say, or think, or do. She goes calmly about her business and without being selfish, without hurting anyone else, she gets her own way and manages to make everyone like it, which is art in a big way.

She has violated every rule of the game, as Hollywood plays it, by refusing to go to Hollywood parties or to give them. She is never seen in a Hollywood night club or on parade at an opening night. She has not changed one bit from the shy little Viennese star who arrived here a year ago, although during that time she has become a ranking motion picture favorite on the merits of her work in one picture, "Escapade." Since then she has been awarded two of the most sought after roles of the year—in "The Great Ziegfeld" and "Good Earth." She insists upon remaining a simple, natural person and I don't think any amount of success will ever change her.

"Why should I change?" she asks wonderingly. "I was a star when I came here. I'm no different."

Of course, it would never occur to Hollywood to think that to be a Max Reinhardt star in Europe is just as great an achievement as to be an American motion picture star in Hollywood.

When a new star comes to Hollywood, he or she is immediately put on trial by the newspaper and magazine writers, and it is an accepted fact that the publicity department of the studio is the barometer indicating the star's popularity. If the new star is willing to coöperate with the publicity department, grant interviews frequently and cheerfully, then she is sure to be popular.

But Luise had interview trouble from the very beginning. She emerged from sessions with writers a nervous wreck, on one occasion she stalked out of the room, leaving the writer behind and declaring she would not be asked any more stupid questions.

Ordinarily, when a star refuses to grant interviews to the press, it is just too bad. The star is said to have "gone high hat," to be temperamental and hard to handle. But not Luise. Her limited knowledge of English made it difficult to answer rapidly-fired questions. I became resigned to never seeing her off the screen.

Then, on the set where she was working in "The Good Earth," I "accidentally" met her. I was told if I made her feel comfortable, she might talk. Apparently I reminded her of an old shoe, for she talked.

Luise with Johnnie whom she declares is, "A Bill Powell among dogs"—and that's tops!

for her amazing independence and individuality

Walking across the studio lot with her was as exciting as a Sunday at Coney Island. She asked questions about everything from American politics to the newest dance steps.

Finding her such a friendly little person it was a temptation to interrupt her with some bright question, but the only interruptions in her steady flow of conversation were when she, without stopping for breath or turning her head, sang out in her guttural English: "Coom, Johnnie!"

JOHNNIE, her beady-eyed Scottie, who is her constant companion, followed her haphazardly at a distance of a hundred yards or so. Paying not the slightest attention to her repeated commands, he proceeded to gather the news from post to bush, risking his little neck a dozen times as he zigzagged across the street. He dodged the endless flow of studio traffic and eventually, arrived at Miss Rainer's destination with a look that said plainly enough: "Well, I got here, didn't I?"

Even on the set, where dogs are not allowed, Johnnie is always with his mistress and, although it is a rare occasion that he considers it important to obey her commands, he seems to realize that the sound stage is different. He never makes a sound.

Miss Rainer is a lone wolf among the other players at the studio, yet those who work with her, and her directors, swear by her. Her few friends are principally among the foreign writers, directors, musicians and artists. There is no visiting back and forth in dressing rooms between her and the other feminine stars at the studio.

She has never heard of that old maxim: "When in Rome, do as the Romans do." Her rule is: "When in Hollywood, or any place else, just be Rainer." She doesn't object to Hollywood, she ignores it, and lives in a little world of her own—in Hollywood but not of it.

Because they are truthful and natural and do not try to flatter her, she prefers dogs and children to the picture crowd. Recently, she heard of a party being given by a friend for her small boy and she asked if she might attend. Of all the children, Luise had the best time. She entered into the spirit of the games and when they needed a donkey so they could play the game of pinning on its tail, she offered to draw one for them.

"We can't tell which end to (Continued on page 75)

Above, Dick and Marion Davies in costume for "Hearts Divided."

Below, Powell denies he'll marry soon, but he escorts Joan Blondell everywhere.

. . close-up of

I USED to dislike Dick Powell. It wasn't just that I lacked admiration for his acting, and thought him stuffy and shallow and sort of namby-pamby. I disliked him violently. I thought that he was cocky, flippant, insufferably conceited.

But that was before I knew Dick as a personality, as a friend, as a human being. That was before I knew his seeming conceit masked a painful self-consciousness—before I knew the real Dick Powell, you see.

And because I want you to know the real Dick Powell, I'm going to tell you about the incident of my "conversion," as one might call it . . . of how Dick Powell, in one gesture, removed my stubborn prejudices.

It was backstage one Friday evening after a broadcast. Despite my acquaintance with the members of the dramatic cast and orchestra, I was, after all, a non-performer, and I felt as out of place and unwelcome as an autograph hound. I retired to the darkest corner of the stage to remain out of the way until the producer, my host, should be ready to depart for dinner.

Suddenly, a tall figure stood before me and an outstretched arm proffered a drink. The tall figure began to talk, and it talked on and on, but I didn't hear a word. I was too grateful for the company and the loss of my silly sense of conspicuousness to hear a word of Dick Powell's chatting—and too busy wondering at a "conceited" person's doing a thing like that, noticing an insignificant girl's loneliness, being gracious and hospitable. And then I realized that I had misjudged Dick Powell and he wasn't snooty or conceited at all. I decided that he must have suffered loneliness and self-consciousness in his life, too, else he would not have noticed another person's discomfort.

That sort of incident isn't considered news. It has no publicity value. No editor would consider it a story. It isn't dramatic, nor sensational. It wasn't a difficult feat—merely carrying a drink across a stage to a stranger. But it told a lot about the fellow who did it. And it turned my dislike into gratitude.

Since that Friday evening, I've found out lots of things about Dick Powell—from his secretary, from his voice teacher, from the cast and staff of the radio program, from executives and stage hands on the Warner Brothers' lot—and though none of those things may be termed sensational, they're mighty human little anecdotes, and they reveal their subject to be what every showman hopes to be—"regular."

FOR INSTANCE, there's the way he treats his employees. Look at Elmer, his Swedish butler. Elmer wears a perpetual grin, and when I presumed to ask the reason one day, he replied:

"Und vy not—in a house vere dere's alvays much moosic and laughing and no bawlings out?"

And look at his hospitality. I remember one Sunday, when his house was swarming with guests, the mother of one of his carpenters dropped in with a cake of her own baking. She started to retreat shyly, but Dick insisted on presenting his celebrated guests to her, escorting her from one group to another, his arm about her waist, and her son's praises on his lips.

Or watch him on his way to the set in the mornings. Dick is probably the most popular fellow at the studio; he's certainly the most "hello'd" should a woman tell her past?

Dick and Joan Blondell will team up on the screen, too, in "Stage Struck."

By Katherine Albert

LIKE a lot of swell things that happen, the way I got this story was an accident. And Gertrude Michael was sort of anxious that I explain about it, because she doesn't want you to get the idea that she sets herself up as a prophetess or a feminine "Voice of Experience" with a Southern accent.

She probably could be both of these things because, down in Talladega, Alabama, where she was born, she used to preach sermons from the pulpit of the church. Little Gertrude, at the age of fourteen, all done up in flowing white chiffon and with an angelic smile, would pinch hit for the minister, when he was on his vacation. Everyone said she was a whizz.

But that's beside the point because Gertrude and I were talking about fan mail. She casually mentioned that, since she plays the worldly, sophisticated, take-life-in-your-hands-and-wring-it-dry sort of woman on the screen, girls are begging her to solve their emotional problems.

She commented on the fact that people often confuse the real personality of a player with her screen characterizations. So women seem to feel that, because she is invariably the "other woman" on the screen, she must be the "other woman" in real life.

"I honestly wish," she told me, "that I had time to sit down and answer every letter. I think that would be grand."

I asked her what the most persistent question was.

"I get a variety of questions," Gertrude went on, "but the problem that seems to trouble the greatest number of girls is that ancient one, 'Should a woman tell her past?' You know what it means—when a girl really falls in love and is going to marry, yet there have been other men in her life—so she wants to know if she should be utterly honest with her future husband or let him think he's the first man she's ever loved.

IT WAS then I had the idea of letting her answer that question for everybody right here, not only for the girls who write to her but to all the girls who are confronted with that problem now or will be, perhaps, one day.

So Gertrude, who is one of the most regular, most honest and really swellest gals in Hollywood, pushed her mop of light brown hair off her forehead and settled down into the corner of her big divan before the fire.

"It's a subject on which I do have opinions, a subject about which I feel very keenly." She has a natural, lush sort of enthusiasm that takes your breath away.

"I don't know," she went on, "I may be all wrong, but it certainly seems to me that, if you can't be honest with a man, you shouldn't marry him. If you don't feel, after you've known him for a while, that there's nothing he wouldn't understand, that he wouldn't forgive every mistake you've ever made and that he wouldn't trust you—then, really, is he worthy of your love?

"It's hard for a woman to lay her heart wide open to the man she loves. It's much easier, right at the beginning, not to tell, because the telling is so difficult, because it takes so much courage.

"But difficult as it is—tell him everything. Nothing built on a lie is good. And not telling is just as much a lie as actually inventing a fabrication. It's a tough assignment, but it will make life so much easier later on.

"Here's how it works—both ways. If you are not perfectly honest, if you just let things slide along, it may seem as if you are getting along fine and everything is okay. Then an old beau happens to be passing through your town. Maybe out of curiosity to see what sort of man you've married, maybe out of spite or maybe just to make a friendly gesture, he rings you up and wants to drop around to see you and your new husband.

"Well, how are you going to explain that? You can toss it off with, 'An old friend, dear.' But if it's as casual as all that, how come you haven't mentioned his name before? And when he does arrive, aren't you going to be most unnatural? Aren't you going to be terribly afraid that he'll say some innocent thing to give your husband a more intimate picture than just the words 'an old friend' paint?

"So immediately you've built up a situation which is going to be difficult to clear up after he's gone. You've started something that may wreck all the happiness you thought you had.

"If you aren't honest, you live in fear every minute. An enemy of yours may feel it her 'duty' to gossip about you. That puts your husband in an ambiguous sort of position. What is he to say? He can stop the gossip by showing her that you and he have a perfect understanding.

Rosalind Russell stays free of all but the most casual friendships, so marriage seems a long way off.

THE LONELY ladies of Hollywood! The lovely lonely ladies of Hollywood—wealthy and famous, alluring and glamorous, garbed in exquisite creations and costly tailoring, decked with jewels and wrapped in furs. Their homes built from custom-made blueprints, the furnishings bearing the expensive touch of the interior decorator, the very food they eat prepared by superior culinary artists from hand-picked groceries. So many of these ladies are living mateless and alone—childless, loveless, spinster lives. Or else they are wasting their emotional substance on flirtations with this man and that, on gossiped-about intrigues with Mr. Doaks and Mr. Who'sthis, and nothing ever comes of it except more gossip, until people begin to say, "She's not so young as she used to be. She'd better make up her mind."

Perhaps you say, "So what? They've got everything else. If they remain single, it must be from choice." Perhaps you're right. But, as a one-time happy, one-time warrior puts it, "Let's look at the records."

The Hollywood old maid is different from the stock old maid of fiction and the familiar character in the joke books who is always looking under the bed for her man. As stated before, the Hollywood old maid is beautiful and desirable in every way. And, furthermore, she may have been married at one time and been divorced, for the Hollywood girl often gets married as casually as the small town girl gets engaged. There's a rush of young love to the heart, the moon is very yellow and there's music somewhere in the distance, and the small town girl accepts the young man's proposal, his ring or his fraternity pin, and they're engaged for a week, when they quarrel and break it off. The Hollywood girl also succumbs to the sweet intoxication of the moon and the music, only she runs off to Yuma or somewhere and marries her beau. And in a week—or a month or less than a year—they, too, have a fight, but they must get a divorce. Certainly not as simple as giving back a frat pin and not as harmless a way of getting through emotional growing pains, but that's Hollywood.

Heading the list of Hollywood spinsters is Greta Garbo, who hasn't even one divorce to (Continued on page 78)

Below, Josephine and Pat O'Brien in "I Married a Doctor." Right, Anita Louise, James Townsend, Jo's husband, and the star, herself.

UNLIKE THE literarily famous Lorelei Lee, Fate didn't keep on happening to Josephine Hutchinson. Josephine took that gentleman by the collar and gently but firmly shoved him in the general direction for which she was headed. For, though this little lady is distinctly of the dainty, ultra-feminine type, her fragility definitely ends with her body. The Hutchinson mind is something else again—something determined to "get there" no matter how rocky the road or thorny the path.

While Miss Hutchinson was not literally born in a theatre trunk, her cradle was soon parked in a dressing-room. Several of them for that matter, in rapid succession, her temporary tenancy wholly depending upon the successful or otherwise at-the-moment theatrical engagement of her mother. Jo's mother is Leona Roberts and your mother, if she's been a theatre-goer for the last twenty years, is going to know her well.

"It's those early days," declares the late graduate of New York's Civic Repertory Theatre, "or rather the tender references to them, that makes me smile. Why they are constantly referred to as the 'good old days' is, to me, one of the major mysteries. Gas-lit dressing-rooms, dank theatres, salary merely the optimistic speculation of a player—well, I could go on! Isn't it strange how present day stars love to crawl into an armchair and reminisce about 'em? It's the distance that blurs the disappointments and summons a rosy glow."

Miss H. is red-headed and fragile looking — but what determination!

Josephine Hutchinson looks the fragile softie, but in reality—well, you'll be surprised!

a mind of her own

BY CAROLINE S. HOYT

And so, Miss Hutchinson, who made her greatest stage strides in "Peter Pan" and "Alice in Wonderland," isn't living in any world of fantasy after the curtain goes down. She is far too practical for that. Her career was cut out for her and her mother designed the pattern, years ago when she was six. She went to dancing school and studied music, not in the mode of other little girls, but as a definite stepping stone to a later theatrical career. She wasn't asked if she wanted to become an actress. She was told that she would be one. And it's fortunate that acting is the thing she would rather do than anything else in the world. If it were not, our guess is that when she became old enough to protest, she'd have cried out in favor of bookkeeping or manicuring or anything else that struck her fancy or ambition.

"Even the money evolved from movie-making," she says, "does not interest me particularly. I say 'even the money' because that to many people means a great deal. Have you ever noticed that some stars say that when they reach a certain monetary mark, they'll stop and do the things they really want to do? Well, when they reach that goal, they just sort of raise the ante and keep going. I'm going to make myself the exception that proves this rule. When I reach my goal—and it isn't a large one—I'm going to stop. I'll never stop acting, of course. I couldn't be happy without work, for I've always worked, but I'm going to do the plays I like and try to write a little and have the most marvelous garden in the world—I know that may sound a bit on the saccharine side—but I am mad about flowers—and well just sorta live in general."

PERHAPS Josephine Hutchinson will actually stick to her resolution, for she is the girl with the four-picture-a-year contract. She would rather let the public see too little of her than too much. She realizes how easily we humans may become sated even with our idols. You've heard about the fickleness that Fame courts? So have we. So has Miss Hutchinson, and she has given the rumor an awful lot of serious thought.

Her "little girl" look is strongly belied by an almost masculine point of view. Her thinking is clear cut. There is nothing of the emotionally hysterical about her. She arrives at a decision after mentally debating both sides of the question, but when her mind is finally made up, she and the Rock of Gibraltar have at least one thing in common. Firmness.

Josephine doesn't go around calling the movies a fool-proof game. She knows what the producer is up against, what the director is forced to "take," how hard life can be for an agent. In fact, she has a thorough groundwork in the business as well as artistic end of acting.

"Jimmy Townsend's my husband. You knew that?" she asked. "He is one of the best players' representatives in the business and I occasionally hear of some of the ups and downs along that line from (Continued on page 77)

Believe it or not, the age of chivalry is still upon us—with

A FORLORN young man in evening dress, hat parked back over hair that was straggling into his eyes, sat on a cracker box at the draftiest end of a Columbia Studio set. Outside was a steady drench of cold rain; inside, a pouring down of fog that smelled like rosin and choked just enough to remind one of the real McCoy, London version. It was ten o'clock on a dismal Saturday morning.

When asked what he was doing there, he took off his hat, scratched his head—you've seen the identical gesture dozens of times in his pictures—and murmured half under his breath, "I'm hanging around to see how they make pictures."

He was being sly, but his jesting words were unconsciously reminiscent. Exactly ten years ago, that same young man had hung around Hollywood for months with the forlorn hope that his presence might some day be noticed. But he hadn't even had a tumble from Central Casting. One drizzly noon, he walked disconsolately down Sunset Boulevard, and having no better place to stop for his lunch, ate it behind a billboard very near the set where he was now playing the title role in "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town." A battered paper bag held the lunch—one solitary and generously rain-moistened bun!

"And what are you doing here?" asked this forlorn-looking young man, eyeing my notebook with suspicion.

"I've come to talk to you," I ventured not too hopefully, recalling that he was reputed to be long on silence and short on interviews!

"That's a tough assignment," he answered cautiously as we walked down the street and hesitated under a street lamp.

LET'S SEE," he said and hooked his finger around his nose, another gesture you're bound to recognize, "when a man meets a strange woman under a street lamp at ten in the morning, what does he talk about?" He looked down at his starched evening shirt front, somewhat abashed.

"Two studs missing," he sighed. "That's what always happens when 'Cracker' isn't around to find them for me." Cracker Henderson is Gary's indispensable "Man Friday."

"I mean," he corrected, "that's what usually happens when a man finds himself in evening clothes at this hour of the morning. Well?" He looked appealingly.

"I'm a damsel in distress," I ventured, once again recalling that Longfellow Deeds, the small-town millionaire whom Gary was impersonating, had a complex about rescuing damsels in distress. And Gary had mentioned to someone that this screen character came closer to resembling his own than any other role he had ever played.

"A maiden in distress?" he repeated. Gary hesitated. "Let's have lunch," he countered. And five minutes later we were having it at a wall table.

Gary ordered chicken wings creole. "Because," he remarked ruefully, "they'll probably have a good time flying around the ball of sulphur fog that's lying in state at the top of my stomach.

"Every time I hear the phrase, 'a maiden in distress,' it recalls an incident in my childhood. It's a story I've never told before. Can you bear it?" Gary grinned.

IT HAPPENED in my 'way back' school days in Helena, Montana. The girls' gym class was having an exhibition. You know, something between Swedish dumbell swinging and a Busby Berkeley routine. It was a big event. The whole school and all the fond parents were invited. The girls wore black balloon bloomers that ended below their (Continued on page 74)

in the bad old summer

WELL, CHILDREN, you have been working with Mama for a little over a year now. I've received letters from many of you, telling me that you are accomplishing, or have accomplished, results. Some of you have taken off the desired number of extra pounds. Others have worked off the spare tires, the pincushions on the hips, the extra chins. Many of you too-thin girls have built yourselves up to firm, rounded loveliness. And I'm tickled to death about it all.

But . . . heheheh! You just knew there was a "but" coming, didn't you? But—now comes that season of the year when a disease called "let-down-itis" attacks us all. The purpose of this article is to tell you how to keep from catching that disease and to prevent you from undoing all the good work you've accomplished.

Out in Hollywood, the land of sunshine and beautiful blondes, business has always boomed in the fall. Why? Because all the little cuties come a-running to me with such wails as: "Look at the weight I've put on! And I've been swimming every day, too." Or, "My skin is terrible—and my hair, oh!" The ones who had the sad tendency to put on weight would be fatter and vice versa.

It's the same all over the land. There are nice things about summer, like vacations and moonlight nights and the new man you meet at the country club. But when the thermometer goes up, the will power goes down and there are, besides, a hundred and one pitfalls which summer puts in the way of health and beauty.

WHERE ARE you going to be this summer? What are you going to be doing? Staying home, except for a month, maybe, at the beach or some other vacation spot? Travelling about? Visiting? Or must you work in an office, with only the allotted two weeks' vacation? You'll all have your problems, according to your hot weather plans. Decide upon a sensible routine to follow, as to diet and exercise, and stick to it as faithfully as possible. I know that, if you're visiting, you can't upset the household with demands for this and that. But, if you're trying to lose weight, you can avoid sauces and olive oil dressings and pass up the gooey desserts, can't you? If you are taking an automobile trip, it may be hard to find a meal that would win Sylvia's okay, but you can avoid foods which are wrong for you; you can buy fresh fruit and eat that; you can order soup and a salad rather than some mixed-up mess that looks so fetching on the bill of fare.

That's rule number one: eat regularly and as sanely as you can. Rule number two: keep up your exercises. Swimming and other sports are loads of fun, but they are not substitutes for corrective exercises.

And here are a few things which I most certainly do not want you to do:

1. Don't fall into the common idea that haphazard sandwiches, washed down with too much cold liquid, are sufficient for summer lunches. Don't go without any lunch at all—that's worse. If you're reducing and obeying my orders—one liquid meal a day—lunch is a fine time to take that liquid nourishment. A bowl of soup, without crackers, please, if you're "thinning." A large beaker of tomato juice. Further along in this article, I'm giving you some hints about summer dishes which are delicious to eat, simple to prepare and darn good for you.

2. Avoid the alleged thirst-quenchers — beer, the various "ades," the soda pop and such. Once in a while, when social necessity makes it more pleasant to go in for these things, it's all right. But don't make a habit of them. If you want a cooling, thirst-quenching drink which isn't fattening, which won't insult your innards and make you swell up like a poisoned pup, try this: fill a tall glass with cracked ice, pour in a cup full of fresh raspberry juice, add the juice of half a lemon, stir thoroughly, and sip slowly. This really does relieve thirst, and is a "pep-er-up-er."

3. Beware of alcoholic stimulants. Of course, if you're reducing, they're out entirely. The rest of you, use your gumption in this matter. People have a notion that "a long tall drink" is just the thing on a hot summer day. Where the idea started that any kind of alcoholic drink could possibly be cooling, I don't know. Alcoholic drinks are, in one brief, dignified (Continued on page 96)

it's not an act

By Ruth Rankin

A new portrait of Lederer as he appears in "One Rainy Afternoon."

Francis Lederer's case is unusual, which is why he is misunderstood in a town that demands the unusual

FRANCIS LEDERER is truly a surprising young man. Latins, especially Latin actors, are supposed to be dreamy, velvet-eyed, patent-haired romantics with a guitar concealed somewhere about their persons. Isn't that the idea you had? When they run close to the American standard, they add perfume by the gallon and practically every moment in their life is a build-up for the big boudoir scene.

Well, Lederer's native Czecho-Slovakia is certainly a Latin country, but he is not like that at all. He makes you think of the Irish, honestly. Maybe there was an Irish invasion of Czecho-Slovakia years and years ago—haven't time to look it up. If there wasn't, I hope they don't sue. Anyway, Francis (bet nobody ever called him Frankie to his face) is a lot like Jimmy Cagney! All right, all right, now wait a minute. I don't mean they look alike. I mean they are alike in thought and action. They have a remarkable quality in common. The quality is altruism.

The altruistic trait is, unfortunately, not the dominant trait actuating Hollywood. A regard for, and an unselfish devotion to the interests of others does not greet you on every corner, any more than it does in other towns. So when you run into it, the collision is apt to be distinctly memorable.

The idea is so new in our little village where everyone is insulated snugly in the cocoon of his own personal career, that it is even regarded with a tinge of suspicion! "What's the matter with the guy? World Peace and all that stuff? What business is it of his?"

To talk three hours with a celebrated actor, matinee idol and picture charmer, who is so concerned with the welfare of the rest of the world that he doesn't even put in a plug for his next picture, is a very startling experience. That, alone, would make him the Hollywood enigma-man. The name of the picture, by the way, is "One Rainy Afternoon," but he didn't tell me. Those things just get around.

HOLLYWOOD has found him "strange" because he doesn't conform. If you have a weakness for non-conformists, you ought to be crazy about Lederer. And you'll find yourself in a large company. As the world gets farther and farther away from the acceptance of ready-made opinion, the more it warms to the Lederers—and the Cagneys.

Lederer doesn't dart around in a pair of dark glasses and a self-conscious stride. Francis saunters down the street as if he lived in the place and liked it, and wanted to know what was going on in it and what people think. He stops at the corner and converses with a newsboy. Dropping in a soda fountain, he discusses things with the attendant. Up the street, he finds an old man or woman sunning on a bench. He sits down and draws them into a conversation. He has an open mind; he wants to know what people think and he likes to exchange ideas with them. Actors, as a class, generally do all their exchanging among each other. The man who goes outside the charmed circle to get a new idea now and then is, naturally, the conspicuous departure from the rule.

luck smiles on ann

By Karen Hollis

WE CLIMBED into a taxi and there on the floor was a bright, new penny.

"Take it," said Ann Sothern. "It will bring you luck."

"But don't you want luck?" I asked aghast.

"Don't you think I have had enough for a while?"

And before I could hoot at her sly trick of answering a question with a question, she added quite earnestly, "Give me time to outgrow the opportunities I have already. When I need luck again, if I need it again, you can hand over the lucky piece."

I recalled then the remark she had made so positively a few minutes before as we were leaving the matinee where we had seen Helen Hayes in "Victoria Regina."

"She gets great parts to play because everyone recognizes that she is capable of playing them. It wouldn't be good for any other actress to be given that part. It would be a calamity. Anyone with less skill, understanding, and experience than Helen Hayes would have played Victoria just as a domineering, disagreeable, plain old woman. But Hayes carried you right along with her—she made you feel that the course Victoria was taking was the only one she could take. And you can't fail to be moved by a person you know as well as Hayes makes you know Victoria."

And that, incidentally, is one of the few times I have heard Ann Sothern speak with any vehemence. She is arch-mistress of pleasant, casual, and brief conversation. A tranquil, luxurious cat purring on the hearth. A girl who makes long silences amiable and friendly and natural.

"Don't you think I have been lucky?" Her flexible voice slips down to a blues-song tone when she abandons polite pleasantries.

WE AGREED that she had been. It was lucky that Sam Briskin, a producer who has great faith in her future, moved from Columbia to RKO-Radio just when her Columbia contract was expiring. She is with RKO now and a girl always gets better breaks away from the studio where she started. It was pure luck that she happened to go to a party one night back in 1929 where the late Florenz Ziegfeld was one of the guests. He watched her singing and dancing, holding the attention of a crowd of blasé professionals, and offered her a contract to come to New York and play second lead in "Smiles" with the late Marilyn Miller and a nice young dancer named Fred Astaire.

She hadn't wanted to go to that party. She was feeling blue as a month of rainy Mondays. Coming down from Seattle, where she had been attending the University of Washington, to visit her mother who was giving vocal lessons in Hollywood, she had been put (Continued on page 93)

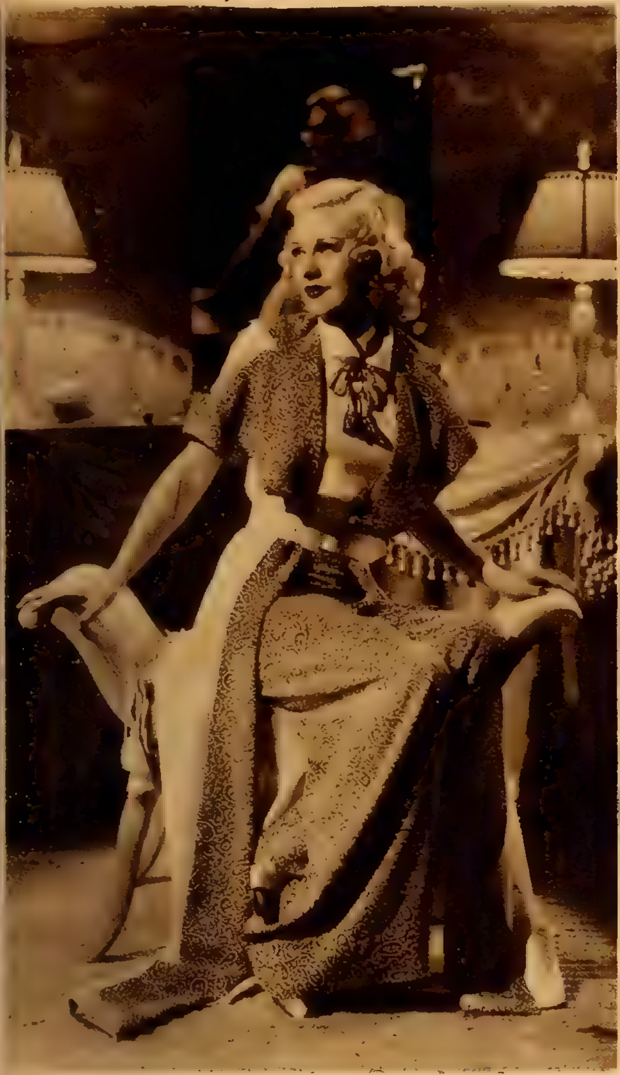
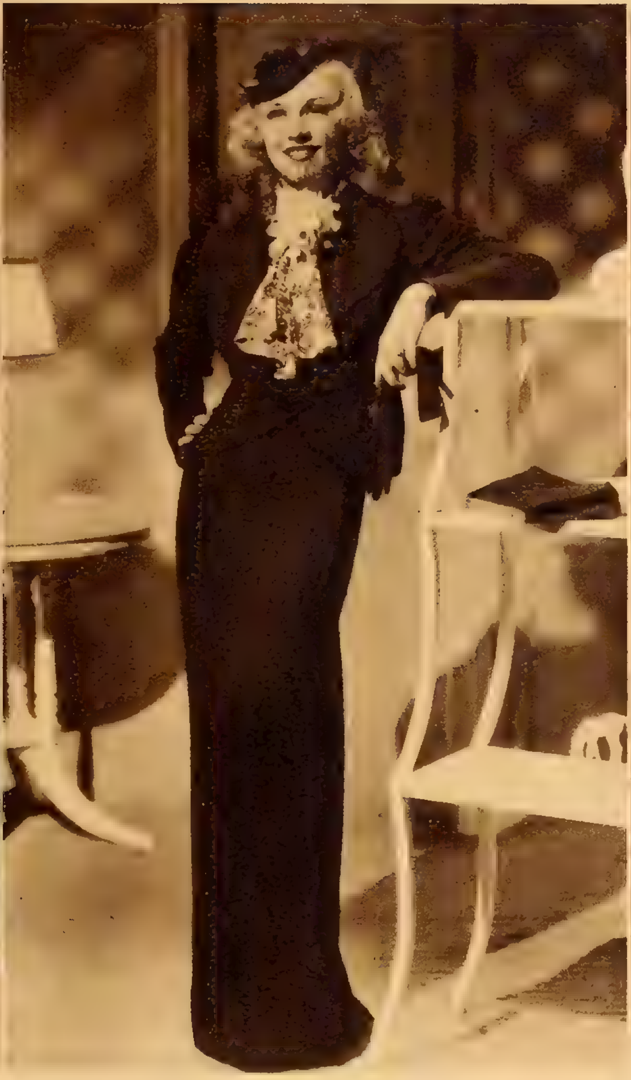
Ginger Rogers talks about weddings and selects new clothes

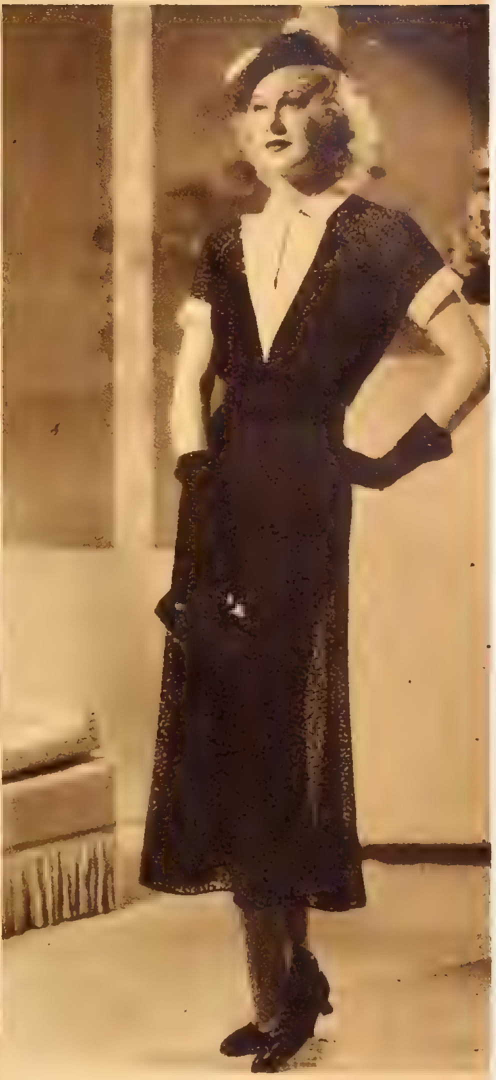
Bride Wore . . .



Grand pajama suit for a bride is this one of Ginger's in white crepe and a paisley printed silk. The full length coat with wide lapels and revers of the print is new.



And for informal evenings, Ginger picks a dinner suit of sheerest blue wool. A gay print blouse is topped by a fitted but feminized jacket. You will like a shorter skirt.



And a cocktail dress in afternoon length of black silk lace. Tailored yet feminine looking, it has collar, revers and cuffs of white pique. Patent leather accessories.

WHEN YOU want really practical dope on weddings, go to a bride of a year or so before! She's the one who is an expert on fashion matters matrimonial. Her trousseau and wedding tips are no guesswork, they are based on actual experience and practical application.

And that's how we come to Ginger Rogers Ayres. Ginger was on a buying spree in New York, recently, before starting work on "Never Gonna Dance." I called her up for a date to talk clothes. She said that she was having a fitting that afternoon on some new things that she had selected and why wouldn't I come up to chat with her there? I said why not?

So, that afternoon, I hied myself up to one of the swankier shops on upper Fifth Avenue to meet Miss R., as planned. Somehow nothing seems to set the sales force of a shop in quite such a dither as does a Hollywood customer. Everyone was racing in and out of the fitting room with clothes flung over their arms. Ginger hardly would pull herself out of one dress before someone would hand her two more. In the center of all this hullabaloo sat Ginger's mother and I, while Ginger whirled like a dervish in the center of the room, trying to see all angles of her slim form in the hectic procession of clothes.

I swear I don't see yet how she decided upon what she wanted. I had to keep my pencil firmly to a notebook in order to keep track of what she bought and what she rejected. The pictures she sent to me of her final choices made this whole story a lot simpler, I assure you.

Despite all this, Ginger and I managed a very helpful conversation. It went something like this:

"From your own wedding and trousseau, could you give some good sound tips as to what you think important?" I queried.

"Plenty," came briefly through a sleeve which, at that moment, was stalled over her mouth.

"How about breaking down?" I went on.

"Well, no girl needs a trousseau large enough to start a dress shop on," Ginger answered, peering in the mirror at the reflection of a lovely gray and brown evening gown. "What she needs is a well-rounded wardrobe, designed for her personal wardrobe that have grand tips for brides!

Left to right, Pat Patterson wears a lovely mauve lace dress which would be perfect for a bridesmaid, even to the flowers pinned into the hair at front. And next to her you see the youthful wedding gown which Shirley Deane wears in "The First Baby." The tulle veil is young looking as is the charming ivory taffeta dress. And below, Anita Louise in a grand bridesmaid's hat of fine straw with veil and flowers.

to give her smartness without a too confusing and expensive array of costumes. I had such an informal honeymoon, what there was of it, that I can't elaborate on what I took away with me. I blush to think of Lew's and my most unconventional going-away outfits! Mine consisted of slacks, not very new, an old shirt, a leather jacket and a battered felt hat. Lew looked just as bad. And worse yet, we rattled off into the desert in an ancient car with our dog riding high on our camping equipment!

"Ours is an extreme example but if a girl is going to have a casual sort of wedding trip, she should prepare for it with old clothes, not elegant new ones that will look like old duds when she returns to civilization. If, however, she is going on a trip to some smart resort or some place that requires a frequent change of clothes, she should plan ahead for it. In general, I would say the following costumes would be right for any trip, almost anywhere. And they'll be perfect for her first year of married life, afterwards.

"First, a going-away suit. I like a tailored type with a very feminine blouse trimmed with, perhaps a lacy jabot or something. And a soft, feminine hat, like the cute flower-trimmed ones of this season. Then she should have one dinner suit, like this one which I am trying on now."

THE dinner suit is the one which you can see on page 65. Of sheerest wool in navy blue, it has a long narrow skirt with a very high waistline. The flower print blouse in navy, red and white, has "gay nineties" sleeves and a jabot front detail. Ginger asked the fitter to stiffen the shoulders with taffeta because she likes them to look "nice and broad." She can stand this extra square breadth, where a shorter and less slender girl would have to shun it. Over the skirt and blouse goes a short, fitted jacket of the wool. The lapels are wide and the shoulders are emphasized by more detailing. A tiny hat with a long veil tops this.

"Besides a dinner suit," Ginger continued, as she tried on another costume, "your bride should have a cocktail dress. This one I am buying is the sort I like because its shorter length makes it usable as an afternoon dress, too."

This dress is the simple, almost severely tailored black silk lace model on page 65. One-piece with a flared skirt, it is posed over a taffeta slip. The youthful collar, tailored jabot and cuffs on the short sleeves are of starched white pique. Two small pockets on the skirt can hardly be seen in the picture. A black patent leather belt is matched up with a bag and pumps.

Another lace dress, suitable for either afternoon or for cocktail wear, is the one on page 64. This, I think, was Ginger's pet of all the clothes she bought. It has that young dashing air she likes in both her personal and screen clothes. The dress is (Continued on page 90)

$1 PRIZE LETTER

Talking Back

Did it never occur to Shirley Schottland, whose letter appeared in the May issue, that it is possible to enjoy both opera and other "good music" and also Victor Herbert's melodies or even ordinary jazz? All music, whether popular or classical, is universally loved. Music is an expression of the innermost soul of a people. In Europe it is and always has been the common herd of people who maintain the opera. One does not have to be a member of the "intelligentsia" to appreciate and enjoy classical music; one has to develop his taste, that's all. Everything worth while has to be worked for.

I should like anyone who is interested to try the following test: Select a record of any "popular" song and one of any classical selection. Play each ten times. You will find that at first you will like the jazz song very much and perhaps you will not like the classical piece at all, but by the tenth time each one is played, you will never want to hear the popular song again and the worth while music will be a constant source of pleasure for the rest of your life. Try it and see!

So here's to the first complete opera in the movies. I think it is a long way off, but I am eagerly awaiting it.—Jaquelin Nicholas, Lynchburg, Va.

The Fight's Still On

The reaction to Grand Opera expressed by Miss Schottland is natural in young people. Appreciation very often only comes after hearing various operas again and again. I suggest that she concentrate mostly on the orchestra, closely following the melodies. A great deal is missed by concentrating mostly on the voices.—Charles Wilhelm, Milwaukee, Wis. The vast success of the Saturday afternoon broadcasts of operas should be proof enough that there are vast thousands hungry for this sort of music. To me, Robert Montgomery, Gene Raymond, Jean Parker, Alice Faye, yes, even the holy Shearer with her silly giggle which exasperates me beyond all reason, are mostly impossible, but I concede anyone's right to see whom they want.—DBL, Baltimore, Md. There is a group of working people, not of the intelligentsia, who would welcome the advent of opera on the screen.—Edna Taylor, Battle Creek, Mich. Miss Schottland's attitude is un-American and inexcusable. All of us have our particular tastes in music, drama and the radio, but we have no right to insist that only our choice is superior. Why steal the other man's song? He may need it to cheer and inspire him along the way.—Edith Baxter, Wichita, Kan.

Portrait of Ginger

As well earned and deserved tribute after tribute pile up in favor of that delightfully fascinating little actress, Miss Ginger Rogers, I feel a glow of pride because she is my star and I glory in her glory.

To me she is everything that is worth while. She is sweet without being saccharine, wholesome without being tiresome and withal the most beautiful and the most natural of the entire firmament of stars; and the glory of it is she is all of these off the screen as well as on.

I have had the pleasure of meeting her and the outstanding characteristic about her, that even seemed to make one forget her rare beauty and loveliness, was the innate kindness of heart and good fellowship that seemed to motivate everything she did and said. She seems to have that rare gift—a real desire to listen to others and forget herself, that seems almost too much to ask of even ordinary mortals to say nothing of what one might expect of Hollywood's loveliest young star. May her deserved glory last forever!—Gertrude Nataly, no address.

America's Boy Friend

That picture in the May Modern Screen, showing Dick Powell fishing is one of the best I've seen of him. It proves that Dick is as good-looking in an unstudied snap as he is in posed photos. It gives a glimpse of Dick as he really is off screen—natural, fond of sport and with a glint of merriment in his eyes.

What's the matter with Warners that they put him in a production like "Colleen"? Let's see him in good stories, not necessarily musicals, but something with rhyme and reason. We liked him in "Happiness Ahead" and "Shipmates Forever." "Anchor Man," by Fanny Heaslip Lea, would suit him—even the description in the book fits him.—Ellen Barkuel, Philadelphia, Pa.

A Line or Two from Lots of Letters

Madge Evans' intelligence, ability and great physical beauty symbolize the perfect All-American Girl. "Lovers Courageous," "Dinner at Eight," "Transatlantic Tunnel," and "Exclusive Story" have proven that she is a real actress. Why bury her in unimportant roles?—Lorraine Mason, Vineland, N. J. Ever since I've been reading your "Reviews" and "Movie Scoreboard," I've enjoyed almost every movie which has been marked either "Good," "Very good," or "Extraordinary." With your helpful guidance, I don't have to go to the movies at random. The era when producers could pull the wool over the public's eyes with cheap junk is over.—F. Faenza, Passaic, N. J. Of late numerous articles have appeared concerning babies adopted by this and that movie couple, making much of the couple's yearning for a child of their own, and their delight in finding one to suit.

While I think it is wonderful to share one's name with a homeless little soul and I am happy for those little tots, it really makes me see the inside, for it seems to me that rather than boasting about the fact that they yearn for a baby of their own and adopt one (made-to-order), they should be ashamed to admit that they were afraid to have one of their own. Don't misunderstand—I am not advocating quintuplets or football elevens. After all, the most they adopt is one or two.

The idea may be commendable in its way, but here is one who can't make any great fuss over those couples. Give me the Norma and Irving Thalbergs every time—my hat is off to that couple, for they are real people.—Charlotte Bowden, Marblehead, Mass.

How Much Money Have the Quints?

of baby stars be worth—say, five, ten, fifteen years from now?

No telling. The Dionnelles are such an incalculable, such an unpredictable little bunch. Moreover, children stars, like children prodigies frequently, as adults, fail to come up to expectations.

Of course, at this baby stage, no one can imagine Yvonne, Annette, Cecile, Emilie and Marie ever failing at any time or in any way, if only they remain strong and healthy. But as grown-ups—however brilliant, gifted, accomplished they may be —isn't it at least surmisable that one or more of the quints may break up the "quintuplet combine" by falling in love and getting married? What could be more natural?

For the next few years, however, if the children all live and stay in pictures, with their "box office draw," they should make barrels and barrels of money.

And what will they do with their always-mounting fortune? An easy question, that one? So easy, the answer to it is a foregone conclusion. For the babies' wise board of guardians undoubtedly will follow its present policy of investing the major portion of quintuplet revenue in safe and sane securities.

BUT of the uninvested revenue? Another easy question, since these amazing little "producers" and hand-over-fist-money-earners have, for a long time, been meeting a thousand-dollar-a-month pay roll. This pay roll is another conservative estimate, too, for there have been printed statements to the effect that fifteen hundred a month was the approximate figure.

However, let's stay conservative, and stick to the thousand. And by meeting this monthly pay roll Yvonne, Annette, Cecile, Emilie and Marie will continue to share their fortune with others.

And what do we mean by others? Let's just take a look at the list of people who draw salaries from this amount monthly. There's Dr. Dafoe, first and foremost; then the babies' father and mother, brothers and sisters; Mlle. Noel, Dafoe Hospital head nurse; Mlle. Leroux, assistant nurse; Constables Burke and Cusson, hospital guards; Grace Demers, housekeeper and cook; Laura, a maid; also meals for the hospital personnel, electricity, drug store supplies and other requisites to maintenance of the hospital home.

SOME pay-roll, isn't it? And any two-year-olds who, out of their own earnings, can meet it, month in and month out, are some babies, aren't they?

But, for all their money-making ability and for all their fortune-sharing, will these same babies, as they grow older, be happy rich children? Or will they be five poor-little rich children whom money can never render happy?

Wards of the Crown, these quints have been called, and wards of the Province of Ontario they most certainly are—through passage of an Act of Parliament that made them Government charges—but that distinction, how will they like it later on?

And when they arrive at the age of reason, what will be their reaction to spotlight existence? Will they find in their lives as public figures, as world celebrities, that something is sadly missing?

That carefree, unself-conscious something which goes with being a normal child just like any other?

Or, to get closer to home, will the celebrities often wish they might change places with any one of their three older sisters, Rose, Therese, Pauline, all of whom are beautiful, bright and winsome?

Or, on the other hand, will Yvonne, Annette, Cecile, Emilie and Marie, because of their unusual birth, breeding and training—also, because of their fame and fortune—gradually develop a superiority complex that will cause them to look disdainfully down upon father, mother, sisters and brothers? Even upon their humble origins, perhaps?

And how will they, a quintet of girls, all the same age and all equally lovely, feel toward each other?

Interesting questions, psychologically, but questions, one and all, that only time can definitely answer.

The DIONNE QUINTUPLETS, now safely through their second year

SINCE the day of their birth, "Lysol" has been the only disinfectant used to help protect these famous babies from the dangers of Infection.

The very first registered nurse who reached the Dionne home, that exciting birthday morning in May 1934, had "Lysol" with her in her kit and went to work with it at once.

"Lysol" has been used in thousands and thousands of childbirth operations. For the danger of Infection is high in childbirth; and doctors and nurses know they need a safe, dependable germicide like "Lysol" to help protect both mother and child.

But here is a record for "Lysol" of extraordinary importance. Following the most dramatic childbirth in medical history... in the care of the most watched-over babies in the world... "Lysol" has played, and still plays, a vitally important part.

Their clothes, bedding, diapers, cribs, even their toys, the furniture and woodwork of that snug, modern, little Dafoe Hospital... all have been kept clean with "Lysol," the effective, economical germicide.

Are you giving your baby this scientific care? Are you using "Lysol" to clean the nursery, bathroom, the kitchen, laundry, cellar...to disinfect clothes, bedding, telephone mouthpieces, door knobs, banisters, etc.? The scientific care given to the Dionnes is an example every mother should follow. Full directions for correct uses of "Lysol" come with each bottle.

During last winter's flood disasters, thousands of gallons of "Lysol" were rushed to devastated areas, to fight Infection and epidemics. Doctors, hospitals, and Public Health officers know they can depend on "Lysol".

NASTY GERMS SCARE ME-MOTHER!

"I want ANTISEPTIC Powder 'cause it chases Germs away for good."

"You ask—why do I want that Mennen powder that's Antiseptic? 'Cause—with a world full of nasty germs, of microbes and such things—a feller who wants to be healthy just can't be too careful. I know that Mennen Antiseptic Powder scares germs away—chases 'em out of skin-folds and creases where they love to hide Not only that—but it helps prevent most of the skin irritations babies get. Just imagine! No more chafing or rawness! So listen, Mummy—do me just one favor, will you? Buy me some of that Mennen Antiseptic Powder today. I'll be an awfully good feller from then on. Sure I will!"

America's first baby powder is now Antiseptic. But it doesn't cost a penny more. How foolish to use any other!

New England Favorites

that I do. He is a New Englander, too, you know. We grew up together and went to school together, lived the same sort of lives and ate the same sort of foods as children. So it's no wonder that New England style dinners are still such favorites with both of us!

"Every Saturday night, for instance," she went on, "we used to have Boston Brown Bread and Baked Beans for dinner, back home. And it's a custom I still adhere to three thousand miles west of the place of its origin! The Brown Bread recipe we use turns out a delicious product and, contrary to general belief, it is extremely easy to make."

"With or without raisins?" I inquired, busily writing down Bette's remarks as she talked on.

"With raisins, of course!" Bette answered, without a moment's hesitancy.

"And speaking of ingredients that you do or do not add, in order to make dishes that are traditionally correct and truly grand," she continued seriously, "let me tell you that New England Clam Chowder is incorrectly made more frequently than any other dish from that region. The genuine article features clams, believe it or not! Not just one lonely little clam added sort of as an after-thought in order to give this soup some right to its name, but lots of succulent clams giving their delicious, unmistakable flavor to the dish. Besides a large quantity of clams and clam liquor and the right kind of seasoning, Chowder should have tomatoes, but no milk! To a native New Englander the addition of milk is anathema, for with milk it becomes Clam Stew and not worthy of the proud old name of Chowder.

CODFISH in any form is also a food favorite of mine. Codfish Cakes, especially. We serve these frequently in our Hollywood home because it is possible to get the self-same flavor that we used to enjoy so much by buying the ready-to-fry codfish cakes that come in cans."

I'll give you directions for fixing these Codfish Cakes, so that they will attain their peak of perfection, at the end of this article, just above the coupon that will bring you other directions for making all the swell dishes that Bette mentioned. But just now I feel that we should not break in on Bette's conversation by giving one specific recipe, when she has so many interesting things to tell us about New England foods in general.

"Boston Cream Pie," she went on, "is a traditional dessert of the Eastern seaboard to which I have given some West Coast touches. In other words I have the cook add lemon juice and rind to the custard filling and garnish the top with wafer thin slices of orange over which the usual powdered sugar is sprinkled."

A nice idea, I thought, and determined to try it myself when making my very next Boston Cream Pie. And when I did, I discovered, as I had suspected I would, that the addition of a real fruity flavor gave new distinction to an already popular dessert.

Apples, of course, also came in for favorable mention by Miss Davis. No true New Englander could fail to mention the tempting fruits of the old orchards whose trees display their gnarled, fruit laden branches each fall. Many of our finest apple dishes originated in New England. And of these probably the most famous is Apple Pie, which does not hesitate to make an appearance at the breakfast table, though I should hesitate to recommend it from a dietary standpoint! Not even Bette Davis went so far as to do that, but she did suggest that I might like to have her mother's recipe for New England Apple Sauce Pie. This, it turns out, is about one of the simplest pies of all to make.

"The apples and the pastry are cooked separately, you see," Bette informed me as a further recommendation, "and in this way you can sample the apple filling before placing it in the cooked crust to make sure that it is sweet enough and flavored to taste. By following my mother's recipe I'm sure you'll find that the flavor would suit your taste to a T. With this pie you omit the usual slice of American cheese, and instead you pass a bowl of whipped cream which is supposed to be ladled in lavish style over each piece after it has been served. Since you never have to worry about the apples not cooking enough or the crust burning before they're cooked, this is one of the simplest as well as one of the best desserts I know of."

"Speaking of sweets," I interrupted at this point, "there's one you haven't mentioned which I understand is very popular around your childhood haunts. I judge from the name of this dish that its origin must date back to the days of your Puritan ancestors! It's called 'Indian Pudding.' Do you know about it?"

"DO I know about it?" echoed Bette. "Why I simply love it! But I must confess I don't know the first thing about making it and I've never been able to find a successful recipe to give to my cook for her to follow. Do you happen to have one?" she asked, hopefully.

Well, as it happens I did have one which I had collected from the files of a New England friend of mine after tasting this dish for the very first time at her house. And that's how it came about that I found myself swapping recipes with Bette Davis by promising her a copy of my treasured Indian Pudding recipe in return for three of hers, those for the simple Boston Brown Bread (with raisins, of course), the New England Clam Chowder (with clams and without milk), the Boston Cream Pie with Hollywood trimmings, and New England Apple Sauce Pie.

You'll find these directions for making her favorite foods in this month's Modern Hostess leaflet together with a copy of the very same recipe for Indian Pudding that I am sending to Miss Davis as my contribution to her collection of traditional New England dishes. Just write in to me for your copy of this leaflet if you, too, would like to know how to prepare these tempting treats, each one of which has the approval of New Englanders in general and Bette Davis in particular. Fill in the coupon for convenience but remember that as always the attractive little leaflet is absolutely free to readers of MODERN SCREEN.

Meanwhile here are the simple directions for making good old-fashioned Codfish Cakes with that Down East flavor. The Pilgrim Fathers discovered how delicious they were hundreds of years ago. If you have not already made the same discovery, you have a treat in store for you.

And I'm also giving you here a simple recipe for New England Boiled Dinner.

You can make Bette Davis' delicious New England Apple Sauce Pie, if you'll send in the coupon below for the recipe.

Follow this with Boston Cream Pie or Indian Pudding and you'll have much the same sort of meal that fortified Paul Revere for his famous ride!

CODFISH CAKES

1 can ready-to-fry codfish cakes
(lemon juice, onion juice or minced chives, if desired)

Empty contents of can into bowl. (A little lemon juice and a few drops of onion juice or some finely minced chives may be added if additional flavor is desired.) Fry in deep, hot fat until crisp on the outside and a delicate brown in color. For best results use a deep-fat frying kettle and frying basket. Drain on unglazed paper or white paper kitchen towels. Serve, very hot, garnished with sprigs of parsley and slices of lemon.

NEW ENGLAND BOILED DINNER

Choose a good piece of corned brisket of beef. Allow 1 potato for each person to be served, also a large carrot, a medium sized beet, a turnip and 2 or 3 small onions per person. Also purchase a medium sized head of cabbage and use as much of this as desired. Place meat in a deep pot and cover with cold water. Bring to a boil. Boil 5 minutes, then remove scum. Cook at a lower temperature until tender—about 4 or 5 hours. Remove beef from water. Skim off fat. Cook vegetables in the remaining stock, adding them according to the individual cooking time each vegetable requires. (Since beets take a much longer time to cook than the other vegetables it is always well to have them cooking in a separate pot while the meat is being cooked.) When the vegetables are almost done, return meat to pot to reheat it while the vegetables finish cooking. Place meat on platter, surrounded by all the vegetables except the beets which are served separately.

knees, for modesty's sake, white middy blouses and big black bows on their pigtails or curls, for art's sake. Well, there was a certain girl in the class who, as they say in the movies, had aroused strange feelings in my boyish breast! As far as I was concerned, she was Helen of Troy and Cleo rolled into one, if you get what I mean.

"That day when she folded her arms on her chest, then stretched them out for deep breathing exercises, I thought it more beautiful than Pavlowa doing the 'Dying Swan,' to which my mother had just dragged me when I met her in New York on my way home from school in England. I remember also that I had to suffer through the Russian Ballet, 'The Pink Lady,' and 'The Chocolate Soldier' that week. Which dates me, doesn't it?"

"Well, as I was saying, the girl of my dreams, having finished her breathing exercises, was just about to take a broad lunge. Her arms were already stretched up to heaven when—her bloomers began to slip!

"Poor thing! She was quite unconscious of the impending catastrophe. She went right on lunging. All the boys in my row began to snicker and I felt myself getting paralyzed from the knees up. It was something like sitting at a table in a cafe and seeing a woman fall on a dance floor. There she is, sprawling awkwardly at your feet, while her partner stands above her looking like an idiot, and you sit chained to your chair, cursing yourself for doing nothing. And then, one of the waiters, the only man with presence of mind in that whole restaurant, hurries forward and picks her up.

"Unfortunately, there weren't any waiters in the gymnasium that day. And something had to be done! Her bloomers were slipping lower and lower, and the snickers were growing louder and louder. I looked down at my best girl, who was still unconscious of the loss of her dignity. And because I couldn't stand it any longer I looked away—and down at the empty seat next to mine. On it was my overcoat.

"Don't ask me how I managed! All I know is that I gritted my teeth, looked straight ahead and made a beeline for the performers on the gym floor.

"The next thing that surprised, little, brown-pigtailed girl knew, was that something was being wrapped around her, and someone was hissing in her ears, 'Get outa here. Your bloomers are falling!' If it wasn't the most embarrassing moment in her life, it certainly was in mine! The thought of it still sends cold shivers down my spine.

"My face as red as a ripe tomato, I managed to sneak out by a side door of the gym. All the way home by a roundabout route, I was wishing I had never been born and was swearing that all girls were blamed nuisances!"

"Do you still believe that?"

"Well, only occasionally. I'm kinda sorry I told you this yarn. It sounds Sir Galahadish!"

IT'S hard to get Gary to talk about himself in any capacity, and he's mum about his Good Samaritan deeds, which are more frequent than he'd ever care to admit. Knowing this, I did a little private investigating on my own, and discovered another one.

A certain ambitious young wife, of a certain talented but poor young Hollywood author, was determined to entertain her husband's New York publisher on his visit to Southern California. She had hopes of impressing him with her contacts with socialites and stars. Her one drawback was that she didn't have any impressive contacts. She knew her movie stars only vicariously through the twice-told tales of her young friends in the studio publicity departments. Despite all this, she believed in miracles and invited the publisher and his star-struck young daughters to a cocktail party, promising introductions to several of the screen's most romantic and glamorous stars.

The day before her party she knew she was up against it. In tears, she telephoned her pal, a girl in a studio publicity department.

"You have to help me out," she sobbed. "It means everything to Tom. The publication of his new book—everything! Please come over tomorrow and bring an actor. Even if he stays just five minutes, I will have lived up to my word and won't look such a fool. You must, darling, you must." She hung up the phone and wept some more.

The girl to whom she had brought her troubles is one of the best scouts in Hollywood. She has a sense of humor. She has a sense of the dramatic. And she also knows Gary quite well. She also happens to know his weakness for rescuing damsels—or (as it was in this case) damsels in distress.

But Gary, she knew, would be working late the next day at another studio. So first, she called several other likely masculine "impressers" and received the expected answer. Why should they put themselves out for a woman whom they'd never met? They were much too busy.

But being the sort of pal who never says die, she phoned Gary.

"I'll see what I can do for you," he promised. "But how am I to get away?"

"Leave that to me," said the pal. "At seven-thirty, Gary has an appointment with Lady Vere de Vere, whoever she is!"

"Who?" asks Gary. But she had already hung up.

The next afternoon a very jittery young author's wife and her accommodating friend suffered through two hours of tea—pouring—waiting for six-thirty and the pièce de résistance of the day. What if he were to disappoint them? Conversation lagged. The atmosphere began to grow tense. Six-thirty arrived. No Gary. Six-forty. Oh, Death, where is thy sting?

Ten to seven, Gary—Hollywood's ever-late arriver—arrived. The young subdebs from New York nearly swooned with delighted surprise. The publisher's wife gushed, and the publisher began to adopt a confidential and chummy attitude toward the young author. Gary acted as if dropping in to tea at this particular ménage was a daily occurrence. As "an old friend of the family," he gave one of his best performances.

At seven-fifteen, the girl friend emerged suddenly from the library. "There's a telephone call for you, Gary," she said. "It's Lady Vere de Vere."

"Who?" asked Gary blankly.

"Lady Vere de Vere," she repeated, wickedly enjoying the situation.

"Tell Lady Vere de Vere I'll phone her tomorrow," said Gary, not budging from the side of one of the young subdebs from New York.

Gary stayed until nine o'clock. Needless to say, so did everyone else. Also needless to say, the young author received his coveted contract.

All of which goes to prove that Gary's gallantry isn't just the result of good upbringing. He actually gets a kick out of being the White Knight. Which he plays perfectly—if you'll remember his impersonation of the original "White Knight" in "Alice in Wonderland." Which doesn't make it any the less gallant.

Not Subject to Change

pin the tail on," they complained, when she had finished. "You'd better draw a house and we'll pin the chimney on."

Luise was very pleased at this display of honesty. In a town where "people treat stars like gods," this criticism gave her tremendous satisfaction.

SHE lives in a rambling, comfortable house at the beach with Johnnie and two servants. There is a huge garden, surrounded by a high wall. Doubtless the garden is cared for by a gardener but there is nothing stylized about it, everything growing in natural profusion. She loves the garden and, if you should be fortunate enough to be invited to lunch, nothing short of a blizzard would prevent luncheon being served on the balcony, where you could see and smell the flowers and hear, coming from her phonograph inside, the strains of her favorite music, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

If she liked you, she would take you to the kitchen while she prepared your lunch.

"Ah, this iss it," she laughs, as she throws a bit of butter into a pan and gently browns a few croutons, to which she adds a little chopped onion, a few eggs, a can of tomatoes and some American cheese.

"Now, serve thiss," she orders the bewildered servant, as she dusts off her hands and, leaving the kitchen looking as though a cyclone had struck it, escorts you to the balcony where she seats you at a yellow table. Soon the Rainer-made concoction, which looks like something that had been used before but tastes delicious, is beautifully served on plain black dishes. Her child-like anxiety, to please, her eagerness to have you like it, would overpower any inclination on your part to criticize if the entree turned out to be epsom salts disguised. You would eat it and pretend to like it.

She never follows a given recipe, preferring to experiment until she is satisfied. If she offers you a new discovery for dessert, which turns out to be rhubarb and whipped cream, her pride in her accomplishment forces you to like it.

You miss a mass of cut flowers in her house, there are so many outside. On a table stands a low glass bowl in which floats a single water lily. She never wears flowers, either, preferring them in her garden.

Her home is simple, as is everything else about her. She likes simple things and is as amused by a ride on a roller coaster as she is by a pair of wood carvings she owns which probably cost her several hundred dollars. Mounted on pegs, the two little figures—a man and a woman—can be turned around so that turned one

● "Come on—stop chewing petals and get busy! Imagine finding flowers on the living-room floor—we'll pick the loveliest bouquet for Mother! We'll tear off all these old leaves and break the stems good and short..."

"Keep an eye on the sun"

says Jane Heath

● WATCH Old Sol especially during the summer days, because he does things to your eyes—makes them look pale and squinty when you're in glaring light, playing on the beach or winning a golf match. That's why, if you're smart, you'll outwit him with KURLASH eye make-up and bring out the natural loveliness of your eyes.

First, slip your eyelashes into KURLASH. It's a clever little instrument that curls your eyelashes in 30 seconds and requires no heat, cosmetics or practice. KURLASH is really a beauty necessity, for by curling your lashes your eyes look larger and reveal their full beauty. In the sunlight your curled lashes throw flattering, subtle shadows that make your eyes glamourous! Don't be without KURLASH. Buy one today, at your nearest department or drug store, for only $1.

● Lashtint, the perfumed liquid mascara, is ideal for swimming days because it doesn't crack, stiffen, weep or rub off. Apply it while the lashes are being curled, by touching the little glass rod to them as they are held in the rubber bows of your KURLASH. In black, brown, green and blue. . . . $1

● Shadette, the non-theatrical eye shadow, comes in 12 daytime and evening colors, including gold and silver shades that are grand finishing touches, to be applied alone or over your preferred color. Try Shadette some romantic, moonlight night. . . . 75c way they are quarreling and the other way makes them appear lovers.

● Try Twissors—the new tweezers with scissor-handles, curved to permit full vision. They're marvelously efficient, and only 25c.

It must be confessed that Miss Rainer has servant trouble, but the reason for that is as original as everything else about her. That elfin quality that is so much admired is the seat of her domestic difficulties, for her servants consider her a child and want to mother her. And what chance has the mistress of a house if she is to be "mothered" by her servants?

If she throws herself on the floor in front of the fire to read or just to dream, her peace is sure to be disturbed a moment later by a thoughtful servant throwing an afghan over her or insisting on giving her a pillow.

If she orders two entrees for dinner, because she wants two entrees, the servants merely smile and say: "The dear child thinks she wants both steak and roast chicken," and they proceed to cook what they think she should have.

One day she left the house in her car with Johnnie, saying she would return in an hour. The sun was shining. It was a glorious day for a long motor ride and, before she realized how the time was flying, the shadows were deepening and she was miles from home. She decided to stay in a neighboring town all night and her first thought was to telephone home and explain her absence. A sudden desire to get even with those servants with the mothering complex stopped her. "I'll teach them a lesson," she decided. "I'll let them worry." She bought a toothbrush and every night she washed out her undies in the wash bowl. Four days later she returned home, having had a grand time touring Southern California.

With the exception of lip rouge, she never wears make-up. And in a world in which women's purses bulge with every known first aid to beauty, her flat little pocketbook contains money, a comb and a lipstick. She never uses a powder puff and she wouldn't know what to do with a hairpin. Her tousled, black hair, which seems innocent of any attention, is one of her most distinctive features.

CLOTHES, to her, are most unimportant. At home and around the studio she wears slacks and sandals with wooden heels and little wooden cleats on the bottom which clack when she walks. For street wear she surrenders to custom to the extent of wearing tweed suits and coats. Usually she is hatless.

When a famous European photographer visited Hollywood he asked Luise to pose for him. Luise was one of eight famous stars he wished to photograph. She was leaving for a trip at 9:30 in the morning but she said she would pose for him at nine. Promptly at nine the next morning the photographer was there and found she had overslept.

"I'll be ready in five minutes," she said. She washed her face, put on some lipstick and as she ran down the stairs to meet the artist, she combed her hair. She was ready, and the photographer said she was the best subject he photographed in California.

She is a bundle of contradictions. When she works, nothing else in the world matters. She concentrates on what she is doing. She is a dynamo of energy and would work her company to exhaustion. No five o'clock quitting rules for her. She would willingly work all night if the rest of the company would agree. But work finished, her mind free, she is a madcap, a child, an imp, the gayest of the gay.

In her early teens she was the leader of her gang and it was in her facile brain that the escapades of these young people originated. She once raided the wardrobe at the theatre, where she was playing, and distributed the costumes among her friends.

After donning the costumes they swam down the Rhine for a way and then struggled gasping to the shore, convincing onlookers that their boat had capsized.

Highly emotional, she is reduced to tears when listening to beautiful music. She has hundreds of records of her favorites among the classics but also enjoys hot jazz, particularly Cab Calloway.

Beautifully educated and a deep student, she reads a great deal, especially poetry, but she prefers to learn from life and people rather than from books. She likes to model things in clay and when she thinks she has done a good job she has the piece cast in bronze so that she can keep it. She also likes to paint and write lyrics. She is deeply religious.

"I don't see how people can do anything without one great thing to pin one's faith on," she says.

She is the delight of automobile salesmen because she can't resist buying a new car frequently.

When the new dressing-room building was erected at the studio and all the stars moved from their dingy quarters into the new suites, little Rainer refused to move.

"What for?" she asked. "This is my work shop. It is good enough. No, I stay here."

Finding a Latin dictionary of great assistance to her in learning English, she carries one every place with her. If she fears anything more than interviewers it is being typed in her work. She accepted the offer to come to the M-G-M studio because that is where Garbo works and she worships the Swedish star. When she learns anything new, from a recipe to a strange bit of slang, she says: "It is goot to know these things. Anything you know is goot for you."

There is one person at the studio who can hold out against her wiles and, strangely enough, it is a man—one of the studio police. He followed her one noon, as she made her way toward the studio commissary, Johnnie at her heels. The dining-room was crowded so she picked Johnnie up and, looking neither to the right nor left, made her way to a table, the cop close behind.

"I've warned you before, Miss Rainer," he said. "You can't bring the dog into the dining-room."

"Ssssst!" she said, as she dumped Johnnie unceremoniously on the floor and gave him a gentle little kick. Then, training her enormous brown eyes on the cop she said: "But I can't catch him. He ran away under the tables."

Howls of laughter from nearby tables greeted this remark for at her feet, sitting up with paws extended hopefully (for he smelled food) was Johnnie.

"I don't object," the cop said, shrugging his shoulders, "but it is the law."

"I don't see why it is the law. I don't see why the city should care," she protested, almost in tears. "Johnnie has been all over Europe and no one objected to him."

Picking Johnnie up she left the cafe and Rainer doesn't eat there any more. If Johnnie had obeyed her command to "scram" he wouldn't have been caught. But if Johnnie ever obeyed her slightest command I think she would disown him. She would be sure he had gone Hollywood.

She adores William Powell and paid him the highest compliment one day recently when she brought Johnnie to the studio just after he had been bathed and plucked. "Look at him!" she cried proudly. "He is a William Powell among dogs!"

A Mind of Her Own

him. Don't think that the man who rides around in his limousine and plays a fancy game of bridge in the evening is without worry. Even though he may be a producer, he has to cajole the exhibitor, the man who shows the pictures, who in turn has to please the public. It is the fan, in the final analysis, who decides who will remain on the screen. No, it's not a little matter entirely up to the casting director, as many suppose."

Josephine Hutchinson's critical mind is something to contemplate, too. While in New York she attended one of the season's Broadway hits. She was vastly disappointed in the production. When pressed for a reason, she up and gave several—all of them good. One hadn't realized, until she pointed it out, that the entire story of the play hadn't moved one iota from the minute the curtain rose until it descended, that nothing had really happened to any character in it.

"I suppose the reason the play clicked is that people enjoyed its very frothiness while they were in the theatre. Entertainment value isn't to be discounted for a minute, I don't mean that, but how something that gives so little can succeed is rather amazing to me."

AND this star loves to be on our side of the footlights. She is one of the most ardent fans in filmdom. She left New York a day sooner than she had planned to go, simply so that she would be in California in time to attend Nazimova's opening night in Los Angeles.

"There is an artist," she says admiringly. "Every gesture, every intonation of hers speaks volumes. Even those who are not particularly interested in the technique of acting get something from her performances, although they wouldn't, of course, analyze just what it is. There is feeling there. Yes, I think Nazimova is a truly great actress. And now I understand she is coming back to the movies after an absence of twelve years. Well, Hollywood and the fans are lucky if this is true."

Miss Hutchinson would rather play real characters in homey pictures than anything else. No exoticism or "glam-oor" for her.

"It takes good, hard work to play the woman next door or the girl across the street," she says. "Because if you don't make 'em ring true, everybody is going to find you out. Poor acting, over-acting or no acting at all cannot always be detected if the setting is lavish and the character glamorous, but strip a girl of that and if she doesn't know her stuff—well, everybody in the theatre will be "on" to her in a minute.

Nobody is "on" to Josephine, except as a portrayer of fine performances. And hers is the homey, real role, too. Remember "Oil for the Lamps of China" and now, "I Married a Doctor"? She played real young women in both and in a vibrant, distinctive manner.

"Well," she said in conclusion, "the whole idea of the movies still overwhelms me. Every bit of it. The amount of publicity one gets, the vast audiences one reaches. Why you'd have to appear in a highly successful play for a year before you'd nearly reach the number of people you reach in an evening in just one picture. I love to work in the movies. Maybe I am a cog in the vast machine, but there is some small satisfaction in knowing that

NOT long ago I was like some friends I have...low in spirits...run-down...out of sorts...tired easily and looked terrible. I knew I had no serious organic trouble so I reasoned sensibly...as my experience has since proven...that work, worry, colds and whatnot had just worn me down.

I had been listening to the S.S.S. Radio Program and began to wonder if my trouble was not lowered strength in my blood...I started a course of S.S.S. Tonic Treatment...at the end of ten days I noticed a change...I followed directions faithfully...a tablespoonful before each meal.

The color began to come back to my skin...I felt better...I did not tire easily and soon I felt that those red-blood-cells were back to so-called fighting strength.

The confidence mother has always had in S.S.S....which is still her stand-by when she feels run-down...convinced me I ought to try this Treatment...it is great to feel strong again and like my old self.

Much more could be said...a trial will thoroughly convince you that this way, in the absence of any organic trouble, will start you on the road to feeling like yourself again. You should soon enjoy again the satisfaction of appetizing food...sound sleep...steady nerves...a good complexion...and renewed strength.

There is no guess work in the S.S.S. Tonic Treatment...decades of popular acceptance and enthusiastic words of praise by users themselves speak even louder than the scientific appraisal of the progressively improved S.S.S. product which has caused millions to say to their friends—if even one cog slipped, the whole machinery of movie-making would be apt to go berserk. Makes you feel so sort of important, when you know nobody really is."

And so you have Josephine Hutchinson, a very sincere young person. Happily married. Glad to be in pictures, but not wedded to that, planning to save enough to do as she likes some day, with the goal set at a decent figure and the plans to come later distinctly modest. Very grateful for what has happened to her, though by no means humbly so. A very pretty, fragile girl with a very strong mind of her own. The girl next door, the one you like so well, and the one she plays so well, which is, as she says herself, the true test of acting ability.

Hollywood's Old Maids

her name. Somehow, if one may hazard a very rash statement, we don't think Garbo will ever marry—at least, not for a long, long time. Perhaps when she is older, she may marry some good friend for the sake of companionship, as middle-aged people sometimes do, but it will not be for any overwhelming love. Garbo has been in love, but not recently. And it is strange that this woman who, on the screen, must continually suffer and die for love and so enslave men with love that they desert their families and ruin their careers, should not only "want to be alone" but have her wish.

SOME time ago, as you know, when Garbo was very young, there was Mauritz Stiller, that brilliant, ugly, kindly man, who refused to accept M-G-M's offer of a golden directorial contract unless a contract were also given to his young protegee, Garbo. And he held out until the studio said, "Oh, all right. Bring her along—perhaps we can use her in something." Whether Garbo's feeling for Stiller was love, adoration, or admiration, we cannot say, but certainly there was a strong emotional bond between them. Well, Mauritz Stiller died and Garbo mourned, but whether for a lover or a friend, again we cannot say.

Then there was the late Jack Gilbert and certainly Garbo was in love with him, if she ever was in love in her life. They went everywhere together and the mournful beauty of Garbo's face was flushed with happiness and softened with smiles. The fire of their love for each other burned through onto the screen. Winchell, keyhole-expert and phrase-coiner, started the expression Garbo-Gilberting which, ironically enough, remained a synonym for love-making long after the Garbo-Gilbert romance was dead. For die it did, on what was to have been their wedding night. They planned a runaway marriage and halfway to their destination Garbo turned—fled—refused to go through with it. Jack Gilbert had himself locked up in jail, some say for fear that he should force his way to her against her wish. What was the reason? Fear? Doubt that the temperamental Gilbert would be a suitable husband? Or the sudden conclusion that love was one thing and marriage quite another thing, with its loss of freedom and its burden of responsibility?

Since then, Garbo's "romances" have been ninety-eight per cent fictional—nice little stories doped out by the publicity department to "break" conveniently with the release of Garbo's pictures. Mamoulian directed "Queen Christina" so they had it that Garbo and the clever Rouben were mad for each other. George Brent, temporarily unattached, was leading man in "The Painted Veil." So George and Greta were alleged to be that way. At this point, even the most gullible person says phooey when a new Garbo "romance" is rumored.

And so here is one Hollywood old maid—a woman with a strange sort of beauty and a great deal of money, an actress whose drawing power is still to be reckoned with. She lives alone, in a series of rented houses which she tries to render incommunicado to everyone, including her own studio. She goes home to Sweden once a year to visit her mother. She can have anything she wants, and she chooses to wear the shabbiest attire, is driven about in an ancient Lincoln, goes nowhere and sees very few people. Happy? Unhappy? Who can tell? But what a negative sort of existence! Would you care to change places with her? We thought not.

NEXT on the list is Myrna Loy and this, we say, is a crying shame. For Miss Loy, from all indications, would make just as swell a wife, actually, as she does on the screen. Without her glamor trappings, she is a gay, smart looking, interesting person, with a nice sense of humor, a good disposition, and plenty of brains. She could keep a home running on greased wheels and maintain her professional work, too.

Oh, yes, Myrna has been in love. She is in love now and there will be a wedding, the gossips say, as soon as the man is able to accomplish the small technicality of a divorce from his first wife. You hear very little about this, because Myrna Loy has never been one to talk about her personal affairs. She has become pretty slick about avoiding interviews. She hates gossip and scandal and she has far too much respect for Arthur Hornblow to wear her heart in the public prints.

All of which is fine, but there's one element of danger in such a situation. Let's consider a hypothetical case: a married man, who has agreed to disagree with his wife and hasn't lived with her for years meets a girl and falls in love. He wants to get married and so does she, and he takes steps to get a divorce. There are complications—there are always complications—and things drag on and on. Between him and the girl he loves this barrier stands, over all their contacts a web of difficulties is cast. Love will flourish for a while in the face of opposition, but sometimes waiting and dreary details bring irritation, fault-finding and quarrels in their wake. At best, it's a strained and difficult relationship. At the worst, it ends in disillusionment and bitterness.

There is, we hope, no such fate in store for Myrna Loy, who has worked hard all her life, who has led a self-respecting, well-bred existence in hectic Hollywood, who has made herself the tops among our picture comediennes, and who is certainly entitled to all the happiness she can get out of life. In fact, we shan't even care if all her problems are ironed out before this reaches print and if her ensuing marriage makes a liar out of us.

And—well, of course, there's Mae West. It does seem a bit incongruous to speak of Miss West as a spinster, exponent as she is, on the screen, of the most impudent ways to get your man. It appears like, if Miss West had wanted to get married, she'd have done so these many moons ago. Yes, we're aware that every once in a while that business pops up about Jim Timony, her manager, also being her husband. But Mae has stated emphatically that he isn't and somehow, we believe her. And there was all that talk a little over a year ago about—er—what was his name—having married her back in 1911. Oh, yes, Frank Wallace. That died down quickly enough and even the wisecracks are forgotten that Mae made about the situation at the time. No, we believe that Mae has never clicked romantically. Prior to the wildfire success in New York which brought her a Hollywood offer, her life was not precisely easy. Burlesque, vaudeville, one-night stands. . . . Little time to think of marriage. Since her name has been on the dotted line of a nice picture contract, we'll wager she has received hundreds of proposals from fortune hunters and celebrity chasers. We'll wager too, that she has listened to them with a bitter smile on her lips, followed by a wisecracking refusal.

HERE'S another girl who is in a difficult situation, romantically speaking: Jeanette MacDonald. They say she is secretly married to Bob Ritchie, talent scout for M-G-M and if this is so, they have undoubtedly their good reasons for secrecy. But it seems rather too bad. Either submitting to an extraordinarily long engagement for one reason, or else married and unable, for some other reason, to live as a married woman. Maybe Jeanette and Bob Ritchie fear the various dangers Hollywood puts in the path of a happy marriage. Maybe they think they stand a better chance of happiness the way things are. Maybe Jeanette is one who believes that marriages and careers don't mix. We can't wonder at their hesitation to marry, if that's the case, or their reluctance to admit their marriage, if that's it, with Hollywood marriages tumbling to pieces all around them. But when we hear Mary Smith or Susie Zilch envying the movie stars, we say, "Mary, my pet—Susie, my lamb, you're better off in some ways, even if you must make last year's imitation seal skin do for another winter."

And, now, those women who have been married once and given it up as a bad job. There are many of them, but a few will suffice to show how a rude awakening from love's young dream has its effect.

Loretta Young, married too early to Grant Withers. The two of them unable to cope with the inevitable married life arguments about bills and ways and means. Further handicapped by their professional lives, which kept one out late while the other stayed home with nowhere to go, which threw them into contact with pretty girls and handsome men, engendering fights and jealousies. You're familiar with that story, so why repeat it?

Since then, a jinx seems to have settled on Loretta Young. Her youthful prettiness has developed into a more mature, alluring beauty—a soft, passive beauty which may be the outward index of a yielding, lovable nature. She has been in love since her marriage— once, deeply, in a headline romance with Spencer Tracy that could not come to fulfillment because of family ties and religious beliefs which are important to them both. And there has been gossip about this man and that, for wherever Beauty goes, men will follow and gossip will ensue. But each time, the gossip died down and there has been no happy ending to Loretta's love story. She has plunged furiously into her work and her career has raced ahead this last year. Well, that is a good thing, for there is no drug like hard work. Loretta is, in actual years, little more than a child and she lived through a woman's experiences far too early. If only work and her career do not become so important to her that love and marriage, a home and a husband, are rendered non-essential.

There's Janet Gaynor, who married Lydell Peck, perhaps on the rebound from the Charles Farrell affair—perhaps not. Since Janet and Mr. Peck got their Reno diploma, Janet has never found it necessary to stay at home evenings with a good book. Her little-girl charm is just as potent a magnet as Loretta Young's beauty and Janet can have a date for every night in the week, if she wants to. But though her telephone number is always in demand and though the florist brings orchids regularly, there hasn't been anyone who really mattered beyond the passing moment.

THERE'S Ann Harding who used to be happy with Harry Bannister, but there, again, was a divorce, and subsequent unpleasant litigation over Jane Harding Bannister, their daughter. Now Ann lives a spinster life in her hilltop palace. The endless series of suffering wife roles she has played on the screen recently are an unhappy contrast to the charming Ann Harding we knew in "Paris Bound" and "Holiday." Has the pale gray existence which she must be living taken some of the verve out of her work, too?

There's Miriam Hopkins, the ex-Mrs. Austin Parker—so very popular and so very attractive to men. There's Carole Lombard, the ex-Mrs. Bill Powell—darn good company and easy on the eyes as well. There's Virginia Bruce, the ex-Mrs. Jack Gilbert, who is so beautiful it makes you ache to look at her. There are others—who have been once bit and who are now twice shy.

With constant divorce headlines before their eyes, perhaps that's why some of Hollywood's prettiest younger girls do not want to settle down just yet. Maureen O'Sullivan has been going around with Johnny Farrow for—how long is it? And people have become tired of wondering if she'll really marry him and if he really wants to marry her, or are they just having a good time? Ann Sothern's romance with Roger Pryor goes on. Madge Evans is still seen occasionally with Tom Gallery, but that's been going on so long the gossip writers don't even mention it in their columns any more. And the perennial girl friend, Mary Brian, is back from England—and terribly interested in Cary Grant, it would seem. Rosalind Russell is the smartest of the bunch—she has kept free of all but the most casual friendships. But we bet when she finds someone who interests her, she'll marry him, quick like a rabbit, and hold on to him good and tight.

Well, there's one point we haven't touched upon. Whom would the majority of these ladies marry, pray? There's a dearth of eligible men in Hollywood. There are plenty of nice husbands; sundry desirable executives who don't wish to get tied down please; scores of playboys who are out to have as much fun as they can get; and heaps of earnest, hard-working young fellows who have no desire to get married and be known as Miss Movie Star's husband, for which we can't blame them. We ask you—what's a girl to do?

of thought is impossible at the huge Hollywood parties: "How can you have a mental contact with two hundred persons? These parties have no reason for being—except for the sake of politics and publicity. I never have more than three persons at my house at one time. There is no real conversation with more.

"In the same breath, I would stand up any time and defend Hollywood. After having been in every important capital in the world and in contact with persons in every artistic, literary, scientific, and political field, I must say, truthfully, that I have never found any group which is basically so unassuming as the people of Hollywood. They are not arrogant or swell-headed. In fact, they are surprisingly unconscious of their talents, capacities and abilities. Most of them don't know how good they are!

"In general, Americans are very similar in their natural artistic qualities. They are endowed, as the Russians are, with a sense of art that comes perfectly natural to them. You see what I mean? Being something without knowing it. Effective—as a child is effective—a child who has all the loveable childish qualities, without being aware of them."

Personally, I think that is one of the nicest compliments ever paid Hollywood.

"In Prague, Vienna and Paris, I used to watch the actors coming out of the theatre, on the street, in restaurants. They had an 'air.' They carried themselves as beings apart—they were 'of the theatre.' In Russia, they come off like a lot of stagehands. Just people. They did all their acting on the stage. They become simple uncomplicated people until they go back to the theatre.

"It is rather like that in Hollywood. At first it amazed me. Now I take it for granted."

HIS house is a corner of the Old World on a Hollywood hillside, across from the famous Japanese Gardens. The place was built by an Italian with an ecclesiastical attitude which came out in stained glass windows and a peaceful monastic feeling. Only the roof is visible from the street. One descends flights and flights of steps made of fine old tile, intricately fitted, and beautifully covered at the sides with vines and tangled shrubbery. Crumbling statues and fountains present little vistas along the way.

The house proper has entrances at four levels. It roams down and down the hillside, each set of rooms on a different level. It is enchanting within. An aura of genuine antiquity hovers over all the fine old furniture, the worn good rugs, and color—the house sings with it. It was quite a relief after these white funeral-parlors masquerading as drawing-rooms all over town.

The living-room is lined with books up to the ceiling—all the books you'd ever want to read. Biography, science, philosophy, eugenics, history, criminology, a good section on religion. Very few novels. They looked read—not as if they had come with the house. When you talk with Lederer, you know they have been read, and discussed, and digested.

"Just recently, after seeing 'Ah Wilderness,' I came out of the theatre unable to suppress a lifted-up feeling. I threw out my arms and breathed deeply and shouted and felt fine and good and happy. Why not?

"People are too afraid to feel. There is nothing so detrimental to any art—including the great art of living—as this pseudo-sophistication, this ridiculing the natural feeling of people. There is a 'smart' tendency to belittle all the true, simple, human feelings—feelings any artist in any medium is worthless without. The more capacity for feeling he has, the greater capacity for portraying it.

"An actor, particularly, must be interested in everything. He should find nothing uninteresting. For that matter, why should anyone who is alive find anything uninteresting?" Lederer is pretty good at asking questions, too, rhetorical questions that are difficult to answer. He does not smoke or drink, and it is not a pose. "Drinking would make me look at things through untruth. I would be influenced, fool myself. I don't want to fool anybody, myself included."

During the course of our conversation, I offered to lend him a book I thought would interest him. We were discussing Russia, and Walter Duranty's "I Write As I Please" came to mind. Lederer, with exquisite politeness, declined to borrow the book. It was startling, because I have learned after years of painful experience, not to lend my books indiscriminately. But to have an offer refused! He went to the telephone and ordered a copy of the book from his bookseller. Then he explained, "If a book is worth reading, it is worth buying, if one has the means to buy it. That is why I refuse to borrow books."

He maintains the largest office staff of any Hollywood player, in case you have an idea he is impractical. Seven office rooms with a manager, secretary, bookkeeper and four typists to answer correspondence, as well as a switchboard operator. His World Peace Federation requires another secretary and a court reporter who transcribes his speeches, plus from three to twelve clerks, depending on the scope of his current campaign. In addition to all this, he has a news-service department which answers queries about his various activities—an editor, secretary and a translator.

Maybe he is "strange," as Hollywood defines it. I think he is one of the few genuine altruists and definitely quite a guy.

SKIN TROUBLES
Vanish Like Magic!

When You Strike at the Real Cause of Blemishes

PIMPLES, blemishes, eruptions—their real cause is more than skin deep. They come from within. In countless cases where all ordinary beauty aids fail utterly, these ugly blemishes are simply evidence of poisonous accumulations which a sluggish system has failed to throw off properly.

That's why thousands write "Yeast Foam Tablets cleared up my skin like magic after everything else failed." Science knows that the weakened, sluggish internal condition responsible for so many blemished skins is due to one thing—shortage of Vitamin B Complex in the diet. And Yeast Foam Tablets correct this shortage. No richer natural source of this vital corrective factor is known today than pure whole yeast—and Yeast Foam Tablets are pure whole yeast.

Win back the clear, glowing beauty that's rightfully yours—by starting now to cleanse your system of beauty-stealing wastes. Ask your druggist for Yeast Foam Tablets—and refuse substitutes.

MANY NEVER SUSPECT CAUSE OF BACKACHES

This Old Treatment Often Brings Happy Relief Of Pain

Many sufferers relieve nagging backache quickly, once they discover that the real cause of their trouble may be tired kidneys.

The kidneys are one of Nature's chief ways of taking the acids and waste out of the blood. If they don't pass 3 pints a day and so get rid of more than 3 pounds of waste matter, your 15 miles of kidney tubes may need flushing.

If you have trouble with frequent bladder passages with scanty amount which often smart and burn, the 15 miles of kidney tubes may need flushing out. This danger signal may be the beginning of nagging backache, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes and dizziness.

Don't wait for serious trouble. Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills — used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help flush out the 15 miles of kidney tubes. Get Doan's Pills.

Should a Woman Tell Her Past?

man to tell everything that's happened in your life before you met him. It's giving him ammunition for your defense if the occasion arises when he must defend you.

"Yes, you run the risk that he won't understand, that he will think, 'If she's been in love with anyone else, then how can she be sure she's in love with me now?' You run the risk of hurting him deeply, of making him jealous, of maybe making him afraid that some day someone else will come along that you'll love. But, if he can't understand that you're doing a difficult thing simply because you do love him and simply to put your marriage on a firm foundation, then he isn't the right sort of man.

ALONG that line I'd like to say something to the men. For heaven's sake, remember the fact that it's terribly hard for a woman to tell you about the other men in her life. Appreciate the fact that she loves you enough to do it. And when she tells you, take it with sympathy, understanding and respect.

"Don't do the things that she's afraid you'll do. Don't be hurt. Don't be jealous. Don't berate her. Just consider yourself lucky to get a woman who has the courage to be completely honest.

"When a love is started with honesty and understanding it can't fail. When the slate is wiped clean, there's no reason why it should be embarrassing for either the man or the girl to see anyone she's known before. That past is dead, when it's confessed. It's finished, when it's told. There is nothing so dead as a dead love and there is no reason for feeling uncomfortable when those ghosts from the past appear—no reason, that is, if you're perfectly honest.

"I suppose I should say that the ideal way for perfect happiness is when two people, who have never loved before, love each other. Sometimes that works out all right. But if the roles I've played on the screen—those sophisticated, worldly roles—haven't taught me anything else, they've made me realize that nine times out of ten a woman who has had other men in her life makes just as dutiful, just as loving a wife as a woman whose husband is the first man she's ever loved.

"In fact, a woman who has been in love before brings to her husband a knowledge and an understanding that she might not otherwise have had. And if she has been the victim of an unhappy love, she brings her husband gratitude for her present happiness.

"Girls who have not known the rocky path that love sometimes takes are apt to expect too much of it, to demand more than can be given.

"So, by all means, tell your past, no matter how little a past it may be. Tell it and start out honestly."

Gertrude laughed. "Does that sound like a sermon?" she asked.

"A fairly sophisticated one, I must admit," I answered.

"The funny part is," Gertrude went on, "I could preach another one from just the opposite point of view. When I was a kid I did preach in the pulpit. I took the minister's place whenever he was gone. And I used to take a certain text one Sunday and the next week I'd contradict it. I could prove both points, too, and I did that for a purpose—to prove that every question actually has two sides.

"This question has two sides, also. A girl may, of course, fall in love with a lad who wouldn't understand, who wouldn't take the right viewpoint at all. That's her very bad luck but, I suppose, in that case she has to figure out the best way for herself. All I know about anything connected with life and living is that unless you're honest you're lost. Unless you have courage there is no way for you to combat life."

No one knows that better than Gertrude Michael, for if she had not had courage, she would not be in Hollywood today. She was the girl who was rushed out from the New York stage to sign a contract with M-G-M. They were in such a big hurry to have her that she was asked to fly out. And then she sat in her little dressing-room for weeks, waiting for them to give her a screen part. They let her sit. And when her contract expired, they did not renew. So, in a strange town, a town of which she had expected so much she found herself without a job.

Such a contingency couldn't daunt her. She kept her chin up and fired herself with the determination that she would not be licked. She wasn't.

The Paramount contract came along. She has been, lately, climbing steadily. You've already seen her in a lot of pictures, but wait until you see her with Herbert Marshall in "Till We Meet Again." She's grand.

Her present Hollywood escort is Rouben Mamoulian, Garbo's ex-flame. Gertrude is a glamorous, exciting person. But more than that she's honest. And I believe that if you're faced with the "should a woman tell?" problem, you'll be grateful to Gertrude for such wonderful advice.

After hearing Gertrude's feminine views on this absorbing subject, I decided it was only fair to the men, to give them a break. So I decided to ask one of Hollywood's top-notch men stars whether he thought a gal ought to talk about her past loves to the man she is going to marry.

IT was John Boles to whom I went—John Boles with that marvelous combination of good common sense and gay romanticism, inherited from his Dutch and Irish ancestors. John is one of the most intelligent men I know. He has, during the years he has been on the stage and in pictures, learned a great deal about the world and its men and women and has made a grand success of his marriage to the lovely Mrs. Boles. He has an amazing sense of values and the ability to weigh a problem with his intellect and then soften the decision with the things his heart tells him. So I put the same question up to him.

"Good heavens," he laughed, "I'm really not an oracle. Who am I," he asked modestly, "to set myself up to solve the human relationships of the world?"

I answered, "I'm not asking you to expound. I'm asking you only to discuss this with me and, from what you have observed of men and women, to tell me what you think."

"There aren't any hard and fast rules for human conduct, are there?" he asked. "It would make life more simple if there were. One could not possibly say, 'Don't tell your future husband about the other men in your life,' or 'Do tell him.' But this advice can be given, 'Study your man. Learn his thought processes well and be guided by that.'

"Suppose a girl is engaged to a romantic, idealistic boy, who loves her for herself and not for anything she has done or hasn't done. But because he's an idealist by nature he idealizes her. It would be a shock to that boy to have his sweetheart tell him that she had loved and been loved by other men. Because he is a dreamer, and lives in his world of dreams, it is better for him not to know.

"Nor should the girl feel any compunctions about omitting to discuss her life before she knew him. It is not our deeds which make us intelligent people, it is our mental reactions to our deeds and what we learn from them.

"And what, you ask, if this idealistic boy finds out later that the girl has been in love before? For one thing, by that time he may have had some of his sentimentality rubbed off by life. If not, then if he truly loves her and she him, she can explain it all away, can convince him by her own sincerity that he is the one she truly loves and that the men she knew before she met him are not important.

"The reason I warn the girl in love with this type of boy to behave in this fashion is because there is nothing so bad—for either a man or a woman—as the first disillusion, the first hurt. Nothing that comes later can approach that in intensity. It's like first success. No matter how high my salary might go, no matter if I played a scene better than any actor in the world, nothing could be so thrilling to me as the signing of my first theatrical contract. And a friend of mine, a writer, whose book shelves are filled with dozens of erudite books written by himself, told me once that they could not mean a tenth as much to him as did the first inconsequential short story that he had published.

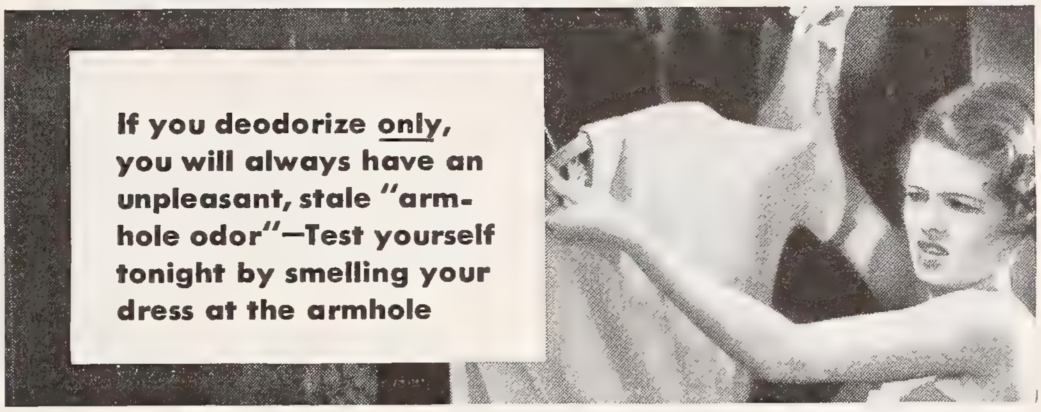
"Just as the first success is always the best, so is the first hurt invariably the worst.

BUT if a girl falls in love with a worldly and sophisticated man, a man who has lived through his first disillusions, who knows the world of reality for what it is then she can, if she likes, tell him anything she chooses about other men she has known. He no longer expects life to be as it is in romantic novels. He knows that it is natural for girls to flirt and that assuredly she has been in love (or thought she was) before he knew her, just as he has been in love (or thought he was) with other women. I don't think that, even then, the girl should make a fuss over it—should make a point of going to him and telling him everything that she has done or thought before she met him. It attaches too much importance to deeds. For, as I've said before and as I so truly believe, it is not what you do or have done that counts—it's what you are.

"Mind you, I'm telling you only what I've observed. I may be all wrong. I've never thought of myself as a Beatrice Fairfax, nor do I want to play that role now. You trapped me into all this by asking me to discuss this, but I'm not opening any courts of human relationship. I couldn't, by the farthest stretch of the imagination, solve complicated personal problems. But this I have observed—that there would be much more happiness between men and women if the sexes studied each other more than they do. If a woman would take the trouble to learn how a man thinks and if he would learn what goes on in her heart.

"For this I know is true, the strongest and most lasting appeal between a man and woman is the mental appeal. There can be no real companionship, no lasting happiness without that."

You may blush with shame when you make this "Armhole Odor" Test



If you deodorize only, you will always have an unpleasant, stale "armhole odor"—Test yourself tonight by smelling your dress at the armhole

THE more fastidious you are, the more shocked you may be to realize you cannot prevent armhole odor unless your underarm is dry as well as sweet.

Tonight, when you take off your dress, smell the fabric under the arm. No matter how carefully you deodorize your underarm, you may find that your dress carries the odor of stale perspiration!

This is bound to happen if you merely deodorize. Creams and sticks cannot protect completely, because they are not made to stop perspiration. They do not keep the underarm dry, so perspiration collects on the fabric of your dress.

The next time you wear that seemingly clean dress, the warmth of your body brings out an unpleasant "armhole odor" which is imperceptible to you, but embarrassingly obvious to those around you!

Only one way to be SURE

Women who care about good grooming know there is no shortcut to underarm daintiness. They insist on the complete protection of Liquid Odorono. It keeps the underarm not only sweet, but absolutely dry. Not even a drop of moisture can collect on your dress.

Odorono is entirely safe . . . ask your doctor. It gently closes the pores in that little hollow of the underarm. Perspiration is merely diverted to less confined areas where it may evaporate freely. Women safely use millions of bottles of Odorono yearly.

Time well spent—Clothes saved

It takes a few seconds longer to use Odorono but it is well worth your while. There is no grease to get on your clothes. And expensive dresses can no longer be stained and ruined in a single wearing. You need never worry about your daintiness or your clothes again!

Odorono comes in two strengths—Regular and Instant. You need use Regular Odorono (Ruby colored) only twice a week. Instant Odorono (Colorless) is for especially sensitive skin or quick emergency use—to be used daily or every other day. Keep both kinds on hand—for night or morning use. At all toilet-goods counters.

To know utter security and poise, send for sample vials of both Odoronos and leaflet on complete underarm dryness offered below.

her contractual affairs. Last year she employed a booking agent. The time that she saved went into talking building and blue-print plans with the architect.

AS a business woman, Hollywood film producers and executives admire Irene Dunne's ability. As a woman and a beauty, they . . . but that's another story. Nothing flatters Irene more than to have a producer telephone her and consult her on a film he is about to cast, particularly when it is not her own. They know that she has sound judgment; clear, unbiased vision.

As an actress, La Dunne is noted for her equable disposition. "There is never any trouble on our sets," she says. "Maybe it is because of my name. Irene means 'peace,' you know." You get the idea that working on a Dunne picture is like life in one big happy family. Unless you would recognize the piquant turn of her classically-shaped nose (she's half Irish, of course) and her five feet, five inches of excellent figure, you might not know her as the star of the production, if you walked on her set.

Chances are, studio workers say, she is asking her stand-in about the latest colony gossip, or sitting on a chair in the corner talking to an anybody. Dunne is a friend of the worker, as was shown by her recent order to a local knitting house. She had sweaters made for all the set workers who were with her on "Show Boat."

Dunne's appearance is deceiving. Under her reposeful appearance is probably the best organized unit for getting its way that Hollywood has ever known. Irene Dunne doesn't believe in temperamental display but by a method, far more effective, she manages to win the director, producer, co-star, and cameraman over to her manner of thinking. She makes intelligent use of "controlled temperament." This, she admits.

With subtle suggestion, she can completely reverse the playing of a scene, and make the director and others think it was their own idea. There's genius in that ability. By the same manner, she can adroitly turn the questions that an interviewer is asking her, into questions about him. A studio publicity man lamented this to me. "I put off writing my biography on Miss Dunne, thinking that I'd know more about her at the end of the picture," he said. "I know as much about her now—what she thinks, what she does—as I did when she first walked onto the set.

"I know she's intelligent. I know that she makes an intelligent attack on any part that is given her, rationalizing, analyzing its essence. She applies what she knows about tempo and rhythm, from her singing, to her acting. A scene in 'Show Boat' called for her to enter an empty cafe where only a negro porter was mopping the floor. She was to walk across the set, seat herself on a stairway near where the negro stood and commence to sing. The way the scene was written there wasn't time for her to gather her full skirts about her, escape the mop's movement, seat herself on the stairs, and sing. Miss Dunne knew just what was wrong. She convinced the director that the scene, as written, was almost impossible to play. It was re-written according to her suggestions."

SCREEN acting has opened a new field for Dunne's creative imagination. Before this, she thoroughly investigated the world of song and musical comedy. Life will never let her learn all that she wants to know. It is too short for Dunne's curious, inquisitive mind. Even falling downstairs, these days, is a valuable experience for Dunne, although she does not indulge in it much. "I find myself analyzing my sensations as I fall, and my reactions," she says, "thinking that some day, in some film, I may be called upon actually to fall downstairs."

Analyzing herself, Irene Dunne feels that she has paid a dear price for success. "I feel that I have sacrificed a great deal. I have lost all the precious things of domestic life, a real home, the constant companionship of a husband, children." Her life, as lived now, is almost as inviolate as one of the Sisters of her faith. Her dentist husband continues his profession in New York. It is there that Irene, between pictures, hurries to visit him. Her marriage, successful, although long-distanced, is one of the major wonders of Hollywood.

Irene and her husband, because of their necessary separation, subscribe to the English custom of "ginks." A "gink," according to Lady Cavendish (Adele Astaire, Fred's sister), is a gentleman who takes a wife to lunch, tea, dinner and the theatre, when her husband is hard at his profession. Any number of Hollywood gentlemen consider it a pleasure to squire Irene Dunne to the better colony parties and to Los Angeles socialites' affairs, although they probably don't know what their English cousins call them.

But of these entirely civilized relationships, Dunne is a little wary. "I don't believe in going too frequently with the same man. Constant companionship of that sort quite naturally gives him the thought that he can see too much of me, and I am not interested in anything like that."

However, Dunne's spare time is ably used these days when she is not doing the hundreds of duties attendant upon a Hollywood star. With her French chateau nearly completed she is in daily conference with the interior decorator, who is assisting her in furnishing her home. Many pieces from her New York apartment have been shipped here for use. As always, Dunne dazzles the decorator with her superior knowledge of fabrics, periods, antiques. She has not told him that she keeps just one chapter ahead of him in her new book on interior decorating. When she was glibly talking to him about Fortuni prints and drapes, spare moments found her hurriedly reading up on floor coverings, the subject that would next occupy their joint attentions.

With all the hard-headed shrewdness that she displays in the conduct of her business and her personal life, it seems strange to find Dunne dominated by a single fear. She is not afraid to die. Like Shakespeare's Capulet, she feels "we were born to die." She is not afraid of losing her success. She said, "No one can keep it forever. That I know only too well. And who wants to? If you have had your day in the sun, go on to the other days, do other things. The trouble with life is that it gives us too little time to learn and practice all the things that are to be done.

"The thing that frightens me is fast, reckless driving. I have a horror of motor accidents, probably because I have had several narrow escapes from serious injury. But I think my fear stems from a time before the near smash-ups. My father, who died when I was about twelve, was a Federal inspector of steam boats. He was Captain Joseph J. Dunne, and before he became a government inspector, he was an Ohio River boat builder. My brother and I, from the time we were old enough to understand the grave dangers of mishaps, were taught by my father to be very careful in avoiding them. Safety was always the uppermost thought in my father's mind. If it has become almost an obsession with me, I blame it on paternal influence.

Anita Louise, leaving for New York's smart St. Moritz Hotel, before sailing for Europe with her mother.

"In making a boat trip, you never bother to see where your life boat is the very first moment that you set foot on the ship, do you? Of course, you don't! Nor do you look about to see that your life belt is in the proper place. Few people do, instead they almost have to be hauled out on deck to see what precautions have been taken for their safety in case of accident. With me, when I travel, I instinctively inspect all these safety devices as soon as I board boat, train or plane—my father's caution, his words of advice, are so deeply grooved in my mind.

"It seems silly to rent a car with a good, steady chauffeur when I am in New York. All he does is wait in front of my apartment to take me to the hairdresser's, shopping or to the theatres, but that is exactly what I do. I simply can't stand the reckless driving of New York's taxi drivers. And, yet, if I am at the wheel, I will tear along at sixty miles or more an hour, and love it. My friends consider me a fast driver. But it is because I have confidence in myself that makes me unafraid when I drive."

Dunne's self-confidence has been the keynote of her successful career that led from Broadway's "Show Boat," into films. It's her conscience—sweet, Irish, true—that has won her many friends and film fans. It's her conscience, too, that makes her admit the lowly baked potato as her favorite food. "Crossing to Europe one time," she says, "a baked potato with salt, pepper, and no butter, was the only thing I could eat. I made up my mind then that if anyone ever asked me what my favorite food was, I'd reward the potato for its kindness to me.

"MY, HASN'T SHE CHANGED!"

. . . what do they say behind your back?

SHE was once one of the loveliest girls in her set. But her complexion has lost its rose-petal freshness, and gained untimely wrinkles. Her laugh is no longer carefree, but strained — and a little frightened. She really hasn't been herself for years.

Her friends are secretly shocked at the change. Her acquaintances are a little more outspoken — when she leaves the room. For no woman can continue to neglect her health without paying in the precious coin of her youth.

So many women are careless about menus — forgetting that a poorly balanced diet, over a period of years, can erase much of their charm and vivacity. In some cases, common constipation contributes to their troubles.

Common constipation is usually the result of insufficient "bulk" in the meals you eat. Fortunately, a delicious cereal supplies this "bulk." The "bulk" in Kellogg's ALL-BRAN absorbs moisture, forms a soft mass, gently cleanses the system.

Two tablespoonfuls daily are usually sufficient. Stubborn cases may require ALL-BRAN oftener. If not relieved this way, see your doctor.

Kellogg's ALL-BRAN makes no claim to be a "cure-all"— but it does correct constipation due to insufficient "bulk." Guaranteed by the Kellogg Company. Serve ALL-BRAN as a cereal, or cook into tempting muffins, breads, etc. Sold by all grocers. Made by Kellogg in Battle Creek.

WAKE UP YOUR LIVER BILE—WITHOUT CALOMEL

And You'll Jump out of Bed in the Morning Rarin' to Go

THE liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile onto the food you swallow every day. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

A mere movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". Harmless, gentle, yet amazing in making bile flow freely. Ask for Carter's Little Liver Pills by name. Stubbornly refuse anything else. 25c at all drug stores. © 1935 C. M CO guy on the lot. He knows the first name of every electrician, chauffeur and stenographer he's worked with. He sends cases of Campbell's soup and tomato juice to those kids he knows, and the kids proudly prattle to their neighbors about their "pal," Dick Powell.

Close-up of Dick

Then there's his dog, Ranger. Ranger is a handsome thoroughbred police pup. Several months ago he belonged to a friend of Dick's, who was going East and wanted to leave him with Powell. But Dick declined the responsibility, saying: "I'll get too attached to him. You'll have to leave him with someone else, or give him to me." So Ranger was given to Dick, and since then they've become best friends.

All winter long Ranger watched Dick swim in the pool at his new Toluca Lake home, and decided that swimming was a trick he must learn. So every morning at 7:00, work day or holiday, Ranger pounces on Dick's bed to wake him for their morning workout. If Dick wants to swim in solitude, he has to lock Ranger up, else the pup will dive in every time he dives, and swim out only to make a running jump back into the pool to land on his master's shoulders. Nowadays the greatest sport among Dick's friends is avoiding Ranger's running dives, for a 150 pound dog's landing unexpectedly on one's head is apt to be a bit of a surprise!

Dick's girl friends tell with fond amusement of the steps he first took toward furnishing his new Toluca Lake home, which is his present hobby and the pride of his life. Dick personally devised or designed every gadget in the house, and let me assure you that there are plenty of them! Incidentally, his first purchase for the house, before even the lights were in, was a $35 set of exquisite Bavarian service plates! They must have been rather an odd picture, stacked in the middle of the dining room floor, seen by a dim flash light penetrating the gloom of a late November Sunday afternoon! And next he bought a pair of Sheffield plate candlesticks.

HIS furnishing system seems to be the example par excellence of the old Greek theory that all things are forever in a state of flux—no matter how frequently one is invited to Dick's menage, one never finds the same furniture twice in the same place; in fact, one seldom finds the same furniture twice at all. It's like a circulating furniture exhibit! He's had at least a dozen different furniture suites in the living room, and they've been rearranged as many dozens of times. Once he had two sofas and all of the overstuffed chairs upholstered to match the figured chintz draperies; there remains one love seat matching the draperies! When his mother was out in California, last year, she begged his friends not to suggest any more changes, protesting that there hadn't been any furniture in the house more than two days throughout her visit. Today Dick admits that he's satisfied with one corner of his living room.

In the great play room is found the 200-pound scrapbook that a married couple back in Pittsburgh surprised him with last year. In this massive volume there are accounts of Dick's accomplishments, since the days when he started out as a singer with the Kentucky Cardinals in St. Louis and Indianapolis, and it carries on the story of his achievements step by step. 200 pounds of published history of Dick Powell!

Once in awhile one can get Dick himself to reminisce about those earlier years covered in his scrapbook, and before. When he was five years old, he confesses, he did his first professional vocalizing. A railroad engineer gave him five pennies for singing "Casey Jones," and thereafter every time Dick wanted a nickel he would hunt up the engineer and render a lusty interpretation of "Casey Jones." It got to the point where the engineer would dodge down alleyways or behind hitching posts when he saw or heard young Powell coming!

And he tells about his most embarrassing moment, back in Pittsburgh, where for several years, he was the local wit and matinee idol. Doing four performances a day and rehearsing in between, Dick explains, one is apt to become groggy and perform one's duties with automatic absent-mindedness. One day he was greeted with shrieks and guffaws as he walked onto the stage, and it wasn't till some time afterward that a musician was able to whisper to him that he'd forgotten his tuxedo tie and collar, and that his trousers were unbuttoned!

BUT even these stories, the human incidents and accidents that only his intimate friends know, do not explain Dick Powell. For there's a serious side to this hero of stereotyped musical productions, this romantic crooner whom O. O. McIntyre salutes as the best master of ceremonies on the air, of which even his intimates are not aware. In the first place, though Dick asserts that he is completely happy and that there's nothing unusual about the things he does or feels or thinks, still Dick Powell has known great physical pain—and a great self-consciousness complex. He is not the light-hearted juvenile he forever appears to be in pictures, although he is ever the gay host and social comrade. Dick Powell never mentions his disappointments nor his pains; he does not believe in burdening others with his personal woes.

And yet, when you attempt to discuss this side of his character makeup with him, Dick denies it shortly, fearing you will jump to the conclusion that he's a melodramatic Pagliacci, a ham actor who's yearning for Hamlet roles, or a crooner with the "Met" complex. He knows his type, and his limitations. Just the other day a resourceful publicity man persuaded a syndicate movie chatterer that Dick had declined offers from the Metropolitan Opera Company on a recent trip to New York. But Dick heard about the story, and prohibited its publication. He refuses to commit sensational stunts just to court publicity, and insists that if the truth isn't interesting enough, he prefers to go without publicity.

"I don't feel that I've achieved anything, in comparison to what I want to achieve," Dick answered my bromide about "to what do you attribute your success?" He wants to be as fine an actor as it is possible to become—as fine an actor as he considers Helen Hayes an actress, but he hastily protests that "I'm not dissatisfied with the work I've been given. I haven't had a real vacation in ten years, but I'm grateful for having been employed steadily all that time. If a person is given the same type of role repeatedly, the reason is that that type of picture is selling. And it seems pretty stupid to me to get dissatisfied when common sense will tell you that your studio will make that kind of picture till it's no longer 'box-office.' When that time has come, a change will be necessary and we always hope it will be a change for the better. But I'm not so ungrateful nor so conceited as to assume that I know more than my studio knows about what I can do and luck has been with me long enough to make me feel confident that when the time is ripe, better things will come."

THUS does Dick side-track your efforts to get at that serious, sensitive side of him that you know is hiding behind this gracious but seemingly cocky and wary screen and radio idol. He side-tracks you thusly about his romances, too, saying he has no time for serious romance just now. All very guarded, you see.

Many of us feel that even though filmlanders are prone to practice the celebrity's license of saying one thing and performing another, Dick probably will remain a bachelor for some time to come. He is very fond of Joan Blondell and they are very good friends. But, marriage? Well— Joan's divorce will not be final for many months. Dick was married once before, you know, when he was just out of his freshman year in college, and because that didn't work out, he is wary about plunging into another. He wants to marry again, yes, when he's reasonably sure it can be a mutually happy marriage.

From another tack I learned a little more. I heard that the physical examinations he underwent at Johns-Hopkins, when he went East to make "Annapolis," were to find the cause of his headaches, and as I too have had headaches, I inquired about the remedy the specialists prescribed. And because Dick thought that here was an opportunity to help someone, he finally "opened up."

In the first place, only the radio studio audiences and workers on the Warner Brothers lot knew that Dick Powell wore glasses. It was strange, watching him, for he never seemed to know whether he wanted them off or on. He would wear them for five minutes, and then, when he'd be holding his script or sheet music out at arm's length for reading it, he'd take the glasses off. But even those, who could see the coming and going of the glasses, didn't know about the headaches, didn't know about the two to four to six aspirins Dick took every day for over a year to ease them. These headaches came like great steel braces to clamp about his temples till his blood vessels throbbed and pulsed like drums in his ears, and it seemed as though great hammers had struck between his eyes with only red spots, whirrings and flashes of lightning piercing the blackness in front of him. No one who hasn't had headaches hour after hour, day after day, for weeks at a time, until the pain seems almost to drive the sanity and reason out of one, can know what they're like—and no one at all knew about Dick Powell's headaches. Perhaps these headaches are a partial reason for people's thinking him conceited. Perhaps the pain was so great that Dick was too ill and preoccupied to be as gracious as usual to his acquaintances, or to feel like being gay, friendly and conversational.

At any rate, when Dick described his headaches, I knew he had just cause for murder—those headaches alone explain lots of things. And he described them only in order to express, in contrast, the gratitude he feels and the abundant good health he has enjoyed since consulting the doctors at Johns-Hopkins.

"It's funny," explains Dick, "they really didn't do much beside examine me all over again. But finally, all they said was that I didn't need to wear glasses, and that I should do a few eye exercises every day. I threw my four pairs of specs into the wastebasket at the doctor's office then and there, and I've had only one headache since. That was at a movie, and I simply did the exercise of following the moving finger from a foot away from the eyes to an inch away, and after doing that a few times, even that headache left me."

AFTER this comparing of notes on headaches and the appreciation it brought of the agonies Dick had suffered, I told him outright that I had formerly thought him the most conceited upstart in pictures, at which he became very concerned and earnest.

"Now why, what do I do that makes everyone think I'm conceited? To be conceited, one must be stupid, I think—and I strive hard enough to keep out of that class.

"Do you know that I constantly violate studio instructions just to avoid being thought conceited? We're told to be aloof, mysterious, different and yet, how can one be when one likes people, all kinds of people, and can't bear hurting their feelings? Yet most people think I'm conceited. If I only knew what I could do to change their thinking that. I suppose I never can, though. Look at Al Jolson. He's the most sensitive, self-conscious fellow I know, and yet everyone thinks he's conceited, too.

"The hardest thing I've had to conquer and I haven't whipped it yet, is self-consciousness. I always feel scared and silly and conspicuous when I have to 'emote' for pictures—and people think I'm flippant and cold!"

But it was through discussing his trip home to Arkansas, last summer, I got to the philosophy of Dick's life, the ethics by which he lives, the sincerity with which he appreciates others' kindnesses, and the conscientiousness with which he works.

When Dick left Little Rock, Arkansas, as a young bridegroom just out of his first year in college, he declared to himself that he wouldn't go back until he had accomplished something which even the critical townsfolk would acknowledge as an achievement. Through the years it's been necessary for him to go back, occasionally, but it wasn't until last summer that he was able to achieve that sense of real accomplishment. Dick sacrificed a highly remunerative personal appearance tour to make that trip home, and while there he gave abandonedly of his services and time for a benefit show he staged for the Little Rock Boys' Club. The performance was an outstanding success, and raised enough money to keep a swimming pool open all the year around for the crippled and disabled children of the community. In recognition of his services, the Boys' Club honored him with a framed satin plaque commemorating the occasion, and Dick is more proud of that plaque than anything he possesses.

In the tone of his voice, as he described his home town and the loving neighbors there, you sensed the sincerity which emanates from the soul of Dick Powell, and subsequently, as he showed the various colored bath towels his mother had monogrammed "REP" (Richard Ewing Powell) for him on her recent visit here, I realized how appreciative he was of little things.

Later on he told me the corrections he would make if he could live his life over—finishing college and taking four additional years of law as a general preparation for any career, waiting until he was older to marry so that he'd know enough to make a success of his first marriage. He values the important things. Yet he's practical about it all. For instance, Dick observes: "After having been out of school and working in the world for awhile, one finds that the men who make a million a year work no harder than those who make a thousand a year—it's just that those who make the millions know where and how to spend their energy."

Such are the conclusions about life and living that Dick Powell has drawn, and he adds: "I don't waste any time regretting the mistakes I've made. I've been mighty lucky, and I'm so happy now that I'm afraid it won't last. Such happiness doesn't seem to last in this world. But no matter what the future holds, I refuse to worry, because I know it can't help any. Maybe it's a silly attitude, a stupid attitude, but I feel that no matter what one has to do, whether it be street sweeping or leading the country through a depression, if one does it to the best of his ability, everything else will take care of itself. Perhaps that's why I'm never drastically disappointed, for although I dream about things, I don't count on anything. I live for the day only."

Is that the remark of a flippant thinker, a self-satisfied egotist? I think not. And yet, that's the real Dick Powell!

Gene, Marry? Well—

I never wanted to be anything but an actor.

"I've never wavered in my one-track ambition, even as a child. I never, for instance, wanted to be a fireman or a street car conductor. I could look dispassionately on steam engines, steam rollers, Indian tepees, cowboy outfits and all the rest of the insignia of most lads' dreams.

"I loved adventure all right, but I loved it in books. I read 'Scaramouche,' 'The Sea Hawk' and 'The Three Musketeers' and longed to play them. I never brought my yearnings up to date with the hope of enlisting in a South American or a Mexican revolution.

"I just wanted to be an actor. And I want to continue to be an actor. And marriage would interfere with that continuance. . . .

"We won't go into the worn-out arguments against marriage in Hollywood. The subject has been worried and shaken around by writers until it is anemic. It's a matter of time, really. You have to have time to give to marriage. A screen actor has no time to give. You have to play leading man, and a darned adequate one, to your wife. A screen actor has no self to give. He is leading man to too many different women. The average girl wouldn't be expected to understand all this . . . the sketchy hours, the whole high-keyed pattern of the life. And to marry an actress would be to court almost certain disaster. I do not believe that two professionals can run harmoniously together in such abrasive double harness. That has been proven often enough to be conclusive.

"I shall marry eventually, of course. Actors are no different from other men. We want the stabilities other men have, too. But the life we lead is different, too different."

And I want to make a prophecy about Gene Raymond here and now. When he does finally marry it will not be one of those off-to-Yuma-by-night-plane elopements. It will not come as a surprise to his friends or to his fans. For there is something very conservative, and really rather sweet about Gene. He will have all of the "honorable traditions." The formal proposal. The engagement ring. The announcement. His bride-to-be will have time for showers and parties and the garnering of a hope chest. There will be a church wedding and parental blessings and rice and old shoes and a honeymoon.

"And I'll tell you just when I do hope to marry," Gene was saying as I came to again. "I hope to marry when I have reached the point in my career where I can be sure of making no more than two or three pictures a year. When I can dictate my own terms and my own time. Then and only then will I qualify as a husband. I can 'keep company' with my wife. We can travel and entertain and be together as man and wife should be. But I must reach that place before I can feel decent about asking any girl to share my life with me. For I must be able to share, too."

AND again I must interrupt Gene to make a mental prophecy. He will do just what he says he wants to do. For there is a granite strain in this blond young man. A strain of rigid self-discipline. I know that on New Year's Eve he decided to give up smoking for six months. At midnight, in the very midst of smoking a cigarette, he dunked it and has not had a single puff since. He will make up his mind not to go out for three weeks, to stay at home and read and study. Once his mind is made up, nothing can shake his determination.

"Will you answer a question?" I asked suddenly.

"If I can answer just 'yes' or 'no,' grinned Gene.

"Right," I said, "it's this. Have you ever been in love? I mean, when you talk of what you will and will not do about falling in love and marrying, do you know what you are talking about from experience?"

"Yes," said Gene.

"Then," I said, "you've been deeply enough in love to know the signs and symptoms called 'falling'? You know enough to run away when you feel them attacking you?"

"Yes," said Gene.

"Emotions are completely unpredictable, though, aren't they?" I persisted, feeling a strong impulse to shake him until two words dropped out instead of the guaranteed one.

"Yes," said Gene.

Then he added, amusement in his eyes, "Yes, of course, emotions are unpredictable. Your own heart is the joker in the pack. It's more apt to play tricks on you than not. I may fall so in love tomorrow afternoon at five-thirty o'clock that I won't know whether I'm an actor or an acrobat. But it's unlikely."

I agreed with him there. I am convinced that young Mr. Raymond is a cold proposition on the surface, that he has given himself a thorough coat of protective-coloration, so well applied that young Dora Cupid going a-gunning couldn't tell whether he might be a vulnerable young man or a tree-toad.

I thought, too, of the gamut this young man has run. He went to the Children's Professional School, with Helen Chandler and Marguerite Churchill among his classmates. He played in "Mirrors" on the New York stage with Sylvia Sidney and in "Take My Advice" with Genevieve Tobin. In Hollywood he made "Personal Maid" with Nancy Carroll, "Ladies of the Big House" with Sylvia Sidney, "Red Dust" with Jean Harlow, "Brief Moment" with Carole Lombard, "The House on 56th Street" with Kay Francis, "Zoo in Budapest" with Loretta Young. "I Am Suzanne" with Lilian Harvey, "Flying Down to Rio" with Dolores del Rio, "North Shore" opposite Barbara Stanwyck, "Seven Keys to Baldpate" with Margaret Callahan, "Don't Bet On Love," his latest, with Wendy Barrie. I'm reeling off these titles not to give you the titles, but to give you the lovely ladies he has worked with. And if a man can be subjected to such a beauty barrage of fire and remain even moderately sane—well, what do you think? He isn't likely to be too susceptible, is he?

Then, Gene has his "defenses." He explained them to me. Staying single is the easiest thing he does except for one fact—there are so many lovely ladies to trip the unwary heart. He makes this very fact work for him. For one of the greatest dangers of falling in love is propinquity. Propinquity with one person. And so he avoids that. He does not go out with any one girl too often.

SOMETIMES," said Gene, "I don't go out at all, for long periods. I get spells where I want to be on the go all of the time—weeks when I go lunching, dining, dancing almost constantly. Then more weeks when I don't go out at all—stay at home with my mother and my brother Robert (he's musical and wants to have his own band. He's clever and undoubtedly will have one), and read and study and take long rides by myself.

"I have so many things I want to do, you know," Gene said. "An actor's life has limitations. I recognize them and want to prepare to write and direct. I'd like to head an independent producing unit at a major Hollywood studio. I make it a point to study the methods of the various directors with whom I work. I am also studying music, languages, literature. A man with only one string to his bow is liable to find himself without a target to aim at, you know."

He's not content either with the things he has done on the screen. He wants to do costume pictures. The Sabatini type of hero—swashbuckling, do-and-darish.

And it might interest you to know that Gene has worked toward that as yet unrealized Sabatini-ish end for years. He went to a gym in New York for years. He studied fencing. He studied riding. He played golf and tennis. He is not really the sophisticated drawing-room type at all. Thus far he hasn't been able to sell a producer the idea that he can break a lance and rescue a ladye faire with the best of the "Bloods" and "Fletcher Christians." But he's going to convince someone one of these days, or know why.

"Can't you see why I don't want to marry, yet?" Gene asked. "I want perfection in my marriage. I can't give toward that perfection what I want to give until I've accomplished some of the things I've planned. I'm looking forward to marriage as the real goal of my career, the real Grail for which working is only a part of the seeking."

And the Bride Wore...

natural colored linen lace, made with a tiny high collar piped in linen and with short puff sleeves. Dozens of little linen-covered buttons march from neckline to hem. And like her other lace dress, small patch pockets are a unique detail of the flared skirt. A snugly fitted linen jacket tops this dress. The exaggerated shoulder line and nipped-in waist are features of this, too. Giddiest of all are Ginger's accessories for this costume. A saucy pill box hat and a huge jabot of violets on silk—the hat is completely covered with the violets. Natural colored linen strap slippers complete the costume.

Ginger said that she liked lounging pajamas better than negligees in her own trousseau. As it happened she was buying a new pajama suit to replace a trousseau one which was quite worn out now. Her new one was so smart that I have shown it on page 65. It's a three-piece affair, the long white crepe coat faced back with a bright paisley print. Trousers are of the print and the tailored, short-sleeved shirt of white crepe is laced with a string of the print. It's a perfect pajama for summer because it is tailored enough to wear about the house and out into the garden.

Other "musts" for your trousseau, according to Ginger, should be a fluffy dinner gown, one or two evening dresses, a black or white velvet evening wrap, a sports coat—she likes camels hair for this—and several simple sports or daytime dresses gauged to your own needs.

GINGER'S wedding gown was lace in her favorite shade, a pale yellow-green. And funny enough, even though she has been married for nearly two years, the same dress would be charming this summer, so well chosen was it. The fitted blouse had a short peplum and the skirt was made long and gracefully wide. A medium-brimmed green straw hat was trimmed with a short veil of the same lace as the dress. For flowers, Ginger carried a flat spray of calla lilies with gardenias laid along the stems. Simply a charming costume for any bride who wants to break away from the conventional white gown and a veil.

Before leaving Ginger to go on to the subject of wedding gowns, I want to mention what she wears for a foundation garment. Being so very slender, a pair of knitted elastic pants serves adequately in lieu of a more confining girdle. These are a satin and elastic knit combination and are perfect for all you young things who have mere pencils for figures. However, for you who do need some real figure control, and most of us do, an all-in-one is an excellent choice. There is a slick one on the market made of satin with knitted elastic at the hips, where you need it. The top and uplift bust of this garment are made of lace, reinforced with net. The satin is cleverly reinforced and boned in back and over the diaphragm.

And for summer, there is another type of foundation you should have in your trousseau. It's cool yet gives you all the support you need. It's made of a silk-covered elastic net. Off the body it looks shirred but on it's smooth as a glove and very sheer. Another grand point is that it's seamless except for a slender front panel of satin. The bust part is in uplift style and the back is cut low.

Now for wedding finery. The general trend in wedding gowns seems to be toward the period style. And you can pick almost any period you like, the bouffant Victorian or the slender Regency with the high waist, or the simple draped modern gown—and any of a dozen others. Flowers play a big part in veil arrangements, just as they do in hair styles, this summer. And you'll find that it will be fun to experiment with unusual flowers, rather than the traditional orange blossoms. The halo type of wedding veil arrangement is very effective for you who look well in off-the-face hats. Bonnets, too, are charming, especially when the veil billows forth from under the brim at back.

Sally Blane, when she married Norman Foster, wore a short tulle veil which covered her face and reached only to just below her shoulders in back. Her wedding gown, of white velvet, had a period feeling in its square neckline and standing ruche of velvet. The skirt was straight and long with a slight train at back. Her bouquet was in shower effect, made of white orchids and lily-of-the-valley. Altogether it was a beautiful ensemble. And a hint to bridegrooms, Norman wore a spray of Sally's lily-of-the-valley in his buttonhole.

IN "Showboat" Irene Dunne wears a wedding gown of the nineties that has a lovely wedding veil arrangement. The veil springs from a tiara of waxed orange blossoms, worn well back on the head and showing a fluffy curled bang at front. This veil is tulle and is very long. Irene's dress boasts a bustle and many ruffles in the manner of that period. Her bouquet is a grand tip for you who wear your mothers' wedding gowns for it is so in keeping with the period. Of white roses and lily-of-the-valley, it is surrounded by a white lace frill, in the manner of a Valentine nosegay, only large.

There's a new shade that is being promoted by smart shops in their wedding displays. It is an off-white on a pale mauve cast. Nice for you who like the unusual and want to be up to the minute in your wedding. Delicate pink and an icy blue white, as well as an oyster white are all variations of the pure or cream white shade.

Satin is first in fabrics with chiffon, crepe, taffeta, net, lace and tulle-over-taffeta running close in popular choice.

Shirley Deane wears a taffeta wedding gown in "The First Baby" which offers ideas for all of you. You can see it on page 66. There's a quaint charm about it such as there would be to one handed down by your grandmother. An unusual drape effect is given the upper sleeve by means of the tight shoulder shirring. And shirring is repeated across the bodice. The tulle ruche and the file of pearl buttons down the front are perfect accents to the tight fitting bodice. Shirley's veil is in two lengths of tulle with flowers outlining the cap. Her bouquet is unique, too, being a muff of gardenias and fern with gardenia-trimmed streamers.

Anita Louise wears a perfect bridesmaid's hat. Of finest straw, its wide brim and crown is crossed in the center by an open mesh veil which forms a chin band underneath. Flowers circling the crown, are repeated again in a small bunch under the brim.

Pat Paterson, another bride of a few years ago, wears a lace gown that could be a charming bridesmaid's costume. Mauve lace is the fabric, the top designed with an off-the-shoulder effect and puff sleeves, and the skirt slender through the hips but with godets introduced to give a smart flare below. A pink taffeta bow and pink shoulder straps are the only decorative details. Pat's flower trimming for her hair is an excellent suggestion for the wedding party that doesn't wear hats. These could be real flowers, echoing the bouquets the attendants carry.

And there's nothing like a very practical tip to close our bridal story. Both the bride and her bridesmaids can have colored gloves to match their costumes with no effort and hardly any expense.

Dye white fabric ones in the colors you want! It's so easy, all you need are some of the grand little dye wafers that are on the market. You can either use the colors these wafers come in—or you can combine several wafers to get the latest color scheme. For instance, here are two color recipes: To get a dusky rose shade, you combine a half wafer of tan with an eighth wafer of scarlet. And for a royal blue, combine a half wafer of dark blue with an eighth wafer of rose pink. She knows her MEN!

THE girl who gets the invitations is the girl who knows how to please the men!

She takes great pains to learn their likes and their dislikes.

One of the first things she learns is that nothing so quickly prejudices a man against a girl as the ugly odor of underarm perspiration on her clothing and her person.

And so she runs no risk of this danger. For she knows how easy it is to avoid —with Mum!

Just half a minute is all you need to use this dainty deodorant cream. Then you're safe for the whole day!

Another thing you'll like—use Mum any time, even after you're dressed. For it's harmless to clothing.

It's soothing to the skin, too—so soothing you can use it right after shaving your underarms.

Mum, you know, doesn't prevent natural perspiration. But it does prevent every trace of perspiration odor. And how important that is! Use Mum daily and you'll never be uninvited because of personal unpleasantness.

person, has acted as a demon chaperone, always with them on their dates.

BE that as it may, this is not a story of Ariel and Caliban. It is one of the two Barrymore boys who were pals long ago when they were young and who are still more affectionately disposed toward each other than many brothers. To Lionel, John is always "Young Feller" and to John, Lionel is invariably "Mike." These nicknames date back to the days when as lads they used to impersonate Weber and Fields for their own amusement. Those days when they were both "those young Barrymore devils," always getting into mischief, such as the time the two of them walked importantly into Delmonico's, gravely consulted the bill of fare and ordered French pastry. They gorged themselves. The waiter presented a bill, for five dollars.

"But, my man," said Lionel, "the bill of fare says pastry costs but twenty-five cents!"

The waiter admitted this truth, but he said vehemently, "You two have eaten twenty orders between you and you know it!"

And the boys stayed in hock at Delmonico's until their father, Maurice Barrymore, arrived to bail them out.

As they have grown up and gone about their trade of acting (they both frankly call it a trade), they have led totally different lives. John's has been colorful, spectacular, vivid, dramatic. He has always been the spoiled darling of the theatre and the movies. All he had to do to win the adulation of the fans was to turn that left profile.

Lionel, on the other hand, has ambled inconspicuously through the theatre and through more than a quarter of a century in pictures, every now and then getting highly praised for this performance or that, but never arousing more than momentary excitement. He is a finer and more serious creative artist than John. John never took motion pictures seriously until after Lionel's sustained success in characterization. He had been content with turning on the charm in romantic roles, and making facetious remarks about movie moguls, but Lionel's success aroused him. He did such things as "Topaze," "Reunion in Vienna" and "Bill of Divorcement," which could not be slid through on the strength of charm, but required good hard work.

WHILE John has been crashing headlines with his affairs of the heart, Lionel has gone quietly about his business. He was married to Doris McKee Rankin for seventeen years. When he was divorced some years ago, he married Irene Fenwick, the charming stage star, to whom he is still married.

When a friend asked him what he thought about John's attachment to the youthful Elaine Barrie, this is the remark attributed to him and it has the familiar Barrymore tang!

"Oh, I don't know," he drawled, "I never think about such things any more, seems to me that John would get to that age, too."

As you may or may not remember, Lionel is fifty-eight years old, and John is fifty-four.

John says that the crash of his marriage with Dolores Costello was all his fault, that "Mrs. Barrymore is a most charming woman." But his friends say that there are two sides to the question. After all, John probably was not easy to live with, but on the other hand Dolores Costello, too, may have her faults. Certainly, an impasse had been reached long before he went on the Havana cruise which brought the subsequent unpleasant publicity.

It is interesting that John's come-back is in a Shakespearian role. The one time you can get him to talk seriously and at length on acting is when he discusses the Bard of Avon. He likes this villain, Mercutio. He says he is a "mercurial sort of fellow, full of imagery sometimes flamboyant, sometimes whimsically tender. He has that quality the Irish describe as 'fey'—imagery and an inherent belief in the elves." In fact Mercutio sounds a trifle Barrymore from John's description, doesn't he?

Lionel also has been known to become violently worked up playing a role. In a recent picture he became so excited during an argument with the director that in pounding the table to emphasize a point, he actually broke a bone in his hand. The director wouldn't let him hear the last of it. Thereafter, he had a prop boy follow Mr. Barrymore around with a pillow so that he could bang the pillow instead of a table.

Bad Boy and Good Boy, they are two of the most interesting men of the theatre and pictures.

Finds Way To Have Young Looking Skin at 35!

SMART, modern women no longer submit to the tragedy of "old skin" just because they are 30, 35, 40! A wonderful new creme, applied at night like cold cream, acts a scientific way to free the skin of that veil of semi-visible darkening particles which ordinary creams cannot remove after a certain age. So gentle and quick—often only 5 days is time enough to bring out a glorious rose petal softness and fineness and white, clear look of youth. And, the way it eliminates common surface blemishes—ugly pimples, blackheads, freckles—is a revelation! Ask for this creme—Golden Peacock Bleach Creme at all drug and department stores.

Luck Smiles on Ann

under contract by M-G-M. Day after day they had her pose for publicity pictures, but they never gave her a chance to act. She felt so low, it was a temptation just to mope around the house, but she pulled herself together and went to the party determined to show them that they were overlooking a good bet.

"Wasn't it lucky that I didn't get a part in pictures then? I didn't know anything about acting!"

Her luckiest break, she figures, was being born the daughter of Annette Yde, concert singer and voice coach, who gave her a love of music and the theatre, who taught her and encouraged her.

It was not financial necessity that drove Annette Yde out on a concert tour through forty-degree-below-zero North Dakota weather that January back in 1909 when Ann was born. It was her love of singing to those music-starved audiences. Ann is deeply grateful for her inherited love of the theatre, and for her mother's example of courage and love of living that made her take everything in her stride—career, love, marriage, babies.

Looking at Ann as our taxi jolted along spasmodically through the heavy traffic, it seemed to me that it was the most divine luck for her to have big blue-gray eyes that are as changeable as the weather—pert and fresh as lilacs one minute, impenetrable violet depths another. It was luck to be endowed with a complexion like thick cream and lips that are wide and tolerant and sensuous. It was luck that she had the sort of features that photograph well from every angle and hair that falls gracefully even when whipped by the wind. But Ann doesn't give that a thought. To her it is just a face that she is so accustomed to that it seems as commonplace as having ten fingers.

Our taxi jolted to a sudden stop, right across from a theatre where signs announced that Roger Pryor was about to open an engagement there in person.

"You'll be getting married soon, won't you?" I asked.

"But where did you hear that?" she blurted out as if taken by surprise. She was smiling radiantly, and trying hard not to.

"Everyone seems to be trying to make up our minds for us. It's disconcerting. Don't try to make me live in the future when I believe in making the most of the present. Remember, Roger has just obtained his final decree and I think he should try freedom for a while. He should not get married in a hurry. He has been tied down so long—"

Abruptly the taxi plunged forward again, and as we came to a sudden stop we glanced out and read the sign on the next theatre marquee.

"'You May Be Next,' with Ann Sothern," we read and then collapsed, giggling at the strange suggestion theatre signs flaunt to the world.

"Is it a good picture?" I asked. "Are you any good in it?"

"OH, no," she protested, "don't go to see it, please. Give me a chance to do better. I never like my work in pictures. While I am working, I am always hopeful, but when I see the result I detect a thousand and one places where

KOTEX CAN'T CHAFE

The sides of Kotex are cushioned in a special, soft, downy cotton to prevent chafing and irritation. Thus Wondersoft Kotex provides lasting comfort and freedom. But sides only are cushioned — the center surface is free to absorb.

KOTEX CAN'T FAIL

Kotex has a special "Equalizer" center whose channels guide moisture evenly the whole length of the pad. Gives "body" but not bulk — prevents twisting and roping. The filler of Kotex is actually 5 TIMES more absorbent than cotton.

KOTEX CAN'T SHOW

The rounded ends of Kotex are flattened and tapered to provide absolute invisibility. Even the sheerest dress, the closest-fitting gown, reveals no tell-tale lines or wrinkles.

3 TYPES OF KOTEX—ALL AT THE SAME LOW PRICE

1. REGULAR — IN THE BLUE BOX — For the ordinary needs of most women.
2. JUNIOR — IN THE GREEN BOX — Somewhat narrower — when less protection is needed.
3. SUPER — IN THE BROWN BOX — Extra layers give extra protection, yet it is no longer or wider than Regular.

Brush Away GRAY HAIR AND LOOK 10 YEARS YOUNGER

NOW, without any risk, you can tint those streaks or patches of gray or faded hair to lustrous shades of blonde, brown or black. A small brush and BROWNATONE does it. Prove it—by applying a little of this famous tint to a lock of your own hair.

Used and approved—for over twenty-four years. BROWNATONE is safe. Guaranteed harmless for tinting gray hair. Active coloring agent is purely vegetable. Cannot affect waving of hair. Is economical and lasting—will not wash out. Simply retouch as the new gray appears. Imparts rich, beautiful color with amazing speed. Just brush or comb it in. Shades: "Blonde to Medium Brown" and "Dark Brown to Black" cover every need.

BROWNATONE is only 50c—at all drug and toilet counters—always on a money-back guarantee.

I should have done better. I realize then the lack of expert little touches of characterization that an actress like Helen Hayes would have put in.

"It isn't the fault of the stories," she dismissed the neat little excuse I offered her. "An actress can give a great deal even to a feeble role if she explores it deeply enough. Maybe it has helped me not having awfully good pictures. Critics have got in the habit of saying that I deserve something better. The only part I have really liked was in 'Folies Bergere.' Maurice Chevalier was delightful to work with, so considerate and stimulating.

"He takes his work very seriously. No matter how much he has worked on the preparation of a scene, he is constantly puzzling out ways to do it better. He loves the theatre for itself."

"And for the money," I suggested, always one to nail flights of fancy down with a fact or two.

"Yes, I like the money, too," she chimed in without hesitation. "It means that I can have a comfortable home and nice clothes and the best tennis coach. My game's getting good and I'm very proud of it. It means that I can hop on a plane and come to New York when I have a few days away from the studio. But the money would not make life pleasant if I were not doing what I enjoy. The fascinating part about acting is that whatever you may do, you always feel that given another chance you might do more. The further you get the more you realize how much you have to learn.

"I was playing a lead on Broadway four years ago. My name was Harriet Lake then, you know. I may have looked like a success to everyone else, but I woke up to the fact that I didn't know anything, ANYTHING," she added emphatically. "I took a large part of my salary and paid it to a dramatic coach to teach me fundamentals.

"Out in Hollywood, I often sit alone evenings and study my lines the way we used to under her direction. I live alone, rattling around in a big house with just some servants and dogs. If it has been a bad day at the studio, I can always play and sing or read until I am all relaxed and gay again. Then I can pick up my lines for the next day and really try to give them some meaning."

Ann Sothern is one of those quiet, serene people who does things thoroughly. If she were a typist, she would be on hand every time a speed competition was held, matching her skill against the lightning fingers of the winners. If she were a hairdresser, she'd be the earnest, wide-eyed gal in the front row of every demonstration of a new method of giving permanent waves. But because she happens to be an actress, it is her voice and body and imagination, the tools of a player, that she works on.

In the interval between finishing her Columbia contract and starting at RKO she felt that she needed a rest and relaxation, so she went to Palm Springs. She was bored. She went to San Francisco and was even more bored. So she rushed to a plane and came to New York where there are two influences of inestimable value to her—the theatre and Mme. Frances.

Later on I will tell you how Ann goes to the same theatre day after day, seeing Helen Hayes or Katherine Cornell over and over again, taking the performances apart and trying to discover what makes them so good. But first let me tell you about Mme. Frances.

MME. FRANCES makes clothes, bewilderingly lovely and expensive clothes, designed especially for the people who wear them. They cannot be copied because, aside from her cunning, rare materials and fine sewing go into them. Ann just bought a regal, finger-tip sable cape from her. At the matinee she was wearing a prim black taffeta suit with silver fox swirling around her neck and down to her knees. But Mme. Frances is more than a designer to whom Ann entrusts the job of making her look elegant in a not too conspicuous way. She is a woman whose salty wisdom has for many years been the terror of phonies in the theatrical world and the joy of those few to whom she has offered her encouragement. Starting in a little hat shop on Broadway, Frances has become a power in the dress world, a big trader in Wall Street, and a Palm Beach hostess to whose annual charity ball all society flocks. Ann is one of the very few young actresses who can legitimately claim her as a close friend.

"If I ever become phoney in any way,

Leslie Howard, Norma Shearer, Mrs. William Gargan, and Mrs. Howard attend "The Great Ziegfeld" premiere together.

I'll know it when Frances looks at me. She demands a lot of people. She has known many of the great men and women of this generation, so she keeps you from getting cocky over some trifling success. But she is just as ready to bolster you up when you are low."

I have never seen Ann Sothern when she was low. I can't quite imagine it. For such an extravagantly lush, bland beauty, she seems to have a very even disposition and I've often wondered how she got it. Maybe it was the influence of her quietly reflective Scandinavian grandmother with whom she lived during her high-school years in Minneapolis. For three years in succession Ann won the prize at Central High School for the best original piano composition. Grandmother was pleased. It was all right for her to be a big fish in a small puddle as long as she was reminded that there were lakes and rivers and oceans for her to attempt later on.

If you have any doubts about Ann's level head, came back with me to intermission time at the Helen Hayes matinee. I was resigned to staying in the stuffy theatre, because it is too much to ask a motion-picture actress to go out to the lobby and battle with the autograph seekers. But Ann grabbed my arm and led me out. She does not act like a star who is afraid of being recognized. No black glasses, no furtive darting about. The usual manner of a star is just a shade less harassed than that of a fugitive from justice with the Canadian Mounted in hot pursuit. Ann Sothern gives in public a superb performance of Miss Nobody with the result that onlookers are puzzled. They are sure they have seen her somewhere, but she is so obviously unconscious of their staring that they are willing to grant it may be a mistake.

"It seems odd to be out front in this theatre," she told me. "I played on that stage for thirty-six weeks in 'America's Sweetheart.' I was still Harriet Lake then. Didn't change my name until Columbia scouts saw me in 'Of Thee I Sing' and gave me a contract. They didn't think the name suited me, so I took Ann from my mother's name and Sothern from E. H. Sothern, whose Memoirs I was just reading."

That intermission and the next flew by because there was so much to say about Helen Hayes' performance. From our vantage point in the front row where we practically chinned ourselves on the stage, Ann pointed out many details a non-professional would miss—the way uncertainty was expressed in her hands, her feet, her tremulous chin when Victoria first got up courage to defy her mother.

"Isn't it wonderful the way she made her voice so young," Ann pointed out. "Crystal-clear and high as if all experience had been sieved out of it. What a grand time she must have had reading all the books about Victoria when she studied the part."

QUEEN VICTORIA who treasured simple goodness more than glamorous greatness read the memoirs of the actress Fanny Kemble when she was a very young girl and set down in her diary that they were "pert and vulgar." Ann and I could not help being a little hilarious over what the good queen would have thought of present-day revelations in interviews with motion-picture actresses.

"How terrible for her to give way to her feelings like that," Ann sobbed when Victoria made a public spectacle of her jealousy of a pretty young woman at her court. "A woman shouldn't ever speak until her anger dies down, and preferably not then, should she? She'd win out much better if she stayed charming through weariness and anger—"

A few minutes later we were walking across Forty-fourth Street, peering down the narrow street that is known as Shubert Alley where many theatrical offices are, looking for the ghost of Harriet Lake. Only four years ago she was there, smiling bravely, trying to walk without betraying her trembling knees, begging for a chance to play good parts.

"One summer I came rushing out of that office up there. I was offered a good part in a fall production," the Ann Sothern who used to be Harriet Lake told me, "and I felt I needed a lot of coaching to be able to play it. I didn't have much money, but I went to a retired actress and asked her to work with me, offering to pay her as soon as the play started. Before that I had always paid her in advance, but she knew me well enough to know that I would surely pay her as soon as I could. She turned me down. I was frantically upset—afraid I would never be able to play the part—but I went to work by myself and got it all right. I've never quite forgiven her, though I suppose I should because she taught me not to expect others to be vitally concerned about my ambitions. Any girl who hopes to be an actress has to learn so many things—to gather the forces within herself to conquer disappointment, to avoid antagonizing people working with her, and most of all to enjoy studying her job.

"But forgive me," she broke off abruptly, "these old scenes have made me too serious. Come on, let's grab this taxi."

I doubt that she will ever need that lucky penny. She has a good head on her shoulders—inside as well as out.

In the Bad Old Summertime

phrase, no such thing.

4. Don't leave off your girdle if you have been wearing one and if your figure needs one. Nothing looks worse than a wobbly, lumpy body under a thin summer dress. There are plenty of lightweight foundation garments on the market to suit every need and every purse. A firm, snug-but-not-tight girdle, if you're fat. A porous foundation, if you're not.

5. Beware of all the junk sold along the roadside and at the beach. The hot-dogs, peanuts, popcorn, candy, ice cream cones and the magoo on a stick. If you're fat, it's a wicked shame to indulge in them. If you're thin, they won't build you up an ounce, and will give you various kinds of the pip besides.

I guess I don't need to tell you not to flop down in a chair or on a sofa after eating. It's a great temptation on a sultry evening to beat the rest of the family to the hammock, but you know how I feel on that score. Get up and move around. Dance, but not too strenuously right after eating, naturally.

DON'T loll in the bathtub, hot or cold. You'll feel hotter afterwards, not cooler. The refreshing shower is the thing. Use a body brush and get your circulation started. Take an all-over air bath—be a nudist for a little while every day. It gives your pores a chance to breathe.

About sports . . . I've never been an admirer of the belligerently athletic girl with the muscles bulging through her clothes, the hand-clasp like a man's and all that sort of thing. Females should be feminine, I say. Sports are fine—they're grand—if they are regarded as fun, if they help a girl to be more graceful and full of pep. As I said before, they are not substitutes for corrective exercises. With one exception, swimming—particularly the breast stroke—will help build up a thin girl. But it won't properly reduce a fat girl. I wish more attention were paid to correct form in swimming, tennis and golf. Properly performed, these are excellent developers of grace and coordination. Done in a slap-dash manner, they're of little benefit.

A caution about strenuous hikes and mountain climbing: if you are overweight and unaccustomed to violent exercise, please don't get all full of misdirected ambition and go barging up the side of a mountain. It's too much of a strain on the heart and much too great a developer of the calves and the front of the upper thighs.

While figures are my main concern, I will, at the drop of a hat, launch into a dissertation on skin and hair. Well, for goodness sake! My maid, Tilly, just dropped her hat. So-o-o-o . . .

Briefly, too much is expected of our complexions and our hair during the summer. And too much faith is placed in the beneficent effects of the sun. Take equal parts of sun, dust, wind and salt water, apply to the skin and hair daily, and what have you? You have a hide that looks like leather, and hair that is dry and lifeless, that won't keep a wave in it, and a scalp that is as tight as a drum and cheated out of its rightful possession—natural oil. It can all be summed up in that old business about moderation again, as follows:

Be moderate in your efforts to get a tan. One minute under the direct rays of the sun the first day. Two minutes the next. And so on. A red chiffon veil deflects the rays of the sun and keeps you from burning. Some skins bloom under the sun—others fry. Which kind of a skin have you? Don't let yourself get so dark that you look like Haile Selassie. He's got the right idea—notice the umbrella. An even, golden tan is a lovely thing on a brunette or a blonde who can take it. Redheads, almost universally have tissue-paper skins which freckle and burn and it's just plain dumb to inflict too much sun upon them.

Cleanse your skin, faithfully and regularly, just as you do in cool weather. Apply make-up carefully and fastidiously. Cleanse and make up oftener than you do in cool weather, that's the only difference. The reason should be obvious.

Your hair will increase in gloss and beauty under moderate sunning. It's nice to dry your hair in the open air after a shampoo. But to lie on a beach for hours with no hat or other hair protection results in the unhappy state of affairs I spoke about a minute ago. After a swim in salt water, try, whenever possible, to rinse the hair completely of stickiness. Before your shampoo, go through the massaging routine with warm olive oil. Not pleasant, on a hot day, but it pays dividends later on.

Now, darlings, here is a typical summer diet. Stick to this regime—plus your exercises and you will keep healthy and you won't be ashamed to get into your bathing suit.

Be smart to take advantage of the fact that fresh fruits are in season. They are so reasonably priced at this time that every one can afford to eat plenty of them.

Start the morning off with a glass of any kind of fresh fruit juice. Then just have your thin whole wheat toast, a tiny bit of butter and a little honey if you like. Then a nice cup of black coffee.

In the middle of the morning have a dish of fresh berries. Blackberries, strawberries, raspberries, etc. If you desire, you can drink a glass of skimmed milk with the berries.

For lunch. A crisp green salad with a little French dressing. You can have one slice of whole wheat toast with this. A cup-custard, no whipped cream. A glass of iced-tea with lemon.

In the middle of the afternoon you may have a piece of ice cold melon. Or if you prefer something to drink, you may have a glass of buttermilk or fresh fruit juice.

For dinner: Start with celery, two ripe olives. A cup of jellied consomme. Cucumber and tomato salad on lettuce. Fresh green asparagus (no butter or mayonnaise) or artichoke, brussels sprouts, or other green leafy vegetables. Any kind of meat except pork. Be sure it's broiled or boiled, not fried. Small baked potato, or a heaping tablespoonful of potato salad, but it must not be made with mayonnaise. For dessert, sherbet or fresh fruit in season. Black coffee.

And here is an exercise that I know will be helpful to nine out of ten girls and women, thin or fat, and helpful to many who are almost okay, too.

Haven't you noticed, on all but absolutely perfect figures, an unsightly bulge where the thigh joins the hip? The hip curves down and, whereas the line should go gracefully on, unbroken, right down the thigh, it bumps out again. It's a figure fault that isn't noticed at all on an otherwise good figure—until said figure is poured into a close-fitting evening gown or a bathing suit. Here's how to get rid of that bad line:

Get down on the floor on your hands and knees. Stretch the left leg out in back with the toe pointed. Now move forward by drawing the left leg forward (this will make the hips rise in the air) and place the left foot between your two hands. As you do this straighten out your right leg, toe pointed. Your weight is now on your left foot, and the upper part of your body is flat against the top of the upper left leg. Now continue to go forward until the left knee is on the floor, all the time drawing the right leg behind you. Pulling and stretching as you do so. You are really walking on your hands, feet and knees. Repeat now on the other side by drawing the right leg forward and continue in this manner, walking across the floor, back and forth several times. You will be a little sore at first, but never mind, it's good for you.

Now so long, children, for another month. I hope you have a grand time this summer. I hope you win popularity contests at your pet and particular summer resorts and I hope every man on the beach gets pop-eyed with admiration when you sally forth to take a swim.

Guess what I'm going to do next month? I'm going to take up the younger generation—the very young generation. No, angels, I'm not going to tell babies how to reduce, but I am going to give some simple exercises that make for proper development of very young limbs and muscles. Some easy dance routines, in case you have an embryo Shirley Temple in your home. I'm going on up through the awkward age and tell leggy young things how to overcome the difficulties of that perplexing period. Be seeing you!

P. S. I hope you will all forgive me if you don't get answers to your requests as soon as you expect them. But, gosh, you should see the thousands of letters that are stacked up before me. I'm doing my darndest, darlings, so just be a little patient, won't you? If you haven't sent for your chart yet, please do. You know, it's absolutely free if you send a stamped, self-addressed envelope. to some degree, at least, in every town. But this fact does not detract from the excellent entertainment which is provided by the plot, and furthered by an exceptional cast. Top honors go to Josephine Hutchinson, as the young wife of the town doctor, who finds herself at the mercy of Main Street. She comes to her new home expecting the same generous coöperation as she is ready to give, but is met with suspicion and jealousy. This grows by leaps and bounds, particularly through her friendship with a farmer's son, Ross Alexander. Pat O'Brien, her husband, is torn between loyalty to his wife and loyalty to the townsfolk, who mean his bread and butter, and whom he understands through long years of association. As Dr. Kennicott, Pat O'Brien proves that he is a finer actor than you have ever suspected from his former hard-boiled, mush-hearted roles. Ross Alexander's characterization of the youth who longs to rise above his environment is faultless in its understanding. Louise Fazenda has her best bet in years as the Swedish cook and Ray Mayer is good as Bjornstam, whom she marries.

★★★ The Unguarded Hour (M-G-M)

Oh, so you want to see a murder mystery that is different? Then "The Unguarded Hour" is your meat. This picture very nearly sets a new high in this field, or any field, for that matter. It is one of the most provocative, intriguing and fascinating mystery films ever made, and in addition it is many other one-of-the-mosts—one of the most effective —of the Franchot Tone pictures; one of the most beautifully photographed pictures seen recently; it provides Roland Young with one of his most poignant roles; it has one of the most carefully chosen casts seen recently, and—well, anyway—you'd better go to see it. Franchot Tone is Sir Alan Dearden, a famous young barrister of London. Loretta Young is his wife. She is placed in a position where if she does testify in a sensational murder trial, she will jeopardize her husband's career and future, and if she does not testify an innocent man will be hung. While that is being more or less straightened out, her husband confesses to another murder which he did not commit in order to trap the man who is the real murderer and at the same time his wife's blackmailer. It sounds complicated, but the story is worked out with extreme dramatic cleverness and Sam Wood's direction has the touch of genius. Lewis Stone, Jessie Ralph, Dudley Digges and Henry Daniell, in the supporting cast.

Look carefully at the London street scene in this one. You'll be rewarded by seeing a couple of famous extras—namely, Leslie Howard and Robert Montgomery. Due to a dearth of English-made cars in Hollywood, Director Sam Wood stationed himself early one morning at the M-G-M gate. When Robert Montgomery drove up in his low-slung English roadster, Wood engaged him in conversation until Leslie Howard drew up in his swanky English coupe. The director asked Mr. M. to drive him down to the back lot and beckoned Mr. H. to follow. The cameramen were ready for them when they arrived. "Just follow the traffic down this street, Bob," said Wood. And no sooner said than done and all on film.

★★ Small Town Girl (M-G-M)

Janet Gaynor goes from rags to riches, but giving up her ginghams isn't such a surprise as finding Janet actually harboring dishonorable intentions. Sick of small town life, of working in a grocery store by day and stepping out with her steady, James Stewart, by night, Janet hops at the chance when a dashing young doctor, Robert Taylor, asks her for a ride. Under the influence of an extra quart of champagne, the Dr. suggests marriage; and under the influence of his sixteen-cylinder roadster, Janet agrees. Mr. Taylor's fiancée, Binnie Barnes, makes an appearance with his hang-over. A divorce, it is agreed, would ruin his career, so the newlyweds agree to stick it out for six months, then go their separate ways. Miss Gaynor's portrayal of the celluloid cinderella is well done and Robert Taylor gives an excellent account of himself. Lewis Stone and Nella Walker fit nicely into the fashionable background of Taylor's home, while Andy Devine, Isabel Jewell, Frank Craven and Elizabeth Patterson are perfectly set in the drab surroundings of Janet's home life.

Monterey Peninsula, said to be an exact replica of the Cape Cod shoreline, was found by studio scouts and photographed for the first time for the movies. . . . Though he gave up studying for a medical career when the movies got him, Robert Taylor has wielded the scalpel ever since—in celluloid, anyhow. First cast in "Society Doctor" he was so professional in appearance that the studio gave him a similar role in "Magnificent Obsession," and followed it with this one. Robert was once tennis champion at Pomona College, and in between winning matches sang over the radio, accompanying himself on the cello.

★★ Absolute Quiet (M-G-M)

This picture is a psychological study of ruthless selfishness, but don't let that keep you away. It is also extremely amusing and completely fascinating. The picture proves that there is something new under the celluloid sun. Lionel Atwill is the powerful, selfish head of an air line. A heart attack persuades his doctor to insist that he go to his ranch for awhile and have absolute quiet. Atwill takes with him his pretty office manager, Irene Hervey, promising that he will order her husband, Harvey Stephens, to fly that night to the ranch. Instead, wanting the girl to himself, he sends Stephens on to Los Angeles. The car in which two desperadoes, Jack and Judy (played by Wallace Ford and Bernardine Hayes) breaks down, and they take command of the ranch. Atwill has sent all the servants to town. Then a large air liner makes a forced landing on Atwill's private field and the house party is enlarged by the passengers who include a nincompoop governor, Raymond Walburn, his mouthpiece, Robert Gleckler, his publicity man, Stuart Erwin, a film star and his sweetheart. Jack and Judy are head guys, by virtue of their guns, but it is Atwill, with his incredible heartless selfishness, who really rules all the people. Wallace Ford and Bernardine Hayes almost steal this picture.

Director George Seitz spent two weeks of his own vacation scouting for a location suitable for this picture. He was looking for just one thing—a real ranch, where the cowboys were real cowboys. He looked over many a dude ranch or near-dude ranch in his travels around the state. Finally, about 200 miles from Hollywood, Mr. S. stumbled onto the ranch of his dreams—sturdy, rough buildings, and cowboys that matched. Elated, he signed up the place and the people, rushed home, rounded up his cast, and set out within two weeks for the location trip. On his arrival he was first puzzled and then dazed. In the intervening time, the ranch and all that went with it had gone completely Hollywood. Buildings had been given a quick but bright coat of paint, a lawn was sodded around the ranch-house, and every cowboy shone with fresh shaves and serge suits . . . Lionel Atwill agrees with his countryman, Freddie Bartholomew, that the greatest thing in America is chewing gum. If you see him without a jawful of gum, you can be sure it's not Mr. Atwill you're seeing.

★★ The Country Beyond

Don't be misled by the prospect of another dull evening with the Mounties in the Frozen North, because there's not a dull moment in this whole picture, in spite of the fact that it's built on a thin story and stars Buck. Suspense is built up from the first reel, dialogue sparkles throughout, characterizations are well developed and convincing in every case, while the love story has a refreshingly new angle. Paul Kelly here not only gets his man, but gets his own type of role—an unsentimental, courageous sergeant in the service. Robert Kent is as likeable as any newcomer we've seen in a long time. He's a self-confident, genial corporal who sets out to annoy the sergeant and win Rochelle Hudson. The fact that she happens to be the daughter of a fur-smuggler whom he's out to get, too, lends a few complications. Alan Hale, her father, and Alan Dinehart, as big a crook as ever prowled the North Woods, give good performances, as does Miss Hudson. To add to the general enjoyment of the picture, the photography is excellent.

Location was at Truckee, California, in the High Sierras. Shooting snow scenes presented difficulties never encountered; snow ranged from three to six feet in spots, so all equipment was mounted on toboggans. Shadows from the mountains limited actual shooting periods to a few hours each day. The freezing weather made a deep crust on the snow and when crunched under foot it sounded like a bad thunderstorm through the microphones. But the company never had a better time than on this trip. Few knew how to skate and fewer yet were familiar with toboggan and ski technique, but all were experts by the time the three weeks were up . . . Buck and Prince are really deadly rivals off-screen, too. They are a constant worry to Jack Spitz who owns them both. It's a case of professional jealousy, since Prince was star boarder at the Spitz kennels until Buck made his sensational screen debut in "Call of the Wild." A series of hidden straps and wires prevented the dogs from hurting each other in the screen battle, and at home they are separated by barbed wire fences between their kennels. Both dogs have canine stand-ins, just like any other stars of

★ The First Baby

(20th Century-Fox)

Mothers-in-law may be a joke to some, but to Johnny Downs, hero of this celluloider, the problem is anything but funny. Marjorie Gateson is the lady in question, who unfortunately happens to be the mother of Johnny's wife, Shirley Deane. That's the situation in a nutshell, but to properly appreciate it you should see it for yourself. Between the various in-laws at large you may get slightly dazed, but you'll always be entertained. There is the mother-in-law's husband, a poor thing, played with heart-rending understanding by Taylor Holmes. Then there is Jane Darwell, who portrays Johnny's wife's mother-in-law and Gene Lockhart who is her hen-pecked spouse, though Miss Darwell's intentions are the best in the world. That, as far as we can remember accounts for the in-laws. Then there is the First Baby, which provides new grounds for battle, and Dixie Dunbar who creates a little trouble on the side. There's as much chance for a plot as there is in a three-ring circus. But the characterizations are all good, particularly that of Johnny Downs, who handles a difficult role with exceptional ability.

Preview Postscript

The biggest production problem was 7-months-old Sandy Stone, who plays the title role. He seemingly had no respect for production schedules. If Sandy wanted to smile when he was supposed to cry that was just tough on the director. Or vice versa—it was still just tough on the director. Master Stone, in short, was the real boss of the production . . . Johnny Downs is the 21-year-old veteran of "Our Gang" pictures. In curls and Fauntleroy collars, he was the Gang's first hero . . . Shirley Deane began getting small roles a few months ago, after Darryl Zanuck decided to test the ability of his own "extras" for talent, instead of scouting New York, Paris and points east for possible prospects. Shirley came to Hollywood from a San Francisco night club review. . . . Dixie Dunbar has another name. She's really Christine Elizabeth Dunbar, and from Montgomery, Alabama, suh. This marks her first big chance to act with her face instead of her feet, and Dixie's hoping for more of the same.

★★ Big Brown Eyes

(Walter Wanger)

The eyes undoubtedly have "it" and they belong to the personable Joan Bennett. But to our mind the youngest Bennett is miscast in a role of modern miss who flips wisecracks and revolvers around with equal nonchalance. Eve Fallon, whom Joan portrays in this celluloider, is a manicurist in one of the better hotels, thereby meeting up with the better crooks in town. She happens to be deeply enamored of Cary Grant, a detective, but not a good enough one for Eve. So between manicures she sets out to show him how it's done. Cary thinks she's too pretty to be very bright, but another gentleman friend believes in the Bennett brains enough to give her a job on a newspaper. It's worth seeing the picture just to see what a girl can do in the newspaper world. Miss B. seems to be occupied solely with dictating scoops into a dictaphone, swinging on her swivel chair and accepting raises. Cary in the meantime has been hard at work on a gang of desperadoes composed of Walter Pidgeon, Lloyd Nolan and Alan Baxter, but finds himself beaten at every turn. That's when Miss Bennett steps in and prettily solves the whole situation in no time. The plot has its interesting angles and the actors have their good points, but it isn't very stimulating entertainment on the whole.

Preview Postscript

Cary Grant nursed a sore head for days, and Joan Bennett sent him a dozen roses every morning with her apologies. It all happened in a scene where Joan hit Cary over the head with a box full of tools. The director didn't think Miss Bennett was nearly realistic enough when she gently brought the tools down on Cary's head for the first "take." Neither did Cary—the first time. Cary Grant should be used to bumps on the head, having been a professional acrobat at one time in his career. He ran away from home at twelve and joined up with a circus until his father caught up with him. Really, that romantic name isn't his right one. The right one's even more romantic—to wit, Archibald Alexander Carlisle Leach. Born in Bristol, England, he was not destined to follow in the footsteps of his father, who was a clothing manufacturer, for Cary decided early to become an actor like his uncle, Percival Leach, prominent on the stage. Still believing the circus was a grand way to get stage experience, Cary ran away again a few years after the first trial, and joined a troupe that travelled farther from home. He stayed with it for a year, then went on the stage. He can still walk a tight rope like a professional and do flip-flops and body whirls faster than the eye can follow.

★★ The Law in Her Hands

(First National)

We don't exactly believe that woman's place is in the home, but we do believe that some lady lawyers wouldn't look so silly there. Not that anyone as lovely as Margaret Lindsay could look silly, but she certainly has appeared more comfortable than with the law in her hands. When Warren Hull, the district attorney lets on to Miss Lindsay that it's her beauty and not her brains that he so passionately admires, Miss L. becomes highly indignant.

She is so incensed that the picture immediately becomes quite boring, watching the heroine prove that she's much more brilliant than beautiful. Glenda Farrell has poor pickings, too, as another feminine brain-wave, in partnership with the vindictive Miss Lindsay. Lyle Talbot is convincing enough as one who has most of the city under his control and is plotting the downfall of the district attorney. Eddie Acuff, as the badly battered process server gets all the laughs.

A really good cutter is as important to a film as the director, actors or cameramen. Most pictures are taken without a thought of sequence; in fact, the general rule is to take the last scene first, then skip around to whatever sequence the director has in mind at the moment. When all the scenes are taken the cutter starts work. And work it is, assembling continuity, cutting out superfluous material, and suggesting additional takes. William Clemens, who directed this celluloider, was once an ace-cutter, then decided to give directing a trial and let someone else do the dirty work . . . Warren Hull was recruited from radio. He had ambitions to become a grand opera warbler, until the movie moguls lured him with lucre. Since coming to Hollywood, Hull has had a chance to sing only one song, and that a short one in "Freshman Love" and a far cry from operatic arias . . . . This is Eddie Acuff's second role in pictures. His first was in "Shipmates Forever," as the lad from the sticks. Eddie's been everything but a lad from the sticks in his career—a black face comedian in a medicine show, a barker for a river show boat, a chorus boy on Broadway, a ticket manager in a circus and a stoker on a ship or two.

★★ Sky Parade (Paramount)

It's consoling to realize there's a place for everything, but disheartening when some folks don't realize it. Jimmy Allen, f'rinstance. It would be impossible to fill his place on the radio to the satisfaction of some ten million juvenile fans, but we have an idea that even they will consider their hero pretty flat in celluloid. The story is as unconvincing as its hero, having to do with a trio of aviators who have met up during the World War and decide to stick together in the aviation business from then on. Bill Gargan, Kent Taylor and Robert Fiske comprise the trio, while Jimmy Allen goes in with them, several reels later. His primary interest in life is a robot plane. There's intrigue abroad due to foreign governments also having an interest in the new-fangled plane, but Jimmy thwarts all these goings-on in short order. Katherine DeMille is the heroine, and Grant Withers takes the heavy role. Nothing much can be said for any of the performances, but it is interesting to watch the progress of the airplane industry's importance from war days to the present.

Preview Postscript

Jimmy Allen will tell you that he thinks radio is lots more fun than movie work ever will be. He thinks it's just about one hundred per cent better to know that you're talking to an audience than to talk into a cold microphone—three times the salary notwithstanding . . . Grant Withers started as an extra—three dollars a day in the days before Central Casting had the say-so—Grant finally worked himself onto a regular studio pay-roll, working in minor roles. Then he began getting the picture plums, and was on the verge of stardom when that strange fate that overtakes many an actor in Hollywood caught up with him. Grant found himself on the skids and landed in short order at the bottom, with an occasional role from the independents. And now, for no apparent reason that Grant can see, he is again in the good graces of the studios and beginning to reap fan mail.

★ Florida Special

"Florida Special" is a dull little number which has little plot, few bright moments, and not much reason for existence. Its action takes place on a train on which an ancient millionaire is bound for Miami with a load of jewels. Also aboard is a gang of thugs who mean the old gent no good. Frances Drake and Kent Taylor, the juvenile leads, are also on the passenger list and, fortunately, so is Jack Oakie, who provides the only spark of life in the picture. It will not startle you too much to advance the information that the old gentleman disguises himself to thwart the crooks, that the crooks get the diamonds, only to lose them again to the side of law and order. "Florida Special's" only assets are Jack Oakie's first-rate comedy and Jackie Heller's warbling of a song called, "It's You I'm Talking About." Otherwise, it's routine fare with nothing at all to recommend it.

The biggest news, of course, on this picture, was the romance of Jack Oakie and Venita Varden. They had told no one of their plans, but the company knew it must be love when Venita went on location with the company to the Santa Fe Station and stood around all night in the fog to talk to Jack whenever he was not before the cameras. . . . Kent Taylor, known to many fem fans as THE handsomest Hollywoodian, had no aspirations about capitalizing on his profile. In fact, selling awnings was his chosen life work. One day Kent happened to be out at Paramount studios, selling the aforementioned awnings, when a frantic call came from a set for some "extras." Any kind would do, men, women, children—thin, fat or indifferent. Out of curiosity, Kent went out on the set, and after a few hours was amazed to find a ten-dollar bill thrust into his hands. If it was that easy, decided the bright young man, he might just as well come back the next day. Which he did and found himself rushed into a room where Claire Dodd was to take a screen test. Mr. Taylor was to be background for Claire, but when the picture was reviewed Claire didn't pass the test—Kent did. . . . J. Farrell MacDonald was the cause of some forty awed co-eds standing around the sets at various times watching the goins-on for this picture. Mr. MacD. was combining two jobs, for not only is he an actor in this movie, but teaches movie technique at the University of Southern California. In fact he started the motion picture department at that school, which has already had national recognition, being the only class of its kind in the country. At least it is the only college course which is actually taught by actors, and assisted by directors, producers, make-up experts, etc.

★★ Human Cargo

(20th Century-Fox)

A thousand-odd Mexican immigrants comprise the title role—Mexicans who have been smuggled across the lines, at $200 per head, then quietly dumped in a convenient river. This relieves the smugglers of any possible embarrassment, and provides a brand new racket for a moving picture. With Brian Donlevy as star reporter on one of San Francisco's leading papers and Claire Trevor a reporter on a rival paper, and both out to "scoop" the racketeers, you can bank on excitement. Some of the scenes in the newspaper office are hilarious and you'll meet such interesting people. Particularly, Alan Dinehart, the over-wrought city editor, who is kept busy having temper tantrums and stealing the picture. Brian Donlevy is good as a reckless gent of the fourth estate, while Claire Trevor is lovely to look at and satisfactory when not indulging in snappy comebacks, which unfortunately is a large percentage of the time. Rita Cansino, in the role of Mexican night-club entertainer, is very pretty but very flat in her moments dramatique. The plot has its weak spots, but you will probably be engrossed from the first reel right straight through to the last.

Preview Postscript

Helen Troy, the telephone operator, comes to the screen via radio, having been heard on the air by Allan Dwan, director of this picture, who immediately sent to San Francisco for her. Helen writes her own dialogue, and her wisecracks are considered so valuable that they are not included in the script for fear of wisecrack thieves getting them before the picture is produced. . . . Brian Donlevy can prove that name by his birth certificate which names Portadown, County Armagh, Ireland, as his former address. As a boy bugler Brian accompanied Pershing into Mexico with a National Guard unit. By adding four years to his age he got into the Lafayette Escadrille at the age of 14 and when the World War was over entered the Naval Academy. But seeing the world began to pall on him, so he quit and joined the theatre.

★★ Let's Sing Again

(Sol Lesser)

Sweetness and light, lilies and bluebirds, and a boy soprano are the main ingredients of this movie mixture. If you have heard Bobby Breen on the radio, we don't need to tell you how really beautiful his voice is. If you haven't heard him sing, and the radio's on the blink, then this picture is worth your while. The sagging plot has to do with the Breen boy running away from an orphanage and joining up with a circus. His mother has died after bringing him to America from Italy and his father (George Houston) is looking for him, now that he's in the money. Henry Armetta takes all the acting laurels as a has-been opera star, now playing the circus clown, who gives Bobby his chance, with music lessons thrown in. Grant Withers and Inez Courtney are the meanies, who threaten at times to spoil Bobby's luck, and give some point to the plot, but they are foiled in due course and everyone lives happily ever after.

Preview Postscript

Bobby Breen is familiar to some millions of air fans as Eddie Cantor's "Adopted Son." Cantor has not really adopted this eight-year-old, as many believe, for Bobby has a mother, a father, a sister, Sally, aged 19, a brother, Mickey, 21, and another sister, Gertrude, aged 23. And none of them have any idea of letting anyone, even his adored "Uncle Eddie" do any adopting. Bobby sings in French, Italian and Spanish as well as English. Operatic arias and classical songs are his favorites and he also plays the piano and violin. Bobby's professional debut was made in 1931 at the Silver Slipper Night Club in Toronto. For two years he appeared at least once a week in the club and gained his first radio experience broadcasting with the club orchestra. Later he played vaudeville and motion picture theatres around Toronto, then sister Sally, who was his accompanist, decided to take him to New York on speculation. Harry Richman, rehearsing for a musical comedy, needed a child actor for a comedy skit in the show. He interviewed Bobby and immediately hired him. The reception accorded Master Breen on the opening night caused Richman to declare that "Bobby Breen is a second Harry Richman!" . . . Henry Armetta came to America from his native Italy at the age of 14, when he stowed away on a provision ship sailing from the docks where he played every day. America really proved the land of opportunity, and he drifted happily from the barber-shop profession onto the stage and into movies. Now he's married and happily settled down in Hollywood, which looks more like Italy than Italy, according to Armetta.

★★ Till We Meet Again

(Paramount)

Here we have espionage, sabotage, Herbert Marshall and Gertrude Michael in a revealment of World War Intelligence Office methods. It's pretty good entertainment, competently handled, if you like spy-revelation stories, and who doesn't? Old-time cinema addicts will delight in seeing their silent film favorites Rod La Rocque and Guy Bates Post do well by themselves in it. As Fraülein Elsa, Spy Gertrude Michael of the Triple Entente is a 1914 London stage favorite. She loves, and leaves, Herbert Marshall, in the role of an English actor, when war is declared and she is given no choice but to report for German espionage duty. Marshall is assigned to Britain's spy web, is reported "killed in action," insinuates himself into Germany as a shell-shocked soldier (a nice bit of work), and gives the Germans plenty of trouble, committing sabotage in a munitions plant. Spy Michael is sent to locate the troublemaker, finds her love alive (German Intelligence Head, Lionel Atwill, in love with Elsa, tells her of Marshall's reported death), and attempts a dash into neutral Holland with Marshall. Their escape, plus the nobility of monocle-wearing Atwill, bring the film to a fast-paced, dramatic climax.

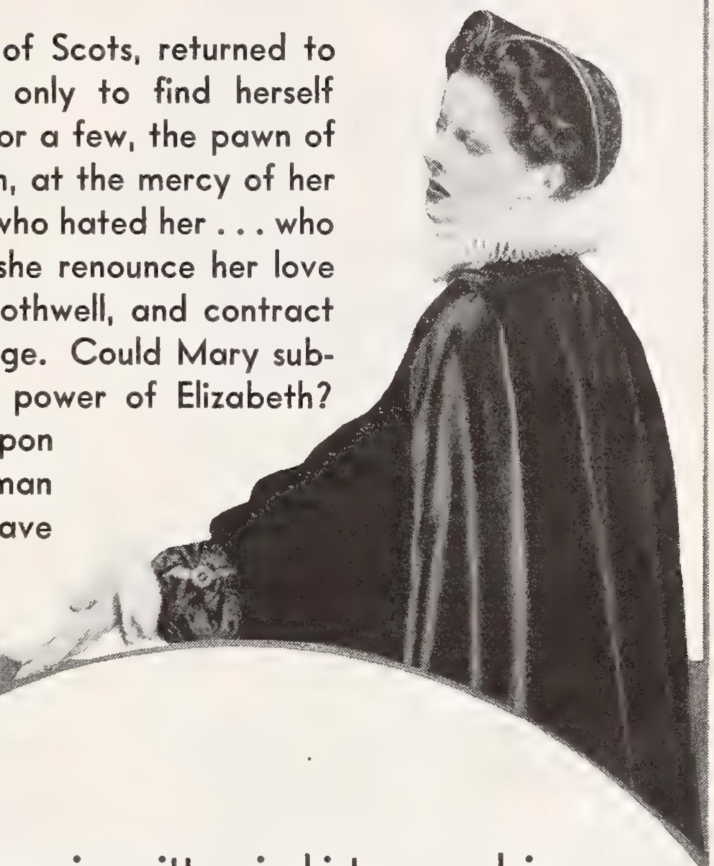
Genuine spies showed the celluloid spies how to act in this film. Several of Europe's leading spies during the World War were employed as technical advisers during the filming. Gui Ignon, a French snooper, was one of them. Major G. T. Bagley supervised the British sequences, while Captain C. J. Cook handled the German spy-system details. Men, these authorities say, are prompted to join the Secret Service because of patriotism, but women enter because of the excitement, adventure and money. . . . One of the most interesting "props" used on the set, was a map procured from the French war department showing the bombardment of Paris by mammoth German guns. The map covered an entire wall of a set and showed how the two big guns, stationed in the Forest of St. Gobain, dropped shells on the French capital one hundred miles away, taking hundreds of lives. . . . Guy Bates Post, famed stage star, appears in his first "talkie." When he came on the set for work the first day, Post turned to Director Robert Florey, saying there was something dimly familiar about his surroundings. Come to find out, it was the same stage on which he had made "The Masquerader" in 1923, his last screen appearance.

★ The Big Noise
(Warners)

If you like the Kibbee brand of humor, you'll go for this picture in a big way. The role of unwillingly retired businessman gives him a grand chance to air all his tricks, and win your sympathy besides. Having been pushed out of business which has meant his life to him because of younger men and snappier ideas, Mr. Kibbee decides to go into business unbeknownst to his family. With Warren Hull he sets up a clothes cleaning business, and finds himself running up against more business than he had bargained for—namely, racketeers—not one gang, but two rival outfits, who have both spotted Kibbee as a sucker. How the old gentleman stands by and lets them destroy each other when they meet in the shop is as funny as anything you'll see for a long time. Besides this scene, there's Marie Wilson to make the goings-on worth your money. As the beauty, if not brains, of the establishment, she gets a chance to philosophize more frequently than in any picture she's had. The romantic interest is taken care of by Warren Hull and Alma Lloyd, though it looks for a time as though Warren is going to be outwitted by Dick Foran who considers himself pretty much of a big shot.

A QUEEN IN HER OWN RIGHT
...BUT DENIED THE RIGHT TO LOVE!

Mary, Queen of Scots, returned to her native land only to find herself friendless, save for a few, the pawn of political ambition, at the mercy of her cousin Elizabeth who hated her . . . who demanded that she renounce her love for the Earl of Bothwell, and contract a loveless marriage. Could Mary submit to the cruel power of Elizabeth? Or did she call upon Bothwell, the man she loved, to save her?



The answer is written in history and in the story of "Mary of Scotland," RKO's latest hit, starring Katharine Hepburn and Fredric March. Read the complete story of this great romance in the July SCREEN ROMANCES.

Guy Kibbee celebrated his fiftieth birthday while working on this film. A dime collection was taken up from cast, crew and other studio workers and Guy was presented with an elegant assortment of toys, everything from tops to tricycles. In due time Guy, Jr. aged 11 months will fall heir to them. The other Kibbee heir is Shirley Anne, five years old. Some thirty years back, the senior Kibbee was a leading man on the Broadway stage. Though rotund in those days, too, Guy had a certain dash, marred only by a bald spot on the crown of his head. All went well for a time, with Guy carefully combing the side hair over this spot until one day, while stooping over on the stage, a loud voice was heard from the audience, "Hot stuff, Baldy!" The manager met him in the wings with one week's salary in advance. Since then he's been a character actor, and glad of it. . . . Warren Hull thinks every actor or actress should first star in radio. With nothing but your voice to get you over, he says, you'll develop the old vocal tones to an amazing degree, which will stand you in good stead in the movies. . . . Now Alma Lloyd's father is Frank Lloyd, director par excellence at M-G-M. As a business asset Mr. Lloyd has been a total loss to her. Alma had deep yearnings since a child to be in the movies, but having a director father puts a cramp in that, popular opinion notwithstanding. The family and friends thought it was cute of Alma to have such aspirations, but that was ar far as it went. Finally, in desperation, she went to New York, appeared in small roles in Broadway plays, and was finally "discovered" by a Paramount sleuth. . . . Marie Wilson never ignores a cream-puff or a codliver oil tablet. Her two aims in life are to gain fifteen pounds and be a black-face comedienne on the Al Jolson type. She says there are enough blondes in pictures now, anyway.

★★★ Sons O' Guns
(Warners)

Given more pictures like "Sons O' Guns," Joe E. Brown won't have any difficulty in keeping his place as one of the ten most popular stars in pictures. The story, based on the Broadway play, is a perfect vehicle for the versatile comedian, whose talents seem to be unlimited. Audiences may well rub their eyes in surprise to see a Warner picture without Guy Kibbee or Hugh Herbert in the cast but their places are neatly filled by Eric Blore, who has never been funnier, first as Brown's valet and later as his stern top sergeant. Not a little credit for the success of the picture may be given to Joan Blondell, who looks lovely, sings and dances delightfully and employs a charming accent as the little French barmaid. Other ingredients that go to make this Joe E. Brown's best picture to date are the presence of Beverly Roberts, war scenes that don't look like the ones you've seen before, and nice musical numbers. To make himself a hero in the eyes of a girl, Joe, a Broadway actor, dons his doughboy uniform and dashes into the street just as a military parade is passing. No one is more surprised than he to find himself in the army, and from then on his misdirected efforts to get out furnish one laugh after another. These amusing situations come to an hilarious climax when, single handed, he captures the entire German army who, like Joe, prefer not to fight any longer because they are not "mad at anyone." If you're a Joe E. Brown fan, and even if you aren't, it's swell entertainment.

★★★ Forgotten Faces
(Paramount)

Here is as stark tragedy as you'll witness in many a movie moon. Herbert Marshall is the husband of Gertrude Michael, and the murderer, in the second reel, of her lover. He goes to prison, she goes to burlesque, and their daughter is adopted by a good family, through the efforts of Marshall's pal, James Burke. Time marches on, seventeen years of it, and Gertrude makes up her fiendish mind to locate her daughter, and through blackmail obtain enough cash to hold the affections of her current boy-friend. Marshall obtains a parole from prison, determined to thwart her plans at any cost, so that their daughter will never suspect her origin. He accomplishes this by means of a cleverly laid plan which mounts in suspense to as bitter an ending as you've ever imagined in fact or fiction. Jane Rhodes, as the daughter, Robert Cummings as her youthful fiancé, and James Burke give competent performances.

James Burke can tell you plenty about suffering for art's sake on this picture. Reporting at nine o'clock one morning, after a good breakfast of ham and eggs, Burke found himself confronted with a table bending under platters of corned beef and cabbage. Seven rehearsals and eleven "takes" followed before the director was through with him, and poor Mr. B. was through with the cabbage. Several wives and sweethearts in Hollywood were startled the other day to receive gorgeous bouquets of flowers, seemingly out of a clear sky. But they were really from the Paramount studio, following the wreckage of a set used in this picture, of a flower shop.

★★ One Rainy Afternoon
(Pickford-Lasky)

First production under the newly unfurled banner of Mary Pickford and Jesse Lasky, "One Rainy Afternoon," is a fairly amusing light comedy done in what was probably intended to be the Continental manner. Its plot is one of those feathery things which requires a Rene Clair or a Lubitsch to keep it from bordering too much on inanity. Unfortunately, neither of these good screen doctors happened to be about in this case. The story, then, gets under way because of the innocent assumption of Francis Lederer that the young lady seated next to him in a darkened movie theatre is a rather intimate friend of his. He kisses her, and discovers she is a total stranger. She is, in fact, Ida Lupino, and she's the fiancée of Erik Rhodes. What follows is a slightly mad confusion of courtroom scenes, jailings, irate fiances and high-powered newspaper publicity. Lederer's boyish exuberance will delight the ladies of his audiences, and Miss Lupino, who photographs beautifully, proves she's no mere ingenue. Erik Rhodes, Joseph Cawthorn and Roland Young are effective comedians, but top honors in that department go to Hugh Herbert, whose screen idiots are a constant delight.

A Deep Secret About Nelson Eddy

box offices to turn in their tickets. I couldn't pay off that kind of a debt, could I? I couldn't have lived with myself if I had done it. I have lost thousands of dollars by my insistence in keeping to my concert tour. But I have not, I think, lost the same number of friends."

Dr. Edouard Lippe, voice teacher of Nelson Eddy and one of his most intimate friends, came into the dressing-room as Nelson and I were talking. And as Dr. Lippe listened, a gentle smile on his slender spiritual face he said, suddenly, "How you live is how you sing. The tone of the voice is only as beautiful as the spirit animating that voice."

And I think I knew, then, what he meant.

For, with those illuminating words, Dr. Lippe turned a spotlight on Nelson Eddy in the reflected rays of which he stood revealed and explained as he had not been explained before.

FOR with one single picture, "Naughty Marietta," this tall, silver blond young man leapt on such a flying trapeze as the movies have never known to the very forefront of the great god, Box Office. An achievement absolutely without precedent. Within a few weeks of that spectacular vaulting of the cinema heavens three thousand fan letters weekly began to deluge the young baritone.

None of the other great box office stars ever achieved so spectacular a success with one film step. They at least had to learn to creep before they walked.

You may be saying, as you read, "Well, why not?" He is a fine looking young man with a magnificent voice! But even these qualifications are not in themselves sufficient to explain the one-picture miracle. And Nelson told me himself that nobody had any idea that he was destined to break the bank of the box office as he did.

And so, as we talked in Nelson's dressing-room, I realized that Nelson has, in his way, the great good quality which Will Rogers had in his. In these two so-different men is the same warm, wide-spreading quality of kindness. Even as Nelson Eddy counted his friends more important than dollars, so would Will Rogers have done. Even as Nelson gave thought to the trudging feet of disappointed thousands, so would Will Rogers have given thought. And if I didn't fully realize all of this with Dr. Lippe's first remark, I did before he was done with me.

"Nelson is so kind," Dr. Lippe said. "Not in a soft sentimental way at all. He realizes that there is ingratitude. He isn't in the least blurry with soft illusions. He doesn't exactly believe in Santa Claus. He even likes to appear to be hard. But I can begin with myself and tell you how kind he has been to me. I . . ."

"You lit into me and laid me low," laughed Nelson, fumbling with his smoked glasses in the way all nice men fumble with something when they are embarrassed. "You told me that I had a voice, but wouldn't have it long if I didn't quit singing in four-a-day movie houses and churches and bath-tubs! If I didn't quit taking correspondence courses. You said it plain and you said it plenty and because you did I'm here in Hollywood today, instead of croaking like a frog in some remote swamp."

"I said it very plainly," smiled Dr. Lippe, "and many a young man would have resented it. I meant what I said kindly and from my heart but I was not tactful. But Nelson, I think, divines kindness where kindness is meant. And so, after the success of 'Naughty Marietta,' Nelson brought me to Hollywood. He recommended me everywhere. And he is responsible for a new career for me. That is kindness."

"Pshaw!" said Nelson, affectionately.

I REMEMBER," said Dr. Lippe, "when we both heard a young negro baritone in Philadelphia. Nelson was so enthusiastic about this negro's voice that he worked with him, gave him some of his own songs to sing, advised him, was as interested in him as he was in himself. And on one occasion, when Nelson was to sing in a certain church back home, he pretended to be ill so that the young negro could sing in his place. Which he did.

"He is always like this with young singers. Few people know it, but more than one promising young voice is being trained today, thanks to Nelson. It is so, Nelson, and I intend to say it, so don't look at me like that. And not only that, but he gives them his time and personal attention, too, which is a more real kindness than check book kindness."

"Well, kindness pays its dividends always," muttered Nelson, "that's true enough. Take a certain surgeon back in Philadelphia. Some years ago, I had to have my tonsils out. I had no money, I went to this man and explained the situation—how badly I needed the operation because of my voice, how important it was to me that it be perfectly done. I told him that if he did, he would have to gamble with me on futures. Doctors are unhappily wise to this sort of proposition. But he did it. He operated—beautifully. He gave me treatments for months. Not one cent did he get."

"Until a short time ago," said Dr. Lippe, "when you paid him in full. I know, because the shock nearly killed him. He told me so. He said it was the first experience of the kind he'd ever had. And your check came during the depression when people were not having their tonsils out."

"Here is one very touching case in point," said Nelson. "Once, not long ago, a little old lady who was crippled asked me if I would sing for her. I went to her house and sang several songs. When I left, she asked me if I would sing at her funeral. I did, of course. I sang 'Open the Gates of the Temple.' And when her will was read, I was one of the beneficiaries. Some of the dividends kindness pays," said Nelson, his blue eyes a trifle blurred, "are sort of—divine."

"And even that kindness was trebly retroactive," Dr. Lippe murmured, "for this dear little old lady had a son who was, and is, in the insurance business. Nelson once promised him that if the day ever came when he could take out a substantial policy, he would take it from him. Just the other day he took out such a policy, here in Los Angeles, and he insisted that the local agent split the commission with the little old lady's son back East."

"Will you get out of here," roared Nelson, "before I slug you?"

"No, I will not," laughed Dr. Lippe, "not until I have had my say. I've been waiting a long while for just this opportunity.

NELSON," continued the little doctor, "has never broken his word as long as I have known him. He is temperamental, of course, as all artists are, but he does not use that temperament as an excuse to escape his obligations or his conscience.

"He has sung, not only to kid-gloved audiences who pay, but in sanitoriums and hospitals, in jails, in humble homes where shut-ins live, hungry for music. He has fed people the beautiful bread of kindliness and now that bread is coming back to him, three-fold, on the waters of his Fame.

"And this," said the Doctor, "is why Nelson became famous with one picture. Not his looks, not his voice alone—for I repeat that a voice is only as beautiful as the spirit animating that voice. No, it is the warm spirit back of that voice which, whether they know it or not, draws in the multitudes who made him a star."

"And now," said Nelson, with a here-endeth-the-first-lesson air, rising to his impressive height and buckling his lanyard onto his revolver "and now pin another medal on Dr. Lippe's little boy, Nelson, and let me go forth to hunt my man!"

But even as he jested, he gave the intensely serious, sensitively appreciative little man a warm touch on the shoulder. And as he left, he cleared his throat two or three times.

The True Love Story of a Famous Movie Star

"Bill, you're such a good-natured old darling! My faithful standby!" And all my resolutions would vanish into thin air.

ON one such night I asked her to marry me. I said, "I know I haven't much; but, oh, darling, I'd love you so! I'd try so hard to make you happy! And the future would be all ours. Think of it! Together, we could conquer Broadway."

We were dancing in the Sky Garden of the St. Moritz, thirty stories above the greenery of Central Park. It was Spring. The end of the Broadway season, almost. I hadn't much money. I hadn't even any right to choose such an expensive place for dinner, except that I knew it was what Mary wanted.

The music was playing a soft, dreamy waltz tune. Mary, all lost in its rhythm, was light and warm and yielding in my arms. Against her hair, I whispered, "How about it? Answer me, darling! Why not? I'd be so good to you you'd never be sorry . . ."

She laughed at me. "Honey," she called everyone honey, "what do I want with marriage? I'm having too much fun! And what do I want with conquering Broadway? So long as it pays for my hotel room it's all I am asking!"

That wasn't strictly true, and I knew it. It was just a gay, gallant line she used to pull. She always said that if she could get parts that kept her in room rent and breakfast money and hose, she'd be satisfied. For the rest, she could have clothes sent from home, and there were always plenty of people ready and willing to provide two meals a day.

I got suddenly angry. I cried, "That isn't true! You can't fool me. You're the most ambitious girl I know! You work as hard as I do to make a success of yourself! Now quit stalling! You know perfectly well you're stalling!"

She was still laughing. "What if I am? It's a good line, isn't it?" Then suddenly, unaccountably, she became serious. "Now listen to me, Bill. I'd make a rotten wife to any man. So don't ever ask me again, do you hear?" She added, "I'm warning you, because some day you might ask me when the moon was out, and roses blooming and—I mightn't be so honest with you as today. I might take you up. And honest, Bill, that would be a mean trick to play on an old standby like you."

Later, bitterly, I was to remember those words. But I wasn't bitter that night. I was strangely touched. I said, "You little square-shooter!" and my arms tightened around her.

More than ever, Mary had me in her power . . .

When you're intent on a real career on the stage, the best way to spend your summers is playing stock. Mary and I both realized it. We both got very busy looking around for summer jobs. By what seemed to me then a supreme stroke of good luck, we both landed in the same stock company.

You all know, you must all have read, about the way stock companies operate. The whole troupe lives and eats and plays together. They sleep in a rooming house or a farm. They wear the kind of disreputable clothes one saves for the country—slacks or bathing suits or overalls—and rehearse a play a week in some old red barn.

It's hard work. Your reward is a chance to do parts you've always been crazy to do, under expert direction. In our case it was going to mean even more. For our troupe was locating in a fashionable social and artistic colony, not two hours away from New York, and people who mattered—managers and critics and talent scouts—would be sure to drop in.

Naturally, I was thrilled. It was, so far, the best break I had ever had. But more than a working break, it meant I would be seeing Mary daily. Rehearsing with her. Perhaps even making ardent love to her—on the stage.

That's what I hoped for. Oh, the summer was going to be fun! But that first month out in the country wasn't much fun. Mary let me get no closer to her than I'd been in New York. The little ingenue of the troupe, she was always the center of an admiring group of men.

As for me, no one paid any particular attention to me except the elderly character actresses, who thought me a sweet boy! Once one of them, a motherly soul, said gravely, "Bill White, what do you want with that flibberty-gibberty little Lee girl, anyway? She's a born flirt; a wild one. The sooner you forget her the better off you'll be."

In my mind, I knew that woman was right. But in my heart, I knew her advice was useless. It wasn't that I wanted to be in love with Mary. It was that I couldn't help it. What use is mind against the overwhelming passion of the heart?

That was July. In the first week of August, something happened. Our director became suddenly very busy with plans for a big fall production. He rushed into town for conferences. He called the company together, and handed us our parts for the next week's play, and announced that an important producer and a backer would come to the opening night.

Naturally, we were thrilled. But pretty soon we were stumped as well. The director was so busy grooming the principals that he had little time to give to coaching us small-timers. So we had to learn our lines as best we could, and iron out major difficulties in rehearsal.

Mary and I went into a huddle. "Gee Bill," she told me, "I'm so peeved I could scream. I'm driving myself nuts, making my speeches to the back porch posts. And how am I to know how responsive they are?"

I had a hunch. "Suppose," I suggested, "you try your lines on me. I'm better than a post."

"You, Bill? But you've got your own part to slave over!"

I said, "Well, we can hear each other, act our scenes. Let's try it, anyway." Without another word she handed me her script. Grimly, we went to work. All morning, we rehearsed her part.

Later, we ran through mine, and then rehearsed the scenes we had together. It was so sweet! Sweet to have her all to myself awhile.

There were some love scenes—not my own, alas! I criticized, I made suggestions, until Mary said, a bit surprised. "Gee Bill, you're a big help!" And it was the greatest reward she could give me.

After that, I remember saying, "No, Mary, you're not doing this right! Remember, you're in love. You're yielding! Now let's see you yield!" And, just as the script called, I took her into my arms. She looked up and smiled. But she didn't say the lines her part called for.

Instead, she said, "Still the same old Bill! Still the good old standby!" Teasingly, gayly, she held up her lips.

It wasn't the first time we had kissed. Just the same, I couldn't sleep all night, for thinking of that kiss. The next morning, I could hardly get through breakfast fast enough.

Our reward came at dress rehearsal. Mary was swell. I remember that director saying, "Hey, Lee, who you been working with to be that good?" I felt strangely proud and happy, happier than if I'd scored in my own part.

Dress rehearsal had been in the afternoon, and the opening was scheduled for that night. In the meantime, we had about three hours to kill. I asked Mary to have dinner with me in a grill down the road.

We got into the rickety roadster I'd bought for the summer. I drove slowly, keenly aware of the beauty of the sunset.

Mary said, "Bill, go pick me some of those tiger lilies. I want them for my hair."

Obediently, I stopped the car and got out. When I came back, Mary's delicate beauty against the vivid blossoms suddenly drove me wild.

I gathered her in my arms, there in the crazy old car. I whispered, "Darling, darling, oh, I love you so! Mary, do you remember that night on a roof last Spring? Do you remember what I asked you—the things I planned for us?"

She did not answer. I went on, "Mary, listen, Mary! Marry me!

"Today has shown us what we can do together! There'd be no holding us! We'll be another Lunt and Fontanne some day! Another Kit Cornell and MacClintic! Oh, darling, please say you will marry me!"

FRESH mown hay and the heady fragrance of tiger lilies. The memory of love scenes warm and vibrant between us. Play-acting scenes, but so real and tender none the less. This time, Mary did not warn me she'd make me a bad wife . . .

She simply smiled. "Why not, Bill? It might be such fun, getting married to you!"

At first, I could hardly believe I had heard right. I stammered, "D-do you really mean that? You're not just kidding?"

She laughed. "No silly! Tell you what! I'll marry you tonight right after the show."

"You'll . . ." I still couldn't believe it. Then suddenly, "Not after the show, darling! Before! I wouldn't dare wait—you might change your mind!" With a jerk, I started the car and doubled back to our house.

We picked up the first two persons we could find for witnesses. We tore off to the marriage license bureau. It was all done in the spirit of a dare. Before it was time to dress for the show, Mary and I were man and wife.

Perhaps you will say that was no way to contract a marriage. But if you had told me so that day, I'd have said you were crazy. I'd have said I had won the most wonderful girl in the world, and all I asked was to be worthy of her.

Oh, I believed that! Especially when the show went on, and I could watch my wife. For right in the first act Mary stole the show. Her youth, her grace and her freshness, the excitement of the day's happenings, the lilting sureness with which she spoke her lines, made her stand out from the rest of the cast.

As she took curtain calls, I knew that she was made. Later, the Broadway manager rushed up and pumped her hand. He hinted at a part in his production in the fall. That night, we knew Mary's big break had come. What a beginning to our married life!

Those weeks in the country—carefree, happy-go-lucky, easy-going days. The happiest, perhaps the only truly happy days I have lived. Never again was I to know a time like this.

I shall not speak of it, for it belongs with memories too sacred and too poignant to be touched. But it left me with a hunger for happiness that has never slackened. It made the loneliness that was to come later all the more terrible to bear. For, of course, my marriage did not pan out at all. No sooner were we back in town than I began losing Mary.

Early in the fall, she got that part of the ingenue in a comedy that became a famous Broadway hit. It meant, in the first place, that she was set for the season. In the second, that she had found a definite niche for herself among the promising young generation of stars.

We had not begun to dream of Hollywood, yet. But her success drew us as much apart as if she were spending her time in Hollywood already. For while she was definitely a success, I was still the hopeful boy trying to make good. I was still playing small parts, plodding through weeks of rehearsal without pay, opening in second rate shows and watching them close again

That was, you remember, at the worst of the depression. Any play which wasn't a smash hit simply did not last. I was eternally low in funds while Mary drew a good income. It got so I could no longer squire my own wife around!

That did not seem to bother her. She just took up her own life where she had left off last spring. I was one of the boy friends, not really her husband. She was more popular than ever, always running around, and, of course, she was meeting too many important people for me to object.

She used to say, "Oh, for heaven's sake, Bill, I can't put on the home-wife act, and you know it! I'd be through in no time if I tried to do that. And anyway," she added airily, "who wants to be stuffy?"

Oh, no one, no one! I let her do exactly as she pleased. Or so I said. Actually, I knew that if I didn't let her, she'd do it anyway. I thought that by being a sport, at least I could keep her friendship. For I couldn't keep her love—I had never had that!

When, in the spring, her company went on the road, we were both relieved. I hoped I might work out my problems better alone. As I took her to the station, I said, "Things will be different when you come back, my sweet! Perhaps by that time I will have made a smash hit, too."

She smiled at me over her rich corsage of orchids, which didn't come from me. "Sure, why not? Won't that be nice, Bill?" But even as she said it, I knew, with a terrible sureness, that Mary didn't really care whether I ever made good.

AFTER she was gone I attacked the producers' offices with double energy. I had nothing to do but work—or try to work. I lived quietly. I wrote long, passionate letters to my wife. From her manager I got the exact itinerary of the road company she was with and used to telegraph flowers to her hotel rooms and dressing-rooms on opening nights.

All I got in return were sketchy notes, picture post cards. After a while I got no news at all. I'd go wild, telephone her across half a continent, only to hear her laugh at me coolly.

"Don't be silly, Bill. Don't bother me. I'm much too busy to write!"

Then suddenly, when she was playing in Chicago, came a large business-like envelope from her by registered mail. I stared at it, unbelieving. That fat letter—from Mary! What could she be saying? I opened it. It was an official notice that she had divorced me!

She must have sued me by publication. The bitterness of that blow! For a long time I sat on my bed with that paper in my hands, stunned. How could she be so thoughtless, so cruel? Or perhaps she did not even know she was being cruel.

Life went on. Broadway went on. I spent another summer in stock, learning to act.

I told myself, "I'm going to make good! I'll get so far, make such a success, that I'll dazzle her! No wonder she had no use for a failure like me. But I'll win her back!"

Even when news broke in the papers that she had got her first Hollywood offer, I didn't give up. Rather, I put so much of my hopes and my ardors into my work that suddenly, incredibly, I was given an important part in an important show. My break, too, had come! I was catching up!

We opened on Broadway. I made a personal hit. The critics all noticed me. For the first time in months I felt high. "Who is this young newcomer, Bill White? Where has he been until now? I wished passionately Mary could be there.

Next morning, I woke up feeling I had conquered the world. I would write Mary at the Coast! Surely she would be glad to hear my news! I phoned for all the morning papers—I'd send her clippings. At last I would show her real proof.

But when I picked up the papers my spirits vanished. For there, smiling up at me from the printed page, was Mary. "Youthful Mary Lee, glamorous Hollywood find, in surprise elopement with Stanley Grey, her director."

No use climbing to heights in hopes of winning her, now. No use in living. Suddenly, darkly, the world around me crumbled. At the time of our divorce I hadn't really believed that I had lost her. But now, irrevocably, she belonged to another man.

Something happened to me that day. I think that my youth died. I think despair must have made a different man of me. For, all at once, I seemed empty of all feeling. I could have sworn I could never feel anything again.

The show went on. My success went on. Almost, I began to hope my love for Mary was dead. When her first picture came to town, I permitted myself the exquisite torture of seeing it. I watched her, lovely and glamorous on the screen, and thought, this is the girl I once held in my arms. But it was like watching a beloved ghost. Mary no longer existed for me.

ANOTHER year slipped by. I, too, got my offer to go to the Coast. Well, Hollywood is a big place, I told myself. There'll be room there for both Mary and me. I started out, grimly determined to steer clear of Mary.

And at first I succeeded. My first picture part was that of a young country boy in an old fashioned setting. I loved that part. Moreover, I was playing with some of the screen's finest stars. It was so exciting, such hard work, so engrossing, that for weeks I hardly stepped off the lot. The only people I really got to know were those with whom I was working.

Among them was a charming and beautiful "starlet" whom I shall call Sybil Fane. She was a simple, clean-cut child, and we got very chummy. Now and then, I used to take her out.

One night, we decided to make it a gala evening. We got into evening clothes and went to the Brown Derby. And there, for the first time in almost two years, I caught a glimpse of my former wife.

She was the center of a gay, brilliant group. As in the old days, she was the life of the party. She hadn't changed that way. The only thing that was changed about her was that she wore exquisite clothes, and had acquired that sleek, perfect grooming which Hollywood always gives its stars.

She waved to me, and I smiled. But I asked the headwaiter for a table for two. I did not accept Mary's invitation to join her party. Give me credit for that!

Well, perhaps Mary was peeved because I didn't. Perhaps just bored. Anyway, several times, on the beach in Santa Monica, at the Santa Anita race track, at the Cocoanut Grove, Mary's path and mine crossed. At the same time, rumors of a rift between her and her director-husband started. And calmly Mary let it be known that she would not mind a date or two with her first "ex."

But it wasn't until the preview of my own picture that she made a definite gesture in my direction. It was such an easy and natural opportunity! What could be simpler than a meeting on such a night?

Well, before the showing was half over, I was a big-name-in-the-making, too. I knew it, with that instant sensing of audience reaction. Sybil, in the seat beside me, knew it. I had clicked.

Suddenly, as we came out into the lobby again, I was a celebrity. Sybil was more thrilled than I. Lights flashed around us as news cameramen got busy. People congratulated me. Shook my hand. And all at once, Mary was standing beside me.

She put her hand on my arm, as in the old days. "You've made it, Bill! I always knew you would!"

I managed to keep my head. I answered, "Did you, Mary? Oh, by the way, I want you to meet Sybil Fane."

The two girls smiled and after that Mary left us. Nothing more happened. Yet, oddly, Sybil asked on the way home, "You're still in love with your former wife, aren't you? Oh, God, couldn't she leave you alone tonight of all nights?"

I was shaken. It seemed strange that this young girl, with all the deep warmth of a true woman's heart, should be concerned over my old wound that had been freshly opened. That she should be seeing me, not as the hour's new idol, but as the boy who today was no different from other days. . . .

I SMILED down at her as best I could. I said, "No, I don't really love her. Not any more. And she can't help herself. She reaches out for every new toy that glitters. I'm an attractive toy now. But that's over and done with for me."

We were driving slowly through the magic California night. This time, my car was a glittering streamlined affair. It should have been a happy night.

It wasn't. Sybil, wiser than I, said doubtfully, "I hope it is over, Bill. Look, if there's anything I can do . . ."

"There is," I told her. "Let's be playmates for a while. Let's have such a good time no one else will matter."

I felt so sure that with her gallant help everything would turn out well! Besides, as I said, we worked on the same lot. It was so easy and natural that we should be together.

It wasn't long before the gossip columnists and fan writers picked up the drift of what was between us. And in that bizarre way in which things work out in the movie colony, two items appeared one day in a syndicated column that's read all over the country.

The first was this: "Despite persistent denials of a rift in the marital bliss of Mary (Southern Belle) Lee and Director Stanley Grey, the lady in the case is taking up Mexican residence." And, not more than an inch further down the printed page: "They say Bill White who is Mary's first ex, and Sybil Fane are that way about each other."

I read that column and so did Sybil. She was upset, of course. But I admitted frankly I was glad it had come to that. For weeks now, I had suspected that our playing was more in earnest than we dared admit.

We were having lunch, when we saw those items. I said suddenly, "How about making it more than a rumor? Sybil dear, let's slip down-town and pick you out a ring? Gee, it might have taken me weeks to figure this out by myself!"

She was sipping a glass of milk. I was munching a sandwich. It was as casual as that. Half a dozen of our friends on the lot could have heard us had they cared to eavesdrop. I know now that was no way to propose.

For suddenly I saw Sybil's young face grow serious. "Not—not yet, Bill. Bill, don't make this a spite marriage! Wait a while! There's always time to buy a ring. I want to be sure. And I want you to be sure."

I tried to speak lightly. "Not worried because Mary is free now, are you, dear? I told you before that's over and done with."

I said, "I want to take care of you. Just as any man wants to take care of his wife. The way I could never have taken care of Mary. She didn't need me. But you. . . Oh Sybil, don't you see, we need each other!"

Her lovely eyes were moist when she answered me. "Yes, I need you, Bill, oh, more than you know! But you see, I always will. I won't change. So there's no need of pledges and rings."

She made me drop it. Today, I wonder what would have happened to all of us if I had insisted. If Sybil and I had become formally engaged. Would it have made any difference in the course of our lives? Would we have bucked Fate? Who can tell the answer?

ANYWAY, for a few weeks nothing happened. Even when Mary came back from Mexico a free woman, I swore that wasn't going to disturb Sybil and me.

But I had counted without Fate—or Mary. Who will ever know exactly what happened? Did Mary prod Fate a bit to have her own way?

I am not saying that is actually what took place. It might have been just coincidence, after all. Anyway, one day I was informed that I was being "loaned" for a picture another company was making. That I was being co-starred with my former wife!

How shall I describe my reaction to the news? I was aghast—but at the same time strangely thrilled. I told myself this was just curiosity. That I was pleased because it was one way to show her many things.

Yet once more I felt like the youngster of four years back, taking a blonde elusive girl on a date. Once more, my heart beat wildly, my hands weren't quite steady. I tried to tell Sybil this was just a natural reaction, but I didn't convince her—I didn't even convince myself!

She said quietly, the day before I was to start work on the other lot, "Bill, remember—whenever you need me, I'm here."

And I took her cold little hands in mine and pressed them hard. "Of course you're here! I don't for a moment intend to let you get away!"

It was false cheerfulness. Just as mine was a false security. The moment Mary and I faced each other, on the new set, I knew that. Suddenly, Sybil's tragic young eyes became dim in my memory. It was Mary who was real—Mary, smiling at me out of beckoning eyes.

I tried to be formal with her. I said, "Well, this is certainly a pleasure." But you can't be formal with Mary when she doesn't want you to be. She can disarm a stronger man than I've ever been.

That day, she simply said, "Come on, old standby, get off your high horse! You and I will be making picture-history together!" She linked her arm in mine and dragged me off to her bungalow. She said, "I want to talk to you. I've wanted for ages to have a talk with you."

I broke then. All the bitterness and the suffering in my heart welled up. "Oh, how could you have done the things you did?" I cried. "That divorce! Mary, Mary, how could you have acted that way? I was your friend as well as your husband!"

She put both hands on my arms. "Forgive me, Bill. I was thoughtless. We all make mistakes. Let's forget the past."

I thought of Sybil. "If ever you need me, Bill . . ." Oh, I needed her! Yet it was Mary in my blood. In the days that followed, as we rehearsed together, as we went through love scenes, I went mad with the heady warmth of her nearness.

I knew I was a fool. I knew I was playing with fire. Each night, I should have gone to Sybil.

I did not do it. The new picture progressed, and all the time I was seeing less and less of Sybil—and more of Mary.

Until, one night, I heard myself saying passionately, "Mary, do you think—some day—we may try again? Oh, Mary, Mary, I could love you so much. . . ."

She did not say yes and she did not say no. A little gleam of triumph shone in her wide eyes. "Perhaps we might, Bill . . ." She did not send me away.

That's how things stand now. Mary would marry me again, now that I'm somebody, because it would be fun being married, or so she thinks today. Tomorrow, she might change her mind.

For Mary will never change. Deep in my own heart, I know it, I call myself a fool. And I no longer know what it is I must do.

What should I do? Should I gamble on love, take what I want so desperately, and hope that perhaps Mary will stay true? Or should I go back to faithful, loyal Sybil, who really loves me, force myself to forget the woman who has brought me so much sorrow?

Please write to me and tell me! Little Sybil, who deserves better, is waiting. Mary is waiting—playing a slow game of cat and mouse. And I'm going through torture. I'm at the end of my rope. Perhaps your letters will end that torture, one way or the other.

The Show Must Go On, that hoary old tradition of stage and screen, was dusted off and polished up considerably by W. C. Fields. By the time the picture was completed Bill was so tired of relaxing that he sent a note to the director demanding a sit-in for his next one.

For some reason or other the statement didn't seem to please him one bit.

Kitty Carlisle, who sang a couple of swell operatic numbers in "A Night at the Opera," really means it when she says she's studying for a debut at the Metropolitan. Right now she's in New York in serious pursuit of voice training. Also, in New York, composer George Gershwin is in very serious pursuit of one Miss Carlisle.

'Way out in the wilds of a Hollywood suburb is Ken Maynard's Diamond K Ranch. Ken, being one of the most solvent cowboys in these parts, recently bought himself a circus and installed it on the ranch. A few weeks ago he invited a number of his friends out to look things over and sample a portion or two of barbecued buffalo. Ken introduced a touch of the old west when he appeared for a brief session of trick riding with his horse, Tarzan. A couple of elephants named Sally and Queen did things we didn't think elephants could do, and a band of Indians in full regalia, plus sun glasses, stepped off a war dance. Then everyone tried the barbecued buffalo. Barbecued buffalo, in our opinion, will never replace the horse.

Onslow Stevens and his wife, the former Ann Buchanan, wanted to move out of Onslow's home in Pasadena and into Hollywood, but they couldn't decide which apartment house they preferred. So they're spending a week-end at every available place in town. When they finish the list they'll settle down in the place they liked best.

A Hollywood cab driver owes his recent marriage to Allen Jenkins. Coming out of a restaurant one night, Allen hailed the cab and when the driver asked his destination he said, "Ensenada." Ensenada happens to be in Mexico, practically a sleeper jump from Hollywood, but the cabbie drove on without batting an eye. After a quick look at old Mexico Allen ordered his man to return to Hollywood. The tariff was terrific, and so the driver got married.

During the shooting of "The Great Ziegfeld," everyone wondered how Billie Burke would feel about being portrayed on the screen by another actress. After the premiere a newspaper man asked Myrna Loy if Miss Burke had commented on her work in the picture. Myrna showed him a photograph of Billie Burke taken when she first knew Ziegfeld. On it was inscribed: "To Myrna—when I was you . . . Billie Burke."

Betty Furness is a fiend for auctions, but she never found anything really valuable until last month when she bought an old trunk for ten dollars. The trunk once belonged to a former burlesque queen and it contained, among other things, eight letters written by Marie Dressler, who was a good friend of the dancer. Since then Betty has been offered $100 for one of the letters, but she is refusing all offers. The Dressler letters are going to remain in Betty's possession.

■ ■ ■

Gene Raymond has had so much success with his song, "Will You?", that he's decided to go in for musical composition on a larger scale. Singing "Will You?" on his personal appearance tour skyrocketed the sales of the song, and Gene has a profit of over $5,000 on it to date. So now he's working on some new songs with his brother, Robert Marlowe, who is in Hollywood hoping to become an orchestra leader. Since Gene's going musical, perhaps he can coax a voice lesson or two out of Jeanette MacDonald.

■ ■ ■

Do you wonder what papa and mama Dionne thought of "The Country Doctor"? We talked to a newspaper woman who sat with them while the picture was unreeled. Mrs. Dionne liked only the brief part in which the quints appeared. Excited, she pointed them out to her friends and called each by name. Papa Dionne was incensed at his screen character, for which one can hardly blame him. When the picture ended the Dionnes shook their heads sadly and said, "What will the neighbors think?"

■ ■ ■

Basil Rathbone, who probably has been about the meanest of the screen's arch-villains, has had a change of heart. Called upon to poison a dog in a scene for "Private Number" at 20th Century-Fox, Basil refused, and the script was rewritten so that someone else drew the assignment. "I'll menace the heroine and I'll torture the hero," said Basil, "but black as I am, I won't poison a dog."

Bette Davis is just completing a long vacation, and she claims the whole thing was merely to rest up from the excitement of the Academy Award. As part of her vacation she packed up her gold statuette and sailed to Hawaii. Harmon Nelson, her husband, waved a sad goodbye, for he couldn't make the trip. He's playing the piano and doing a bit of vocal entertaining at a Hollywood night club.

Top to bottom: Ann Sothern and Rosalind Russell show off some new finery. However, in Miss R's case, the outfit is a little surprising. The hat's a bit Charlie Chan, dontcha think? Ralph Forbes with Heather Angel (Mrs. F.).

LIQUID POLISH
8 smart shades

HERE is an entirely new liquid polish. Based on a brand-new formula! It's the first real improvement in liquid polish in 10 years, and we're proud of it. It's the polish women have been waiting for!

A stronger, more durable Lacquer . . . The new Cutex Liquid Polish takes a little longer to dry because it's a stronger, finer lacquer. But you don't mind that because it's twice as lovely, more lustrous and wears longer than ever before! Now even nails that go in the dishpan 3 times a day come out shining and smooth and unstreaked!

It goes on even more smoothly. Not a bit of difficulty—and never a sign of the blotching that sometimes used to ruin the whole effect. You're going to love it.

Resists the Sun, too! Tests on the new polish show that at last the old summer sun has been beaten. At its brightest, it can't fade and streak the true, new Cutex shades—after a whole week!

Even more Economical . . . You'll be grateful for this. The new Cutex is usable right down to the very last drop in the bottle! No thickening or drying up. All you have to do is to take ordinary care in closing the bottle between applications.

Remember, you get our superior new Cutex for exactly the same price—just 35¢ a bottle. In 8 authentic shades—the newest shade is Rust—perfect for sun-tanned fingers. All shades at your favorite shop.

Try the new Cutex tomorrow. You'll be amazed and delighted at the new lasting beauty of your new Cutex nails.

A HOSTESS AND A DENTIST BATTLE OVER A T-BONE

"Intelligent!"

SAYS HOSTESS

SAYS DENTIST

(But the civilized way to build firm gums is IPANA and MASSAGE)

HOSTESS: "Your picture is disgraceful. No girl with a spark of intelligence or breeding would ever eat like that." (But your dentist disagrees—emphatically.)

DENTIST: "That picture is a perfect lesson in the proper exercise of teeth and gums. I hope millions of people see it. If more people chewed as vigorously, there would be far fewer gum disorders—fewer evidences of that dental warning 'pink tooth brush'."

Check up on your own menu, and you will see the dentist's point. The modern menu is a soft-food menu. It deprives teeth and gums of the work and exercise and stimulation they need. No wonder gums grow weak and tender—no wonder "pink tooth brush" is such a common warning.

"Pink Tooth Brush" is serious

The first sign of that tinge of "pink" calls for a visit to your dentist. You may be in for serious trouble. But he is far more likely to tell you to take better care of your gums, to give them more stimulation, more exercise. And he may tell you—he usually does—to switch to Ipana Tooth Paste and massage. Follow his advice. Rub a little extra Ipana into your gums every time you brush your teeth! For Ipana is especially designed to help your gums as well as clean your teeth. You'll soon notice an improvement in the health of your gums. New circulation wakens lazy tissues. Gums grow stronger. They feel firmer. They look better.

So switch to Ipana today. The first ten days of Ipana and massage will show an improvement. And thirty days will convince you that you should have changed to this modern, sensible health measure long ago.

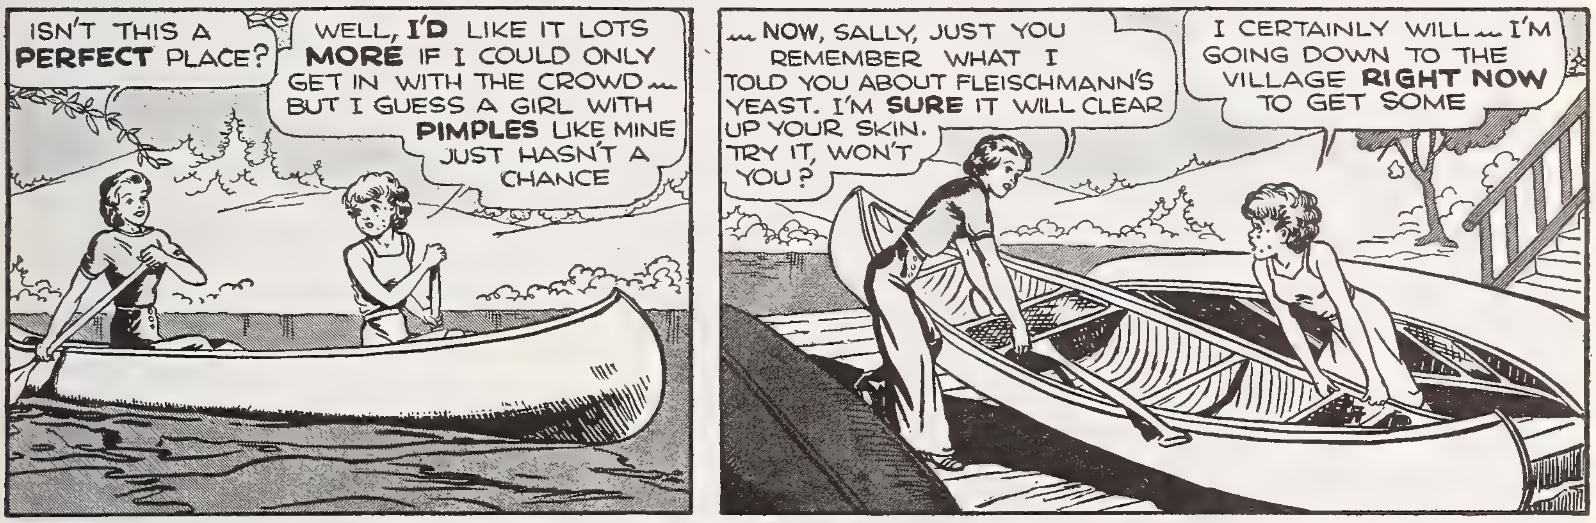
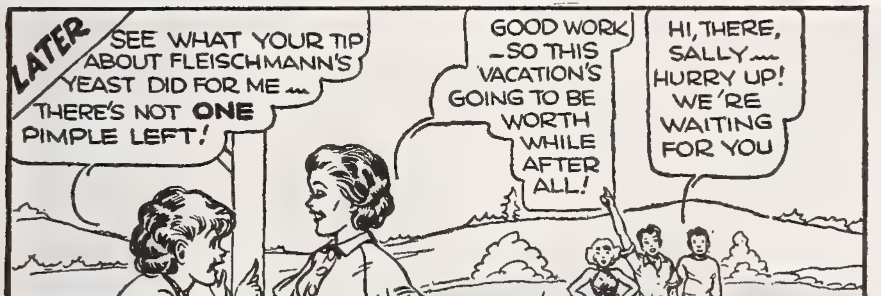
OH, I'D LOVE TO



ISN'T THIS A PERFECT PLACE?
WELL, I'D LIKE IT LOTS MORE IF I COULD ONLY GET IN WITH THE CROWD ... BUT I GUESS A GIRL WITH PIMPLES LIKE MINE JUST HASN'T A CHANCE
... NOW, SALLY, JUST YOU REMEMBER WHAT I TOLD YOU ABOUT FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST. I'M SURE IT WILL CLEAR UP YOUR SKIN. TRY IT, WON'T YOU?
I CERTAINLY WILL ... I'M GOING DOWN TO THE VILLAGE RIGHT NOW TO GET SOME



LATER
SEE WHAT YOUR TIP ABOUT FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST DID FOR ME ... THERE'S NOT ONE PIMPLE LEFT!
GOOD WORK — SO THIS VACATION'S GOING TO BE WORTH WHILE AFTER ALL!
HI, THERE, SALLY ... HURRY UP! WE'RE WAITING FOR YOU

FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST

—clears the skin

by clearing skin irritants out of the blood

Copyright, 1936, Standard Brands Incorporated

Don't let adolescent pimples keep YOU from making friends

GOOD TIMES can be sadly hampered by a pimply skin. Yet many young people have to fight this trouble after the start of adolescence—from about 13 to 25, or even longer.

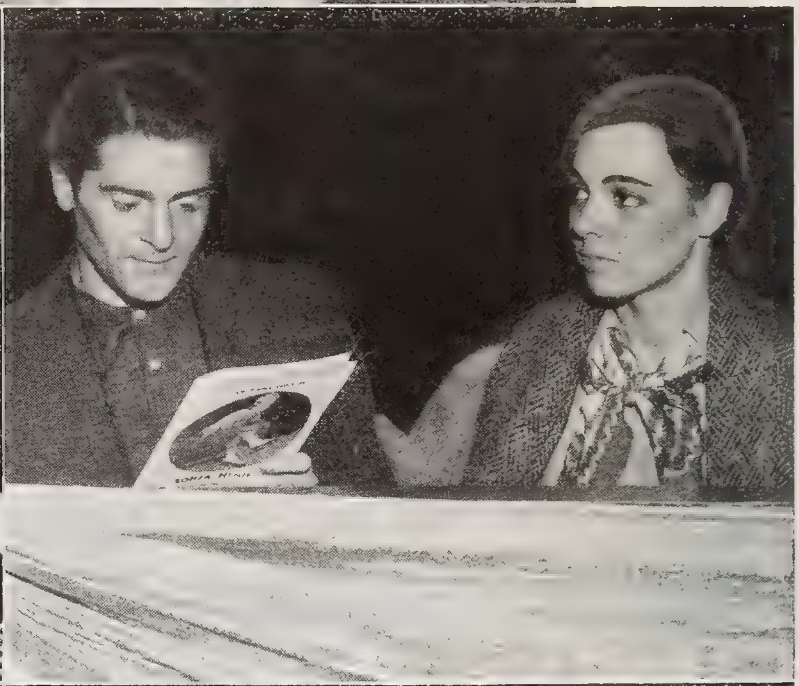
During this period, important glands develop and final growth takes place. The entire system is disturbed. The skin, in particular, gets extremely sensitive. Waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin and unsightly pimples break out.

But these adolescent pimples can be corrected. Fleischmann's fresh Yeast clears the skin irritants out of the blood. Then, the pimples go!

Eat 3 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast daily—one cake about ½ hour before each meal. Eat it plain, or dissolved in a little water until your skin clears. Start today!

At The Polar Palace

All the who's—whosisis turned out for Sonja Henie's California skating debut. At the right, you see the cute ice-skating champion with an arm about Ruby Keeler. 'Tis said Miss Henie's price for making a picture startled even the gents who talk in colossal terms! Below, left to right is the enthusiastic star audience. Ann Sothern spikes the rumors by appearing with Roger Pryor instead of Norman Krasna. And Francis Lederer reads his program while his best gal, Mary Anita Loos, looks on. Next row below: Kay Francis and her steady, Delmar Daves, beam on Scotty. And last, Hollywood's most talked about duo, Gene Raymond with Jeanette MacDonald.



"I didn't deserve their pity"

...CONFESSES A TRUTHFUL EX-WIFE

"If I'd known about "Lysol" sooner, our happiness might have been saved"

"When my divorce was granted my friends pitied me, and blamed my husband, as people so often do. But I know now that I was really the one at fault. I had become irritable, cold, unresponsive...actually afraid to be happy. Fear and worries had preyed on my nerves till I was a different woman from the bride my husband loved. I wish I'd learned about "Lysol" sooner."

How stupid that we should let blind, reckless ignorance like this go on wrecking countless marriages! Millions of women know that the simplest and best method of antiseptic feminine hygiene is the "Lysol" method. For nearly 50 years "Lysol" has had the world-wide endorsement of leading doctors and hospitals. Used as directed, "Lysol" is so gentle to sensitive tissues that it is commonly used in the delicate operation of childbirth.

"Lysol" in antiseptic marriage hygiene has special effectiveness. It has a spreading quality which enables it to search out hidden spots where other antiseptics fail to reach. And "Lysol" destroys germs even in the presence of organic matter (such as mucus, serum, etc.) . . . when many other preparations don't work.

To every wife who has been the victim of needless worry—accurate, authentic information about antiseptic marriage hygiene is now offered, in a free brochure called "Lysol vs. Germs". It tells how to use "Lysol" for this and many other germicidal needs. Just send the coupon.

Lysol
Disinfectant

The 6 Special Features of "Lysol"

1. Safety..."Lysol" is gentle and reliable. It contains no harmful free caustic alkali.
2. Effectiveness..."Lysol" is a true germicide, which means that it kills germs under practical conditions...even in the presence of organic matter (such as dirt, mucus, serum, etc.). Some other preparations don't work when they meet with these conditions.
3. Penetration..."Lysol" solutions, because of their low surface tension, spread into hidden folds of the skin, and thus virtually search out germs.
4. Economy..."Lysol", because it is concentrated, costs less than one cent an application in the proper solution for feminine hygiene.
5. Odor...The cleanly odor of "Lysol" disappears immediately after use.
6. Stability..."Lysol" keeps its full strength, no matter how long it is kept, no matter how often it is uncorked.

One of the "BIGGIES"

Lionel Stander is sitting pretty now—and nobody's more surprised than he

AS SOON as his contract was cinched, Lionel Stander bought a house and remodeled it. The first piece of furniture was a bed. It was the only piece of furniture in the house for weeks, and eventually everybody, whether occupant or visitor, gravitated toward it. There was no other place to sit down.

Stander heard of a good cook—they're scarce in Hollywood—and hired her pronto. Then he realized he had no stove. It took him three weeks to get the one he wanted. During that time the cook called up every day to ask how things were coming. That was all she had to do. Stander wasn't taking any chances on losing her.

Then he bought a bridge table, a pool table, and after that, bit by bit, specially-made tables and chairs. These were all very simple, very modern, and very serviceable. Stander helped the architect design them.

Pretty soon the house was a home and, like its owner, unique.

It was typical, too, of the way Stander does things. A non-conformist in domestic affairs, he is regarded in the only-slightly-wider circle that is Hollywood as nothing less than an iconoclast. "Lionel Stander?" people say. "Oh, you mean that one-man revolution."

And he revels in it—revels in being different. When he's not working—which happens less and less often—you'll find him sprawled on a ledge atop the hill at the end of North LaBrea, blinking down at the film city and croaking his defiance of it and the rest of the universe in that bullfrog voice which has brought him fame and fortune.

By Philip K. Scheuer

SO TODAY I'm one of the biggies," he'll say, his tone guttural and harsh, his head wagging from side to side. "One of the biggies. Me, a guy with a grotesque voice and a grotesque pan, up in the big money! Tomorrow—

"What do they want to know about me?" he'll bark, then; and, without waiting for an answer, "Tell them about the quick, surprised expression on my puss when I reach into my pocket and pull out a quarter. Tell them about the eleven people, relatives and what-not, I'm supporting—me, a guy who never held a job more than six months in his life!"

Stander had acted in five pictures in Hollywood before "The Scoundrel" hit the town. It wasn't until then that they really began to appreciate what a gold mine they had in this dark, homely, immensely magnetic six-footer with the tousled hair, the mismatched eyes—one brown, one gray—and the scrapy vocal cords.

"The Scoundrel," you will recall, was Hecht and MacArthur's fantastic melodrama about New York's decadent literati, with Noel Coward as the publisher who played dead.

After it was released, Stander sensed a new respect for his abilities among studio executives. He played Harold Lloyd's trainer in "The Milky Way," and was in "If You Could Only Cook" and "The Music Goes 'Round." Somewhere along about here he found time to go back and do another stretch for Hecht and MacArthur at their Long Island studio, interpreting "the world's only true radical" in "Soak the Rich." More recently he has been seen as Gary Cooper's distraught press agent in "Mr. Deeds Goes to Town." In "Meet Nero Wolfe," his latest, he's a dumb detective.

STANDER, who's known to his intimates as Jay (his middle name), started off in Hollywood as a "dialect comedian."

"But I don't hold it too much against 'em," he grins. "I'd been a dialect comedian for so long on the radio that people forgot I had ever done anything else."

Jay was on nine air programs, off and on. He faked Rubinoff's voice on (Continued on page 91)

Picnics are Fun

and Jean Parker's edible outing suggestions, simply swell

By Marjorie Deen

Courtesy Bond Bread Bakers

Here are the three sandwiches which may be included in your next picnic basket — hearty, dainty, tempting.

WHAT DO I really think of picnics?" replied Jean Parker in answer to a question I put to her recently on "The Texas Rangers" set. "Why, picnics are fun!" and she wrinkled up her retroussé little nose as though she could already smell the sea.

For Jean, I discovered from our conversation, is essentially a beach picnic enthusiast. The combination of a long swim in the salty waves (Jean is an expert swimmer), preceding a restful sunning on the sands and followed by a perfectly scrumptious picnic lunch, is just about the ideal way to spend a summer's day, to her way of thinking.

But those of us who may not have a beach within a cool thousand miles (or a far-too-hot hundred leagues) can picnic quite as enthusiastically, given the right refreshments, in the woods, on the rock-faced side of a mountain, in the shade of a tree, in the city park (police permitting!), in the corner of our own porch or backyard or even at the kitchen table! For picnics, after all, are dependent rather upon a state of mind than upon locality.

Of course, as I've already suggested, foods also play an important part in making a day's picnic outing successful. And on this subject I found Jean Parker most helpful.

"Oh, my, yes, I have very definite ideas on picnic foods," she assured me, "for I think eating is half the fun of going off for the day. Picnic foods, in my opinion, should comply with the following three rules: variety, quantity and easy "packability," if I may coin a word. But there are limitations to each one of these three essentials. Variety, for instance, doesn't mean being fancy and involved. And quantity does not mean taking along too much stuff, later to discard it recklessly along the way without regard for scenery or subsequent visitors. The third requirement, that of easy packing, can be met both by the correct packing equipment and the right type of foods to take along. Of course, this packing business is not very important if you plan to eat within the confines of your own place. But even so if the food is not the sort that could be packed easily, then it isn't the kind that suggests a picnic meal in the first place!"

Jean Parker, an avid picnicker, has some excellent tips on the subject.

BRIEFLY, then, what would you consider an ideal menu for a picnic?" I asked and hastened to add, "although I do think the term 'menu' is rather a formal way to describe such essentially informal foods. Perhaps 'eats' would be better."

"'Eats' it is," replied Jean with that charming smile that has won her such a devoted fan following and an attractive husband. "Of course, the easiest of all to pack and carry are sandwiches," she went on, helpfully. "You could talk about sandwiches for picnics for an hour and there would still be some novel sandwich spread you had forgotten or never even heard of. One of my favorite sandwich fillings is a combination of home-made ham loaf and chopped sweet pickles. This loaf is tasty, slices well and is bound to be popular with everyone.

"My ideal picnic menu would also include a salad. I tasted one the other evening at a buffet supper party that was so good that I intend to take this special type of Potato Salad with us the very next time we go picnicking. Many buffet supper refreshments would make marvelous picnic fare and the other way 'round," Jean observed sagely. "This particular salad would be just as good afield as at home—equally tasty whether served from a large wooden salad bowl onto dainty china or from a Mason jar or thermos container onto a paper plate! It has a most surprising and delicious assortment of ingredients, though not one of them is unusual in itself. It's just the combination that is intriguingly new." (I have the recipe for this Combination Potato

DID YOU NOTICE SUE'S TAN? IT'S A KNOCKOUT!
YEAH! GORGEOUS TAN —BUT I CAN'T "GO" HER TATTLE-TALE GRAY

"Oh, you cat! Why don't you tell Sue how to get rid of tattle-tale gray instead of meowing behind her back?"
"Don't worry, darling. I will tell her, first time I catch her alone."

"I'm sorry if I've hurt your feelings, Sue—but your clothes do tattle about you. It's not your fault. I know you aren't careless. But that lazy soap you use doesn't wash clean, and the clothes say so."

"Now you just change to my standby, Fels-Naptha. That richer, golden soap is so packed with naptha dirt practically flies out. Try it for stockings and undies, too—it's wonderfully gentle. And it's easier on hands because every bar holds glycerine."

"P-s-s-st, it's Sue. She wants us for dinner so we can see how perfectly grand her linens and things look now."
"Boy, one of her dinners is something. You'd better go tipping off all your friends to change to Fels-Naptha Soap!"

Remember one little thing

...or this may not come true!

ON your vacation you want to be at the top of your stride. You want to be at the peak of your form.

But it isn't always easy. For, as you know, a vacation means a change of diet, change of water, travel . . . and you'll often find that you need a laxative.

Now, just remember this one thing—don't let a harsh, over-acting cathartic spoil things for you. Strong purgatives are apt to throw your whole system out of rhythm ... upsetting your digestion, causing stomach pains—even nausea.

WHY A CORRECTLY TIMED LAXATIVE IS PREFERABLE

When you choose Ex-Lax you are choosing a laxative that works g-r-a-d-u-a-l-l-y . . . that takes 6 to 8 hours to be effective. In other words, a laxative that's correctly timed. Its action is thorough. Yet Ex-Lax is so mild and so gentle that it won't cause you even a moment's uneasiness. There'll be no shock to your system, no pain or disturbance of any kind.

DELICIOUS CHOCOLATE FLAVOR

And here's another nice thing about Ex-Lax . . . it tastes just like delicious, creamy chocolate. Buy Ex-Lax at any drug store. Tuck it in your traveling bag. There's a 10c size, and a still more economical size at 25c.

When Nature forgets — remember

NOTE: The following biographies are printed by popular demand. They are the ones most frequently requested during the last month by readers who have sent in the coupon at the end of the article. Each coupon has been tabulated, so if you have requested any of these, kindly consider yours automatically responsible.

HENRY FONDA: According to this department's readers, young Mr. Fonda must have "what it takes" and plenty to spare. In short, this poor old Desk is literally sagging with requests for his biography, and hastens to relieve itself of the burden here and now. On a certain May 16, Henry was born in Grand Island, Neb., of non-professional parents. William Brace Fonda, his father, packed his family off to live in Omaha when Hank was a mere youngster. There he attended public and high schools with a writing career in view. He worked his way through the University of Minnesota by serving as athletic instructor and general coach at a nearby settlement house, and studied Journalism along with various other writing courses. Upon graduating he tried in vain to get a newspaper job and finally became interested in the Omaha Community Playhouse. There Henry played his first dramatic role but took more of a liking to the technical end of the stage, remaining there for 3 years as scene designer and painter. In the summer of 1928 he journeyed New Yorkward, found work at the Cape Playhouse at Dennis, Mass., and then accepted an engagement at a summer theatre in Falmouth, Mass. Came Fall and an engagement with the Theatre Guild as extra and understudy. In one of these minor roles he was noticed by June Walker, selected to play the lead in "The Farmer Takes a Wife." Through her he was introduced to Marc Connolly and given the male lead. Soon after, Walter Wanger signed Henry to a contract, loaned him to Fox for "The Farmer Takes a Wife" and "Way Down East," to RKO for Lily Pons' "I Dream Too Much," and finally used him in "Trail of the Lonesome Pine" and "The Moon's Our Home." Right now he is working in Mr. Wanger's "Spendthrift" with Pat Paterson. As you probably know, Margaret Sullavan was at one time Mrs. Henry Fonda, and rumor has it that since the making of "The Moon's Our Home" in which they were co-starred, their romance has been renewed. Henry is 6 feet 1 inch tall, weighs 170 pounds and has black hair and blue eyes. Write him at Walter Wanger Productions, 1040 N. Las Palmas, Hollywood, Calif.

LOURDES, Holyoke, Mass.—Charlie Chan's son in those most excellent film stories is not Warner Oland's real son. His name is Keye Luke, he was born near Canton, China, educated in the United States and is a very talented artist. He will play with Mr. Oland again in "Charlie Chan at the Race Track" and also in "The Good Earth." By the way, Warner Oland is Swedish by birth, not Chinese.

JOHN HOWARD: Here's another young man whose star has risen apace during the past year. His real name is John Cox and he was born in Cleveland, Ohio, on April 14, 1913. Educated in the public schools of East Cleveland, he was an excellent student and won a scholarship to Western Reserve University, where he achieved more honors than you would believe possible. He was president of the University Players and the Student Council; senior manager of the basketball team; member of the National Collegiate Players, of the Y.M.C.A. Cabinet, the University Choir and the Thalian Club; won a Phi Beta Kappa Key, a W.R.U. Honor Key, a scholarship for work in English and a couple of essay prizes. Moreover, he was chosen as the most outstanding man in the Senior Class. The rest of his school activities were divided between dramatics and sports, and he managed to find time to sing and play the piano over radio station WHK. In the spring of 1934 a Paramount talent scout spotted young Cox in a campus show and offered him a chance to go to Hollywood. Amazingly enough, he refused. This was because, among all the other honors, he had won a scholarship to the graduate school and without that training he could not become the professor of English on which he had set his heart. But hard luck—if you can call it that—stepped in, and John found that it would be financially impossible for him to take this course. So, he reconsidered the screen offer and his first test was successful. In September, 1934, Mr. Cox reported at the Paramount Studio in Hollywood and proceeded to spend his first three months studying motion picture acting and technique. His first picture was "Car 99," the second was "Four Hours to Kill" and then he became John Howard and made a big hit in "Annapolis Farewell." Followed "Millions in the Air," "Soak the Rich" and "Border Flight." His most recent film is "Lost Horizon." Howard's hobbies are drawing and painting. He is 5 feet 10 inches tall, weighs 150 pounds and has blue eyes and brown hair. He is not married. Write him at the Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Los Angeles, Calif.

FRANK MONTGOMERY, Baltimore, Md.—Leave it to a man to ask for statistics! Yes, "The Great Ziegfeld" was an expensive-plus production. The picture is 20 reels long and the production costs amounted to about $2,000,000. It is said that one musical sequence alone set the studio back $245,000. And that's somepin'.

GENE RAYMOND: You'd hardly believe that Gene is of French extraction but his real name, Raymond Guion, is proof enough. Born in New York City on August 13, 1908, he made his stage debut at the tender age of 5 years. New York public and private schools gave him his education and a chance to take occasional stage roles between times. From 1922 to 1931 Gene's name was well known on Broadway and his last play, "Young Sinners," was such a success that it ran from 1929 to 1931. A motion picture contract resulted and he made his first film with Nancy Carroll in "Personal Maid." Since that time he has made pictures for nearly every major studio. Horseback riding, tennis and golf are Mr. Raymond's favorite pastimes. A thick juicy steak is his pet delicacy and he's an expert at preparing bacon and eggs. An excellent pianist, he also enjoys travel and likes to spend any leisure hours on the desert. Jeanette MacDonald and Gene are seen together consistently and 'tis said that there's romance in the air. This blue-eyed, curly-haired blonde is 5 feet 10 inches tall and weighs 150 pounds. He has an actor brother who calls himself Robert Marlowe. You'll see Mr. Raymond next in "Marry the Girl," with Barbara Stanwyck and Robert Young. RKO-Radio Studios, 780 Gower St., Hollywood, Calif., is his address.

FILOMENA LA SALLE, New York, N. Y.—Yes, Charles Farrell and Greta Nissen played together in "Fazil." It was a Fox picture released in 1928.

RUBY KEELER: She may be Irish but she hails from Nova Scotia. Born in Halifax on August 25, 1909, Ruby remained a resident there for only three years, after which time the Keeler family moved to New York and Ruby began her education in the public schools. Later she joined the Professional Children's School and at the age of 13 made her stage debut. Also, while still attending school, she appeared in the choruses of several Broadway shows. Texas Guinan's floor show first brought Ruby to the public's notice, and Ziegfeld signed her as chief tap dancer in "Whoopee." 1928 brought Al Jolson and Ruby together and they were married, after which she was starred in "Show Girl." Her first movie was "42nd Street" and she made such a hit that she's been tops at Warners ever since. Off the screen Ruby is very much Mrs. Jolson, shy and retiring, a modest dresser and a swell mother to their young, adopted son, Albert. A good wife, she likes to play golf, ride horseback and fish with her husband. A typical Irish beauty is Ruby—brown wavy hair and blue eyes. Her weight is 105 pounds and she stands 5 feet 4 inches tall. At present Ruby is taking a little vacation from the screen but she'll be back shortly. Write her meanwhile at the Warner Brothers Studios, Burbank, Calif.

DORIS DOYLE, Orlando, Fla.; BARBEE HILL, Brookline, Mass.; KATHRINE PARKER, Englewood, N. J.—In "First a Girl" Griffith Jones was the young man who won Jessie Matthews. He also played opposite Elisabeth Bergner in "Escape Me Never." This attractive Englishman started out originally to be a lawyer but was sidetracked by the drama. When in New York playing in the legitimate production of "Escape Me Never" he was offered a movie contract but preferred to return to England and the stage.

ROSS ALEXANDER: A kindergarten production started this lad on his acting career. At least, that's what he says. Born in Brooklyn, N. Y., on July 27, 1907, young Alexander made his stage debut at the age of 4, and from that day to the present has devoted his major time to acting. While still a student—education was a duty and secondary interest—Ross joined a group of young players studying and acting under Hugh William Towne in his Little Theatre in Rochester, N. Y. After two years he returned to New York to continue his dramatic training at the Packard Theatrical Agency. A lot happened on his graduation day. He became 18 years old and was assigned the juvenile lead in Blanche Yurka's "Enter Madame." That marked the beginning of a series of hit shows for him, ending with "After Tomorrow," at which time he was signed to a screen contract and sent to Hollywood. His first picture was "The Wiser Sex" opposite Claudette Colbert in 1932. 1934 brought bigger and better roles and now Warners are grooming him for stardom. His wife, Aleta Freel, died most tragically a few months ago. Ross is 6 feet 1¼ inches tall, weighs 160 pounds and has brown hair and blue eyes. His hobbies are the theatre, swimming, and soccer football. "Hot Money" with Beverly Roberts is his next picture, to be followed by "China Clipper" and "Shrinking Violet." Warner Brothers Studios, Burbank, Calif., are keeping him busy.

BRIAN DONLEVY: Here is a man with a past so exciting that it reads almost like a story book. In the first place, Donlevy was born in Portadown, County Armagh, Ireland, on February 9th. His father was a whiskey manufacturer who gave up that business when Brian was 10 months old to come to America and enter the woolen business. He died in 1933. His mother lives in Sheboygan Falls, Wis. Educated there and also at Beaver Dam, Cleveland, and St. John's Military Academy, Brian went to Annapolis as well. Before he was 13 he ran away to become bugler in Pershing's Mexican Punitive Expedition, and on his return 9 months later he was sent to St. John's. When he was 14 he joined the Lafayette Escadrille and went to France. There he learned to fly and became a sergeant-pilot. During 3 years of active duty he was wounded twice and after the war returned home. Brian then finished 4 years' work in 2, and received an appointment to Annapolis. During the year he remained there, he engaged in Academy theatricals, then decided to come to New York to try his luck on the stage. It was pretty bad at first, but through influential acquaintances he was given an opportunity to pose for an illustrator and finally landed the role of corporal in "What Price Glory." From that moment his steps led upward and he went from one successful show to another—from dramas to musical comedies—for 12 successful years. He went to Hollywood originally to play in "The Milky Way," but due to a delayed starting, he was cast in "Barbary Coast." Since then he has appeared in "Mary Burns, Fugitive," "Another Face," "Strike Me Pink," "13 Hours by Air," "Human Cargo" and "Half Angel." "High Tension" and "White Fang" are his latest. Brian is nearly 6 feet tall but, because of his breadth and thickness, doesn't look it. He weighs 190 pounds, has light brown hair and gray-green eyes. His middle name is Waldo, but don't let him know you know. He is not married. Write him at 20th Century-Fox Studios, Box 900, Beverly Hills, Calif.

L. M. K., Bronx, N. Y.—Yes, Franchot Tone and Loretta Young played together in "Midnight Mary," which was released in 1933. No, Ginger Rogers has never had any children.

ROSALIND RUSSELL: Daughter of a prosperous attorney, James E. Russell, Rosalind was born in Waterbury, Conn., on a certain June 4th. She attended primary school near there and later went to Marymount, a private school at Tarrytown, N. Y. As a child she was able to travel through Europe, South America and all over the United States, during which period she wanted to be a writer and theologian. She also wanted to be independent and earn her own money, so she finally chose the stage. Stock company experience, first in small roles, then in large, eventually brought Miss Russell to Broadway and two successful shows. Following the run of the last, "The Second Man," she was signed by M-G-M and made "Evelyn Prentice" as her first movie. Since then she has appeared in "The Night Is Young," "The President Vanishes," "Forsaking All Others," "Reckless," "China Seas," "Rendezvous," and "Under Two Flags." "Trouble for Two" with Robert Montgomery is her most recent. Tallish, slender, brunette, with sparkling black eyes, she excels in riding and swimming. Her pet aversion is gossips, and she is determined to succeed. Rosalind is not married, but, needless to say, she is plenty popular with the male Hollywoodites. Write her at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Calif.

JAMES STEWART: He's certainly not good looking, he's almost too thin and his hair is most unruly—but he's on his way to the top, and in record time at that. The son of a hardware merchant, Jimmy was born in Indiana, Pa., and attended the Prep School at Mercersburg Academy. Then he went to Princeton and excelled at track, high jump and hurdle. He also studied architecture diligently and assisted a magician during the summers. When he graduated and could find no job, he was persuaded by friends to join them at the Falmouth Stock Company, on Cape Cod. Thus, Jimmy Stewart of the Princeton Triangle shows, made his debut in "Goodbye Again" and had the good fortune of opening with it in New York. Came the next summer and a job as stage manager in Boston for "Camille" with Jane Cowl. Followed "Spring in Autumn" and several others, with a summer of stock thrown in, and finally back to Broadway and a screen contract. A bit in "Murder Man" introduced him to the movie public, then came "Rose Marie," "Next Time We Love," "Wife vs. Secretary" and "Speed." His next will be "The Gorgeous Hussy." Also, he will be with Eleanor Powell in "Easy to Love." Jimmy plays the accordion, of all things, but does himself proud with it, as with everything else. As we mentioned before, Mr. Stewart and Mr. Fonda are pals of long standing. They and several other young men go "dutch treat" on a house in Hollywood and your imagination will probably tell you that there's never a dull minute in it. You may write to this gentleman at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Calif.

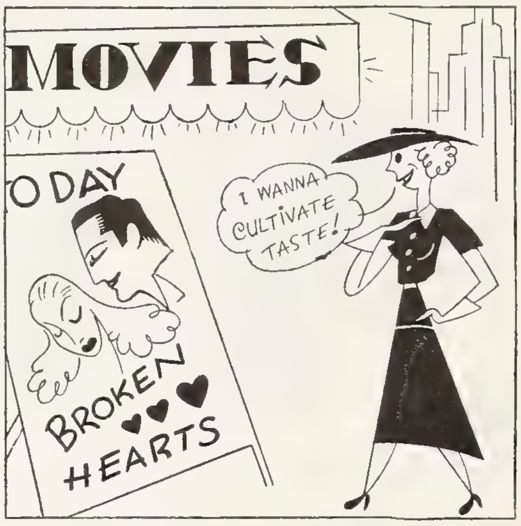
The Movies' Worth

Has it ever occurred to the legion of screen censors just what a great part these much maligned movies are playing in the lives of many thousands of people? First, the obvious part they play in spreading understanding of many types of lives beyond the ordinary knowledge; bringing romance to thousands of starved hearts completely lacking it in their drab, daily lives. Think what motion pictures mean to those people bound by circumstances to a narrow, limited environment! The world and its ways are theirs to actually look upon and to absorb, making them more intelligent people.

Then there is the second end gained—the effect on the actors and actresses themselves. Most of us can recall dozens of very ordinary young people starting out on a career, ordinary in appearance, thought and outlook. I've lived in Hollywood and I've seen it happen over and over again. I've seen those average young persons sacrifice, slave and plan to better their appearance, their knowledge of the niceties of living, their speech. It seems to me any profession that demands constant betterment of oneself is never to be scorned.—Dorothy Loop, Berkeley, Calif.



A Berkeley, California, gal gives her reasons for voting the movies a boon to mankind.

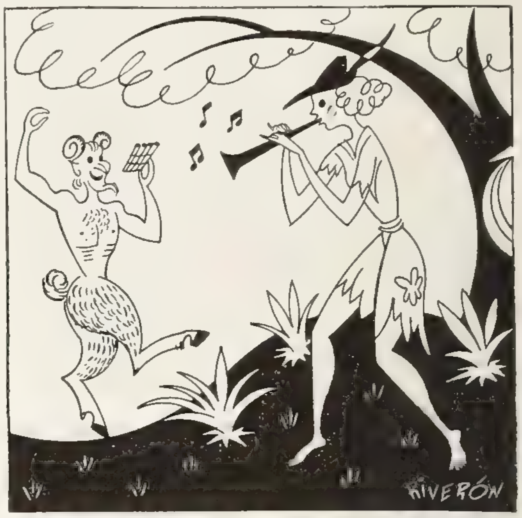
In Valentino's Footsteps?

The immortal Rudolph Valentino has been dead a decade. Yet, why have the movie producers failed to "talkerize" the former Valentino screen hits? Are they afraid of the long and faithful memories of the legion of Valentino fans? Do they believe it would desecrate our late idol's memory by having able actors give their interpretations of his roles?

A new generation of movie-goers has arisen since Valentino flashed to fame in "The Four Horsemen." Therefore, it would be safe to "talkerize" all of his photoplays, with small resentment shown on the part of the still avid Rudy fans.

Why not Charles Boyer in "The Sheik," Robert Taylor in "The Four Horsemen," Fredric March in "Monsieur Beaucaire," Robert Donat in "Blood and Sand" and Franchot Tone in "Cobra"?—George A. Abbate, Utica, N. Y.



From Kenosha, Wisconsin, comes a suggestion to cast Jean Parker in "Peter Pan." What do you think?

Claudette Tops Them All

The excellence of Claudette Colbert's histrionic ability has been emphasized by every motion picture in which she has appeared for some time back. Somehow I have felt that she was best adapted to unemotional roles, that she scintillated especially in parts which gave scope to her talents as a comedienne.

As Cigarette in that epic of the Foreign Legion, "Under Two Flags," she demonstrates that my impressions have been erroneous. Warm, impetuous, tempestuous, lovable and loyal, she rises to great dramatic heights. Clearly she carries away top honors. This is particularly noteworthy inasmuch as she is cast with such outstanding stars as Ronald Colman and Victor McLaglen.—S. L. Anrud, Denver, Colorado.

lowed to drift along in the obscurity of Westerns. He can make Gene Raymond, Robert Taylor, Dick Powell and Company look like the graduating class of a young ladies' seminary.

$1 PRIZE LETTER

New Partner for Nelson!

Please put the film companies wise to the fact that we want someone opposite Nelson Eddy besides Jeanette MacDonald in future pictures.

We are very, very strong MacDonald fans, but we do think that Lily Pons or Gladys Swarthout would make much better partners for him. The picture doesn't necessarily have to be opera, but what if it were! I think it would be a grand and glorious change from the general love story and spooky thriller. We should cultivate our tastes beyond them sometimes.—Kathryn L. Nicholas, Fredericksburg, Va.

Honorable Mention

What Say, Jean?

Jean Harlow's platinum hair was dazzling. Dazzling does not necessarily imply cheap. Tin and platinum are both dazzling, one is cheap, the other is not. There is very little in life to dazzle us, and we love it!

The softening of Jean's face, attributed to the change in her hair, is desirable. But it is accomplished by the more delicate lines of her mouth and eyebrows, as she now has them. The new hair is dull, ordinary, and unbecoming. Let's go back to the platinum standard.—"Wonder."

Just a Tip

I would like to voice a protest against the diction of some of the stars. My hearing is slightly impaired, so instead of relaxing during some pictures, I find myself straining to hear every word and phrase. I know it is partly due to the acoustics and equipment of the theatre, but I do believe if the players would improve their voices, we who are slightly hard of hearing would get more joy out of movies.

In my opinion, William Powell's diction is perfect, so, naturally, I make a special effort to see all of his pictures.—Mabel Gaulden, Roanoke, Ala.

Gloom Chaser

During the now famous—or infamous—days of the depression, there were times when it seemed that this old world was not worth staying in and while the old chin stayed up all right, it was helped to that proper rigidity by never missing a picture in which that splendid comedian, Edward Everett Horton, appeared. Therefore, I want to express my sincere appreciation of his ability to make me forget my worries and leave the theatre with a lift in my heart, after having had many good laughs during the picture. Besides being an excellent actor in any part, his facial expressions are so screamingly funny and change so suddenly that one's mind never wanders to things around for fear one second of the sequence might be missed.—G. Erskine, Seattle, Washington.

THIS LETTER from a Linit enthusiast will interest every fastidious girl and woman in America:

"Frequently I am faced with the problem of going out to evening social functions with little time to rest beforehand. However, I usually allow myself an hour in which to bathe and dress and so I decide to indulge in a little rejuvenating beauty treatment, in which Linit plays a dual role. First, I make a thin paste of Linit, mixed with orange water. This is generously spread over the face, neck and shoulders. Meanwhile, the bath water is running and to this I add a half package or more of Linit. While I lie in the soothing bath of milky Linit water, I feel the beauty masque of Linit slowly lift the tired facial muscles. Then, a cool shower removes the masque easily and I step out of the tub refreshed and eager to face the long evening."

Romantic ups-and-downs vie with social doings for top

The expected break-up of Mr. and Mrs. Lew Ayres finally arrived and now Mrs. Ayres, known on the screen as Ginger Rogers, has moved out. Hundreds of reasons for the parting have been voiced about. Some say Lew wouldn't take the little wife out evenings, and others blame it on Ginger's recent screen prominence. The real reason, and the simplest of all, is that they turned out to be a couple of people who couldn't get along. We first noticed it six months ago, at Grace Bradley's hay ride party. Ginger spent most of the evening dancing with other men and Lew spent all of it walking around looking sullen. A couple of weeks before they announced the separation, they squabbled in a Hollywood cafe and Ginger walked out. Things like that happen, they say, even outside our little Hollywood movie colony.

And now that Ginger is a free woman again and has no dishes to wash or whatever it is wives have to do, she's been seen about much more in the town's night life. Her most frequent escort is Jimmy Stewart, and their favorite companions are Margaret Sullavan and Jimmy's roommate, Henry Fonda.

Now the rumor is about that Jean Harlow will become Mrs. William Powell some time this fall. At any rate, the Harlow mansion has been sold, and a girl has to live somewhere, doesn't she? And Mr. P's home is no shack—almost anyone could be comfortable there. Among other things, it has the fanciest phone number in town. If any of you gals have the urge to cut in on Jean just dial MY-MY-MY, and the guy who answers is Bill Powell.

The private and personal Cupid who hangs around Gloria Swanson and Herbert Marshall wears a worried look these days, for there seems to be trouble brewing in that vicinity. Marshall, who once was quite happy about being photographed with Miss Swanson, now shoos cameramen away on the infrequent occasions when he and Gloria are together. And that's usually a tip-off to a busted romance.

wheels it all over the Fox studio. When she goes riding the cops blow their whistles and all traffic stops while the queen of the lot whizzes—if you can call eight miles an hour whizzing—by.

Incidentally, there's a new ruling at her studio that Shirley is not to be photographed in a room unless the room has overstuffed furniture. Seems Shirley is becoming a very big girl, and, with ordinary furniture, her bosses fear she may look too much like an ingenue. They say she's on a diet, too, hoping to get back that figure. After all, a woman of seven has to be pretty careful.

Quite a commotion when M-G-M loaned Clark Gable to Warners to play a prizefighter in "Cain and Mabel" opposite Marion Davies. First of all, the Warner Brothers wanted the Gable moustache shaved. M-G-M said Gable with a moustache or no Gable at all. Warners and the barbers finally won out, and Clark went to work. To get in trim for his role, he had to go through a two-hour daily workout, for which a ring and everything was set up on the lot. Being new at Warners, Mr. G.'s workouts came under the head of Special Added Attraction to countless stenographers in near-by offices, who spent so much time admiring the Gable contours that the brothers Warner strung up a large canvas around the ring. And the gals went sadly back to their typewriters.

Always a patron of the lively arts, Marlene Dietrich has lately divided her extra-curricular moments between director Fritz Lang and scenarist Willis Goldbeck. It must have been something of a problem one night shortly after her return from a location trip for "The Garden of Allah." The night we saw her she came into the Brown Derby, looking slightly more than beautiful in a red fox cape, with Herr Lang. Between cocktails and the first course, she left his table to commune a while with Goldbeck, who was seated across the room. Try that on your local eaterie sometime.

At the Carthay Circle Theatre, where "The Great Ziegfeld" recently held forth, a radio, during intermission, broadcast the acclaim of the paying customers. It was one of those "candid microphone" affairs, with the announcer buttonholing patrons in the lobby to get their opinion of the picture. Following a chorus of "terrific," "colossal" and "superb" statements one evening, the announcer made the mistake of collaring Groucho Marx. "How do you like the picture?" he asked. "Greatest intermission I ever enjoyed," said Groucho.

It isn't so hard for a girl to explain a black-and-blue jaw when her husband is in town, but when he happens to be off at a medical convention things are a little complicated. Betty Furness still wears the weirdest hats in Hollywood. One night she turned up at the Trocadero with a little number decorated with carrots and a few other garden vegetables. After other diners recovered from the shock, Betty waved at Ginger Rogers and asked her over to her table. Ginger shrieked back, "I'll bring a steak and be right over."

While we're in the startling chapeaux department, it might be well to record the fact that Clark Gable arrived at the preview of "The Princess Comes Across" with Carole Lombard and a beret. He took a terrific razzing from a gang of youngsters on the sidewalk and went in to view the picture, which contains a funny sequence about a he-man type of guy wearing a beret. On the way out the beret was stuffed in the Gable pocket.

Agricultural Note: Perhaps you didn't know that Francis Lederer is a gentleman farmer. He owns a ranch (they call farms ranches out here) which produces more vegetables than you can find on Betty Furness' hat. A few weeks ago, out of the goodness of his heart, Francis sent to every member of the local press a sack containing two heads of cabbage, together with a note promising us we'd hear from the apricots and the prunes as soon as they are large enough to leave home. Anybody want two heads of unused, but slightly wilted, cabbage?

Looks like Margaret Sullavan and Henry Fonda are planning another try at marriage. The last one didn't work out so well, mostly because Margaret was a star and Henry wasn't, but this time they can march to the altar with equal billing. In the meantime, the former Mrs. F. continues to be one of the most bizarre young ladies in these parts. Last time we saw her, at a skating exhibition, she arrived with an unidentified young man, and they both had an arm in a sling. La Sullavan, of course, was recovering from a broken arm, but why the guy was done up in similar style no one seemed to know, unless he was just being awfully, awfully gallant.

Dick Powell's throat infection cleared up sufficiently to allow him to go to work in "Stage Struck," much to the joy of the assembled Warner Brothers and a multitude of Dick's admirers. The studio is still worried about the future of the Powell vocal chords—worried enough to sign Rudy Vallee to a long-term contract. After all, two crooners are better than none at all—or don't you think so?

The Pat O'Briens hauled out the plush carpet and the best silver recently to celebrate the birthday of their daughter, Mavourneen. Mavourneen, one of the fanciest blondes in this section, has just turned two, but all her friends tell her she doesn't look a day over one and a half. All the neighbors' kids joined in on the party, which was almost spoiled when Frank McHugh's offspring toppled into the pool. Eloise O'Brien jumped in, pulled out the sinking McHugh heir, dried him off and made him promise to lay off the Grade A for awhile, at least.

★★★ Dancing Pirate (Pioneer-RKO)

Here is the latest of the color pictures and, in our opinion, the best. In the first place, the story is a fantasy, and color serves to heighten the illusion. Added to that is the fact that Robert Edmond Jones, probably realizing his errors in "Becky Sharp," manages to keep his color schemes subdued until the final scene, when he splashed it on for gorgeous effect. Briefly, "Dancing Pirate" is the story of a young dancing master who is shanghaied aboard a pirate ship. He escapes off the coast of old California and enters a village to find the natives armed to the teeth to protect their community from what they regard as a public enemy. On the gallows he gains a temporary reprieve by proving his dancing ability, much to the pleasure of the mayor's daughter and the rest of the young ladies of the town. The whole thing is travesty, heightened by the presence of Frank Morgan in his best comedy role, Steffi Duna and Charles Collins. In the title role, young Mr. Collins and his dancing add much to the general entertainment, but the picture and the majority of the high spots belong to Frank Morgan.

Preview Postscript

"Dancing Pirate" makes its debut as the first dancing, musical comedy romance in the new full-color technicolor. This is kind of a big brother to "La Cucaracha," that two-reel picture of two years ago, for it is produced by the same studio, directed by Lloyd Corrigan again, designed in color by Robert Edmond Jones and features Steffi Duna. The largest set used for this film was that of the old California Spanish village on the Pacific shores. This palatial place occupied more than an acre of ground on the studio lot and included thirty-two buildings, each structure authenticated by months of research. Coloring for the picture's settings were toned down as much as possible, with blue, green and dull browns predominating . . . Gabriel Cansino is the one who swirls that cape around with such success in one dance number. Cansino was formerly a command dancer and entertainer for the ex-King and Queen of Spain and was as famous in Spain as the favorite bullfighters . . . Charles Collins is the husband of Dorothy Stone. He is well known on the Broadway and London stages . . . Although the new color medium presents a host of new problems to producers, directors and actors, it is a boon to make-up departments. Make-up is practically a missing ingredient on the set when a color film is in the making. Grease paint, lip rouge and eye-shadow are out entirely. A light dusting of face powder is used just to kill highlights on bad features.

(Above) A love scene from "Private Number," co-starring Loretta Young and Robert Taylor. (Left) Dancing Charles Collins and vivacious Steffi Duna in the latest full-color musical romance, "Dancing Pirate."

★★★ Anthony Adverse (Warners)

Hervey Allen's prodigious tome, which has given thousands of citizens round shoulders merely from holding it, emerges on the screen a competent, well-made and not too exciting drama. It is the story of Anthony's life up to the time he leaves France for America. It is excellent as far as settings and general production are concerned, but it lacks fire and the lusty characterization which should have been given the role of Anthony. In the book, according to some of our more literate friends, Anthony Adverse was a vigorous gentleman who lived life to the full, but on the screen, due partly to censorship and partly to Fredric March's routine portrayal, he is a rather dull guy. However, the picture is well worth seeing, and will satisfy almost any audience. Of the supporting players, Gale Sondergaard, Edmund Gwenn and Claude Rains stand out in a cast which includes Olivia de Havilland, Donald Woods, Anita Louise, Steffi Duna, Ralph Morgan and Louis Hayward.

Preview Postscript

The settings used for this picture are more diversified than those used in several ordinary films. There are 131 in all, ranging in period from 1775 to 1801, which gave the studio technicians something to think about. As evidence of that million dollars which the Brothers Warner are reputed to have sunk in this film venture the elaborate sets are still to be seen on the studio lot, too elaborate to be relegated to the studio junk men. Among them are an Italian town complete with cathedrals, waterfront, streets, warehouses, villas, etc., a French chateau, a Tyrolean chalet, several plantation sets, and a three-block-long set depicting Africa's gold coast. The exteriors presenting the largest problems were snow-covered Alpine roads, dense African jungles, and scenes of the Italian countryside, which were difficult to duplicate around the Hollywood countryside . . . The costume department, however, claimed the right to the biggest headaches on the lot. The story is laid in an epoch during which the world was seething with changes, which influenced fashions to a marked degree. The French Revolution, for instance, which banished differences in rank, banished many distinctions in dress. All costumes worn for the earlier sequences were practically useless for the later ones, due to drastic changes not only in style, cut, material and trimming, but to all the lesser details of not only women's but men's clothing—such as night caps, cloaks, boots, stockings, buckles, jewels, linen, swords, fob ribbons, snuff boxes, etc. Costuming was further involved on account of the many walks of life represented in the film—peasants, seamen, laborers, churchmen, doctors, merchants, servants, noblemen and princes. 1600 players in all were employed to take part in the picture . . . "Props" are generally regarded in the light of smaller problems for any set, generally running to ash trays, flowers, etc., but not on this picture. The researchers spent months on the prop problem. All the coaches had to be built, and the periods required no less than eight types of coaches, including Post Chaises, Berlins, Cabriolets and a luxurious one of Don Luis', with a V-shaped body, perch springs, hand-painted panels and upholstered in rose velvet with the ceilings and walls of quilted peach satin. Many of the props were copied from old wood-cuts, such as the fiber baskets of the peasants, yokes for the slaves, wheelbarrows, hand carved furnishings, etc.

★★★ Private Number (20th Century-Fox)

For pure, unadulterated romance you'll look far before finding anything to beat the new team of Loretta Young and Robert Taylor. Breathes there a man with soul so dead, anyhow, who wouldn't revive at the sight of Loretta, while Robert is capable of making any woman's ticket worth at least twice the price. The story is redolent with gallantry and undying love, made plausible and sympathetic by the attractive stars. Loretta is hired as personal maid to Robert Taylor's mother, Marjorie Gateson. Though mama is fond of Loretta as her maid, it is doubtful if she would be so affectionate towards her as a daughter-in-law, so the situation is solved simply by a secret wedding. But there are a couple of things the lovers fail to take into consideration—namely the old blackguard of a butler, Basil Rathbone, who has evil designs on the fair young maid; Monroe Owsley, who once felt the same way; and the Facts of Life. So when scandal rears its ugly head, Loretta runs away rather than have Robert suffer on her account. He suffers, she suffers, they all suffer before Robert, his wife and child are finally united. In the excellent supporting cast are Patsy Kelly and Joe Lewis, who provide good comedy; Jane Darwell as the indomitable family cook, John Miljan, and Prince, a beautiful and intelligent Great Dane.

Preview Postscript

Lake Arrowhead, in the San Bernadino mountains some sixty miles from Hollywood, was the location site originally planned for the resort scenes on this film. But due to Loretta Young's recent illness it was decided the waters of the lake would be too chilly for her swim, hence the "lake" is little more than a glorified ditch on the studio lot. The gardens were photographed at the Graves estate in Pasadena—an estate belonging to old Californians, which is frequently rented out to the movies. Loretta had ten-dollar bets up with Director Roy Del Ruth and Cameraman Peverell Marley that she could swim under water for a quarter of a mile. Losing after some ten feet, she promised to be a good sport and come across with the ten bucks apiece. The next morning Director Del Roy was presented with a canvas bag containing 1000 pennies, while Marley received a long legal document, signed by twenty witnesses, which he had to sign in receipt of ten brand-new one-dollar bills beautifully framed fanwise under glass.

★★★ Fury (M-G-M)

Mob psychology and mob violence is looked into with considerable effect in this powerful drama directed by Fritz Lang, who is responsible for "M" and other notable European successes. The story, briefly, is this: Spencer Tracy, driving West to marry his financée, Sylvia Sidney, is picked up by a small-town sheriff and landed in jail because of his resemblance to a suspect in a (Continued on page 92)

Joan has gone into romantic costume for her next picture, "The Gorgeous Hussy." Word comes from the set that this return to work, for the first time since her marriage, has keyed Joan's enthusiasm to a high pitch and that she plans to be a knockout.

Charles Boyer

You would have to search hard to find two more intriguing screen personalities than Boyer and Harlow. Bette Davis tells why she has contempt for the modern viewpoint that two divorced people should pretend compatibility

By Ruth Rankin

FRIENDLY DIVORCES ARE THE BUNK

A DIVORCE is a public admission of defeat," said the girl in green, twisting a Daiquiri cocktail, "so why put on an act about it?"

We, who are about to interview, have come to anticipate a round with Bette Davis as a rare delight. She is regarded, fearfully, by her sister actresses as the family problem-child who is apt to break out any minute with the most shockingly frank revelations about their sacred-cows. . . .

She treads where angels fear, looking like an angelic school-miss with a "Cause" and possibly a dainty pearl revolver in her stocking.

"What I mean is," Bette flashed her eyes at us like a landing-field beacon, "this business about 'we're still friends.' A divorce implies conclusively: two persons, married, can no longer bear each other's company. The two say, in effect, 'We are sick and tired and disgusted and through. We hate each other. Give us, we pray and beseech, a decree of divorce that we may be free to begin our adult lives again, to seek solace and contentment elsewhere.'

"That last part of it is in the lap of the gods. Maybe they are so washed up with the whole business they don't want to seek. But the primary motive is freedom from a bond no longer endurable. If it is at all endurable, then they have no business asking for the divorce.

"But look what happens now in this, our Hollywood. After they have made their public declaration, what occurs? This. They go to the Trocadero that night and in a dim corner you find them all wrapped up like a pretzel, avec photographers. A columnist, the next day, declares it is the dawn of a new understanding, the 'birth of a beautiful friendship'!

"Sure, I know. It's all supposed to be very new and modern—twentieth century sophistication. They are being civilized. And it is not indigenous to Hollywood, it goes on all over the country—the world. In a lesser way.

BUT YOU can't tell me that any woman who has ever loved a man, really loved him, or any man who has loved a woman, can be friends again after a divorce. No two persons who have had that can be friends, ever again, whether they were married or not. It isn't in the cards. There are too many visions of the past to haunt them, too many wounds that can be healed only by years and then leave scars.

"They can't be casual, and mean it, if they have honest human emotions. The whole thing is a forced, unnatural attitude and many a woman is dying a little inside while hundreds of morbidly curious eyes are trained on her to see how she is taking it.

"There is a wide-open spot for some woman with the courage and the confidence to be simply honest. Some one who refuses to compromise with this syrupy ridiculous sophistication. Divorce is a serious business which wrecks innumerable lives—look at the suicide and homicide statistics.

"Kidding about it is like tying a pink ribbon on a machine gun.

"You can't tell me people wouldn't respect the woman who said, 'I hate the guy. He made my life miserable. I don't want anything further to do with him, any more than I would with any other (Continued on page 68)

THOSE GOOD LUCK PALS

Hank, left, owed a lot to Jim, above. So, when he got the chance, he put Stewart on the track to Hollywood success. Both are among the town's most eligible swains.

By Virginia T. Lane

Left, James gabs with Jeanette MacDonald, whose brother he played in "Rose Marie." And above, rumor says that "The Moon's Our Home" reunion with his former wife, Margaret Sullavan, spells real romance again for Fonda.

Henry Fonda and James Stewart, buddies for years, are real horseshoes for each other when it comes to jobs

THEY'RE like a four leaf clover to each other. Their story is like nothing you've ever heard before. It runs the scale from a two-by-four flat surrounded by New York's ace gunmen to a California estate surrounded by luxury . . . from milk toast (slightly scorched) to their colored cook's famous dinners . . . from walk-on parts to stardom. We mean, of course, the story of Henry Fonda and James Stewart.

Twice Jimmy has stepped into Hank's shoes, and twice they've carried him to success. The first time was in the Falmouth, Massachusetts, stock company. The second time was when he replaced Hank in the part opposite Margaret Sullavan in "Next Time We Love," and Hollywood and half America became Stewart-conscious overnight.

"And was he good in it! He transcended acting and pictures and everything in that play!" That was Henry Fonda speaking. But don't get the idea this is one of those back-patting pal stories. It goes so much deeper than that you begin to wonder if you actually appreciated before the fine essence that can go into a man's friendship.

They met backstage when Jimmy was doing his first one-line act on Broadway in "Good-bye Again." Said Hank, "I hear you're a better iceman than I am!"

"Yeah?" said Jimmy. They grinned. They might have been cut from the same pattern, those two. Long, lean, eminently likable. They went out arm in arm to get a bowl of chile.

THE TRUTH IS, if it hadn't been for that comedy role of the iceman in "It's a Wise Child," Jim Stewart never would have gone on the stage. You see, he had a diploma from Princeton that said he was an architect. He also had a letter from the bank which said he was broke. It was the gang from the Triangle Club that shunted him into the Falmouth stock company to replace a chap by the name of Fonda who had just left for New York. The company had been pretty fond of this Fonda and thought he was a swell actor to get the laughs he did as the iceman. But it wasn't long before some of the old Falmouth crowd down in New York began kidding the life out of Hank. "Don't think you're the only man who can melt ice behind a footlight! This Stewart's doing all right!"

So it was only natural that when Jim drifted onto Broadway he and Hank should hold an icemen's convention. It wound up with them

SHE KNEW WHAT SHE WANTED

Norma Shearer's the captain of her destiny, with ambition still driving her fearlessly on

By Rilla Page Palmborg

NORMA SHEARER'S first child would be a boy," said Hollywood, when the news was broadcast that the first born of Mr. and Mrs. Irving Thalberg was a son and heir. "Norma always gets what she wants."

That same statement was reiterated a few months ago when Norma's second child was a girl. And when the announcement was made that Norma had been chosen to play "Juliet," that coveted role in "Romeo and Juliet," Hollywood again nodded, "I told you so."

Looking back over Norma's career it does seem as though she always got about everything she set her heart on. But the successful Miss Shearer will tell you that she found many a twist and turn and steep grade up the Hollywood trail. There are those who have watched her transition from a plump, shy ingenue to a daring, glamorous sophisticate and then gracefully into roles of sweet virginity, who declare that only "the spirit of Shearer" could have carried one over the seemingly insurmountable obstacles and opposition that blocked her climb to the heights.

The spirit of Shearer asserted itself the first day she arrived in Hollywood, when with only four weeks guarantee of work and scarcely enough money to tide her over until pay day, Norma led her mother into what, at that time, was the smartest hostelry in the film capital, the Hollywood Hotel.

A few weeks later, when she found her small salary would not permit such luxurious quarters, that same spirit unhesitatingly led her to a tiny bungalow at the rear of a modest court where she and her mother lived for the next two years.

Said Norma, "I had to make good after I had been brought out here from New York. Failure would have meant disgrace. When I realized the hard struggle that stretched ahead of me I decided it was up to me to come down to earth."

"I had to make good," was Norma's challenge to life all along her fight to the top. Even now that she has reached the heights she does not feel secure.

"To me each picture that I make is a test," she said. I feel that I stand or fall upon my last efforts.

"As an actress gains a reputation there is so much more to live up to. No matter how successful you have been you fail unless you top your last effort; either that or people start whispering, 'She is slipping.' "

On the "Romeo and Juliet" sets the spirit of Shearer repeatedly asserted itself when Norma would insist on retaking a scene, even after director George Cukor had okayed it.

"I think I can do that better," she would say. The next "take" would prove that she was correct.

KNOWING WHAT she wants and not being afraid to go after it is one of the keynotes of the Shearer spirit. As she has often said, "The first five years of my career held nothing of importance to me except to become a star." To that end, she let nothing stand in the way.

Norma smiled when she told me how she fell in love with Irving Thalberg the first time she laid eyes on him. Frankly she confessed that she played a waiting game of two years to get the man she loved.

"Ever since the first day, when I went out to the studio to report to the Mr. Thalberg who had brought me to Hollywood, Irving has been wrapped up in my life every inch of the way," she said.

"The minute I met him his goose was cooked, although he didn't know it."

Norma chuckled, as she has a way of doing just as though she is laughing at herself, as she settled back on the divan. We were sitting in her bright, cheery ivory and green living-room in her Santa Monica home, that opens out on the broad expanse of the blue Pacific.

"It took me over two years before I was able to make Irving realize that I was on earth," she went on. "However, I bided my time. He was working hard. And besides he was engaged. So I kept hands off, but my eyes on. I worked in mysterious ways."

Norma admits she played a waiting game to finally win Irving Thalberg for a husband. The two, above, on a recent social evening.

Do not imagine that during those years Norma was spending her evenings alone pining for Mr. Thalberg. No indeed. An attractive girl like Norma had plenty of beaux. Life had always been an adventure to her and she looked upon Hollywood as the greatest adventure of all. By this I do not mean to infer that Norma ever burned the candle at both ends. When working there never were or never have been late hours for her. And never (Continued on page 90)

He's Married Again

Edmund Lowe vowed he wouldn't, but something made him change his mind

By Julia Shawell

A YOUNG BACHELOR film player with a contract that runs longer than six months is a gift from Heaven to the Hollywood ingenues. A star with a Reno decree is like a mile-long trellis of honeysuckle to the hopeful unattached or semi-detached beebees. But a widower with a successful marriage of several years behind him that only the grim reaper could have terminated, the kind of widower who can say "no" to two of three major companies on the matter of long-term agreement and stellar billing, well, he's like a blue ribbon at the county fair, a cool wind in an August Bermuda, sunshine in an Eskimo's night life—he's tops!

And so when a grief-stricken Edmund Lowe, wearing his badge of mourning after Lilyan Tashman's funeral said, "I shall never marry again," I knew he meant what he said then. But I also knew that the variegated cinema beauties would in no time at all make a state highway out of the isolated ox-trail that led past his emotional seclusion. I wasn't wrong. Before the bitter first poignant grief of his unexpected bereavement had lifted its shadows from under the Lowe orbs, there were sweet little things who wanted to be sympathetic.

ALSO THERE were onlookers who said, "Well, Eddie's not twenty-one any more and those girls really are gorgeous and anyhow nobody's more than human." It's true, in due time Mr. Lowe was reported escorting the three-months-option blondes to film openings. He was spoken of as having said "hello" to the prettiest of them; and in Hollywood "hello" just begins the gossip. Then he was called to England to turn Americanly British for "Doomed Cargo" and those who had known him a long, long time remarked hopefully:

"Well, this will be it. She'll be tall and blonde with one of those Devonshire peaches-and-cream complexions and she'll wear French clothes in the English manner that will remind him of Lilyan and she'll not talk so much that he can't tell her M-G-M wants his name on the dotted line. And, of course, he'll come home a bridegroom."

Eddie Lowe went to London. He was dined and feted and photographed. He saw the beautiful English girls, and a few of our American protégées who are doing well for themselves before the English cameras. He had a good time, for a few weeks, and then one night he awoke before sunrise and he missed a certain girl. He kept on missing her so much that he cabled and ran up quite a transatlantic telephone bill and he couldn't wait to get back to her. The girl he missed happened to be Rita Kaufman whose perfect make-up never brightened one of your screen hours,

Alas, She's The Type!

What seems to be Anita Louise's greatest asset is her biggest handicap

By Martha Kerr

SUPPOSE THAT you were five-foot-three with golden hair, violet eyes, peaches-and-cream complexion, slim figure and just nineteen, that wherever you went, people turned and stared, wondering if they had seen aright on beholding such loveliness. How would you like it?

"Oh," says you, "don't be sil! What's the catch?"

You're quite right. There is a catch. For, in order to complete the picture of Anita Louise, you'll have to be full of ambition—full to the point of overflowing. Wanting to act more than anything else, wanting real roles that required experience and skill and knowledge of interpretation. And, because of hair, eyes, complexion, et al, you couldn't get a chance to do anything really important, your beauty handicapping instead of helping you in your chosen work.

"Now isn't that just too bad?" queries the cynic. "Tch, tch! Life must surely be tough for that gal, hitched as she is to a long-term contract in a glamorous profession, with plenty of parties and beaux to escort her to them."

Well, life; that is, movie life, isn't all it's cracked up to be to this beauteous actress. In fact, on many an occasion, it gets her down. When she sees the picture plums being passed to the less talented because they're less beautiful, she does a silent nip-up, realizing that if she only had a chance, what she could do with such-and-such a characterization.

ANITA LOUISE is neither naïve nor sophisticated, which facts you must take into consideration when you hear her remark, "My looks have hindered my picture progress."

Truly, there wasn't an atom of conceit shining through that bland statement. It was said simply and honestly as one might say, "I should never wear yellow. My complexion just won't stand it."

"There was the time," remarked Anita ruefully, "when I played a small role in 'The Firebird.' It was definitely 'character' and, according to the critics, I handled it well. Now, I thought, I'll surely be taken seriously. No more girly-girly stuff for me. But it didn't take long for me to realize the extent of my optimism. No, indeed. I just sat and sat and sat, waiting for the studio to cast me in another role into which I could sink my teeth. None came. That is, none of that sort. Next time I played, I was just a bit sweeter—if possible—than ever. Oh, gosh!"

Myrna likes surprises to keep things lively—and she's a bit of a surprise herself!

By Hilary Lynn

UNMASKING Myrna Loy

Above, a threesome from "To Mary With Love." Left to right, Ian Hunter, Myrna Loy, Warner Baxter.

At a Hollywood premiere with her favorite escort, Arthur Hornblow. She likes obscure night spots best.

The shrinking violet act is Myrna's little joke, for actually she's an adventurous soul with amazing foibles

HOLLYWOOD'S MOST charming wife is still unmarried.

A paradox? Yes, but so is this lady who recently was described, in one of our more sophisticated magazines as one "who cowers shyly behind her enormous success—like a mouse with an inferiority phobia"—in a Beverly Hills house, "where she collects sculpture and freckles."

Nothing could have been farther from the truth. Except, perhaps, the part about collecting. But what Myrna likes to collect more than anything else is sensations! Yes, she is by way of actually being a sensationalist! Why, Myrna, that's a bit of a shock!

"Nonsense," said Myrna. "I wouldn't be able to survive a routine existence. I'd be bored to extinction. That's why I spend hours planning ways to surprise myself. The more sensational the surprises, the better I like them. That's why I wake up every morning saying to myself, 'Today must be fun. Today must be different from yesterday. What surprise can I think up that will make it better?' And each surprise is like a novel seasoning that transforms an everyday wish into something special." For instance, Myrna insists on beginning each day with a different kind of soap for her shower, and won't allow her maid to tell her what kind it will be, because she wants it to be a surprise. However, her favorite scent is heliotrope, and that's almost impossible to obtain unless ordered from abroad. Next best, she likes pine or balsam. Says it reminds her of a certain day she spent last summer in the Bavarian Alps.

Surprise No. 2 comes with breakfast—and not having to worry about her girth, each day's breakfast menu contains something different, even though it only amounts to a new flavor of jam or jelly. And about this trifling surprise she also must be unaware until breakfast is served. But she likes kippered herrings so much that, whenever they appear on the table, she counts it as a very special conspiracy to make her day less humdrum.

And what she says about seasoning can be taken literally. She likes paprika on her vanilla ice cream!

NOW, JUST because Myrna isn't seen in the popular night spots of Hollywood doesn't mean that she isn't getting about. It simply means, as she'll willingly admit, that she doesn't like to do the regular things, live the conventional life of a conventional movie star.

If anyone wanted to be a real sleuth and shadow our Miss Loy of an evening, he'd more than likely find her with her fiance, Producer Arthur Hornblow, in some dim cafe in Los Angeles' Chinatown, near the railroad tracks, around colorful Main Street. Or down on Central Avenue, the Harlem of Los Angeles, in a barn-like second floor interior—formerly Club Araby, now The Apex—unknown except to a few of the more curious, adventure-seeking souls in Hollywood, frequented by few white people, it's the picturesque spot where the city's dark-skinned folk disport themselves in their own spontaneous manner, and not for the benefit of gawking spectators.

A whole evening at The Apex—including a Southern fried chicken dinner, torch singing and syncopation that goes to town in a manner not much inferior to Cab Calloway—sets a patron back no more than a medium-priced ticket for the theatre.

"Compared to The Apex, Harlem's much-vaunted Cotton Club bores me with its grandstand play to the customers. It's so much more fun to sit in that funny, badly lighted cafe on Central Avenue and watch those clusters of interesting, dark faces all about. And their wonderful unselfconscious abandon to a good time! How I envy it. Besides, whenever I'm there," Myrna smiled reminiscently, "the torch singer always (Continued on page 70)

Above, Frances Dee McCrea returned to the screen recently in "Half Angel," and Joel has just finished "Two in a Crowd."

Frances and Joel aren't smug about their marriage, but they've found a happy career-and-home combination

THESE TWO—they are something outside of this world, Frances and Joel.

The other day a man who shall be nameless, because one is convinced he is a fool in spite of his high position in picture circles, said: "It is a shame Frances Dee married and had two children. That sort of thing hasn't any glamor."

Late the same afternoon, I sat talking with this girl who is so supremely happy that her radiance is diffused throughout the house in which she lives and even reaches out gently to touch all who come within its range. Frances has a glamor so rare and authentic there is no standard for comparison with it in Hollywood. This uniquely standardized village of ready-made labels has no label it can apply to her. In the same category with young women, bent on making themselves appear to be something rare, exotic and expensive, it somehow is ridiculous to mention Frances Dee's name.

If you believe at all in civilization, she has a glamor that outranks them all. She has achieved the perfect marriage with the man for whom she must have been created, she has two sons, and she has unassailable security. Since this combination is the aim and yearned-for goal, admitted or unadmitted, of every girl in her right mind since time began, how can there be the slightest doubt that Frances Dee has the most enviable kind of glamor?

As if this were not enough, she is considerably this side of thirty, she has a delicate, warm natural beauty—and she is one of the finest portrayers of poignant emotional roles on the screen, the kind that tear your heart out but give it back to you in better shape than it ever was.

An inner radiance, to be very poetic about it—and Frances is unalterably allied with poetry—conveys something of itself to all who see her on the screen. I think no one who has ever come in contact with it could be entirely immune, however unimpressionable. And yet Frances is the most unassertive girl possible to imagine. A most completely feminine woman, in its best sense, she makes no attempts to prove it with tricks of speech, or clothes, or attitude. She doesn't even know it. She just is.

TO THOUGHTFUL observers, one of the most stimulating modern trends is this aroused interest in happy marriage as a theme for pictures and novels. Two most spectacularly successful pictures have been "The Thin Man" and "Wife versus Secretary." It seems as if the world, weary with its divorces and marital maladjustments, is turning to the thought of the really compatible marriage as the highest form of romance.

This paragraph is a build-up for the statement that

THE Magic McCREAS

By Caroline Somers Hoyt

Joel and Frances are an infinitely more interesting pair than they were in the days of their early adolescent attraction. They are so beautiful together. I do not believe Jesse Lasky is unduly a sentimental man, but he was there when Joel arrived home, and we looked at each other through a perfectly frank mist at the greeting between Joel and Frances—simple and tender and touched with living magic.

We had a long talk before that time, Frances and I.

She told me she did not expect any more of her marriage when she made it, than any other girl expects. There was no electrical current touched off which fused them into one and made happiness inevitable.

In fact, at the very first, when they met while playing in a picture together, Frances didn't even like him! She thought Joel must be painfully (Continued on page 64)

Right, the McCreas spend every off-screen moment at their ranch which they actually farm. They have two small sons.

Tumbling TO THE TOP!

Joe E. Brown, having arrived, knows it's harder to stay there than to get there

By Franc Dillon

Mr. and Mrs. Joe E. Brown and "chillun."

IF JOE E. BROWN'S mother hadn't decided to do her annual housecleaning early one spring about thirty years ago, we might have no Joe E. Brown pictures on the screen today. And isn't that a dismal idea? If you don't think so, ask the first child you see.

Did you ever attend a children's matinee when one of Joe's pictures was the attraction? If not, you have something to look forward to. You won't hear any dialogue because it will be lost in the din—the din of the shouting, stomping, screaming, laughing, joy-mad children. They yell encouragement when Joe gets into difficulties; they hiss the villain with the greatest enthusiasm and they whistle, scream and clap hands when he comes out on top.

You'll forget your financial problems, for your chief worry will be to get out of the theatre with two whole ear drums. If you are able to do that, you'll believe in Santa Claus and Joe Brown.

His popularity with juvenile audiences is one reason that for the past five years he has never been lower than fourteenth on the list of the most popular stars on the screen.

BUT TO GO BACK thirty years, Mrs. Brown, as we said, was cleaning house and everything was turned upside down. Furniture was piled in vacant corners and a huge leather couch was moved onto the side porch while the cleaning went on.

Little Joe was just nine years old. It was nearing time for the annual visit of the circus and his heart was set on mastering a trick he had seen a clown do the year before. Of course, when the couch was in the house neither Joe nor any one of his six sisters and brothers was allowed to put a foot on it, but outside was different. At least Mrs. Brown couldn't be everywhere at once and the couch made a perfect practice ground.

By standing at the high end of the couch and making full use of the springs, Joe, after a few days' practice, learned to do a flip-flap. Eager to display his skill before the kids at school, he attempted it one recess time on the cinder path outside his schoolroom. He chose that particular spot because the teacher he was "in love with" at the time was looking out the window.

He took a deep breath, leaped high in the air and came down head first in the cinders. The teacher dug ashes out of his hair and his circus ambitions went into a decline—only temporarily, however, for time mended his head and the circus was still coming to town.

THROUGH THE little Jones boy next door, Joe met a Mr. Ash, who was organizing an acrobatic troupe, which he hoped would be taken on by the circus. Because he was quite small for his age, agile and eager to try the stunts, Joe was hired as the smallest member of the company. A contract was drawn, which his entire family read with much interest and signed with great enthusiasm. Joe's salary, of $1.50 a week, was to be sent home to help support the family, and Joe's career was begun as a member of the "Five Marvelous Ashtons."

He soon learned that his experiments on the old leather couch hadn't exactly prepared him for the tricks he was called upon to do as a professional. To make matters worse, the troupe was signed up sooner than Mr. Ash had hoped and Joe had to make his first appearance without a rehearsal. It might have ended disastrously but it didn't, and Joe managed to stick it out, making up in courage and determination what he lacked in training; enduring the hardships, the beatings and the loneliness as a part of the game. It never occurred to him to give up, to return home and admit he had been a failure.

He was repaid a hundred times and all his troubles forgotten in the great thrill he experienced the day he returned home with the circus! The triumph of being a full-fledged circus performer in his own home town! He admits today with all his good fortune and success that life has never since offered him a thrill like that.

HE CONTINUED with the circus, arriving home each fall a little late for the opening of school and leaving in the spring before summer vacation began. But he managed, somehow, to finish grammar school. The circus led to vaudeville engagements and, finally, after nearly twenty years, he achieved the goal of every actor—he played on Broadway!

For several seasons he was featured in Broadway hits, and when he came to Hollywood with a show, he was immediately offered a picture contract. Before starting the picture, in which he was to be starred, he asked to play a small part in another film so that he could size up his job.

It was agreed and he played a small part in which he died in "Crooks Can't Win." He died so effectively that he was asked, a few days later, to die in another picture.

"I was so good in death scenes," Joe recounts, "that in each picture they killed me off a little earlier. I finally remonstrated. I didn't want to be typed as a corpse, after all!"

Some stars have nifty secret ambitions you'd never guess

Taking it BIG

AND NOW there's another epidemic of "Taking It Big" in Hollywood. Just when we thought our movie belles had quieted down and gone demure in a manner to delight a prim Sunday school heart! Just when we had made up our minds that showing off and temperament all belonged to the dear dead-and-gone era when Pola Negri, Clara Bow, and Gloria Swanson made things lively around the movie lots!

But, dear me, no, those days haven't passed! The town's all broken out in a brand new rash of taking it big. I don't suppose the current cases are any more serious than little Willie's spring dose of the measles or Susie's annual tilt with tonsilitis, which grandma used to cure with a good old-fashioned dose of sulphur and molasses. But what movie belle would take sulphur and molasses? You're right!

Our epidemic is here. The signs are unmistakable. Not one or two, but a whole raft of our best people have succumbed to the germ. Lemme see, now, there's Carole Lombard.

Carole has been bitten by that ol' davvil, the Social Bug. Yessum, our Carole, the gal what has wisecracked her way through more Hollywood brawls and soirees than you can count, has suddenly become society conscious.

I think it all started with, of all things, the Venice Fun House party. Up to that time, whenever she wanted to give a party, Lombard just gathered a few hundred souls around for laughs. Once she took the chairs out of her dining-room, threw a little hay down, and had the guests sitting on the floor drinking champagne out of tin cups. That was a howling success as a dinner party, but it was intimate and confined to her best friends. The Venice

Fun House party was open to the public, in a manner of speaking, or to all the movie big shots, the intellectuals, our scintillating stars, all of whom went sliding down chutes and spraining wrists and ankles with great gusto. They loved the party, or said they did, even though they paid X-ray technicians, doctors, and masseuses, for weeks afterward. This big affair captured reams of space in the newspapers and excited international comment. Stanley Walker even wrote about it in his book, "Mrs. Astor's Horse." Mebbe I'm wrong, but up until this time I don't think Carole had given much thought to social success.

Came the Mayfair Ball which Carole ran. Ho, hum! Footmen in white satin pants, all the gals told they had to wear white, (Continued on page 84)

From Gangster To Model Citizen

Chester and Mrs. Morris take Brooks and Cynthia for a whirl at the circus.

Mr. M.'s a T-Man in his new Columbia picture, "Counterfeit." He's glad to be a law-abiding film citizen again after so many "bad man" roles.

Chester Morris, movie tough guy, is Hollywood's mildest gent

TURNING OVER a new leaf isn't as easy as it sounds, but it can be done. Chester Morris says so and he should know what he is talking about, for he has accomplished the feat himself.

From a hard-boiled fellow, who has been looking up from under his eyebrows and ordering everybody about in a high-handed manner, he suddenly has turned into a hard-boiled fellow, who still looks up from under his eyebrows and orders everybody about. But there is a lot of difference between the fellow he was, and the fellow he is now.

In the beginning, Chester had a long row of pictures in which he played a crooked hero. However, crime doesn't pay—not even in the movies. So Chester has reformed. He is on the right side of the fence now, and whatever villainy he practices, is in the cause of justice. Instead of glorifying gangsters and their nefarious schemes, he is glorifying the nation's defenders of the law.

I had a long talk with Chester on the set of "Counterfeit" where he was portraying the life and trials of a T-Man. In case you don't know what a T-Man is, he sleuths for the Treasury to find counterfeiting plants and planters. Chester was quite happy about the story. He said he thinks it is even better than "Public Hero Number 1." It will be a world-beater if it is, for "Public Hero" gave him a new lease on life and a grand contract.

"I can't figure out why people think I am hard-boiled in my private life," Chester said, "but everybody does. I get the strangest letters from my fans and even from my relatives. I have never met Sue's cousins back (Continued on page 77)

With Fingers Crossed

Isabel Jewell hopes the jinx that's dogged her so long is beaten at last

By Ben Maddox

Isabel has high hopes for her work in "Lost Horizon."

SOME GIRLS have such a tough time. For the life of you, you can't figure it out. They have what it takes to click. They try so darned hard, and their efforts are wholly sincere.

Breaks, long-deserved, finally come. And then, inexplicably, the follow-up is bad luck and setbacks that are soul-wrenching.

I think you must have a friend who is one of these persons. If so I know you'll be better able to understand the most extraordinary case in Hollywood.

Today they are loudly declaring that Isabel Jewell is finally coming into her own. That in "Lost Horizon," under Frank Capra's superb direction, her performance is a dramatic gem. As the lying, embittered cynic who is accidentally re-born into the radiant young woman she should have been all along, Isabel is unquestionably triumphant. But is this truly the turning-point? A few of us who are close to her certainly hope so.

In the flamboyant movie colony, where progress is garish and where you're either a hit or you aren't, she is a mystery. Not really Isabel herself, but her fate. The question you keep asking is why? Why has she had to fight so fiercely for everything?

So far, although critics and fans have unanimously pointed to her as one of the best actresses on the screen, she's been amazingly unfortunate—in her career, in love, even, recently, at home.

Isabel is actually the last girl who ought to be in the spot she has been in. She is bright as well as attractively blonde. She comes from fine family stock. Obviously she's talented. And if she hasn't found permanent success and happiness it isn't because she couldn't handle her opportunities.

That's the queerest slant on her struggles. She has fully capitalized on each chance and has been rewarded with an immediate pat on the back. For awhile she's apparently headed for the heights—in Hollywood, and so far as personal fulfillment as a woman goes. She's thought that, surely, having played a role so satisfactorily, there'll be plenty of work. That, having proved how deeply she loves, there'll be an end to loneliness.

BUT AGAIN and again she's bumped into the blank wall of nothingness.

There is no less impressive acting to cancel her good impression. There are no violent quarrels to spoil what has had all indications of developing into an ideal marriage. There's been just—a lull.

The same agonizing thing has repeated itself, patternlike. The battle to obtain a job, the intense concentration to make her characterization matter, and then not a single call from the studios while the applause is still lingering in the public's mind. The meeting with the man, and when she's completely, (Continued on page 86)

Your child can easily compare with these starlets in glowing health and beauty

NOW WHAT, you may be asking, has inspired me to turn my critical eye toward the younger generation? I'll tell you in one seven-letter word: Letters. Pathetic letters from unhappy adolescents. Letters from anxious mothers who are at their wit's end over little Patsy's refusal to eat anything but banana splits and chocolate cake, over Josephine's complexion or Annabelle's figure, not to mention Mary Louise's inability to enter a room without tripping over the rug, stumbling against the Chippendale, and busting the best tea set to smithereens.

Mothers sometimes resent outsiders giving advice to or about their children. They think they know best. And some of them do. But, on the other hand, some of them don't. Often the tendency is not to bother and just say, "My child will outgrow her bad skin. And she's

British Importation

MISS CARROLL," I began, after we were settled in the Spanish comfort of her Beverly Hills home, "you have just returned to this country and I have been delegated to take you apart, see what makes you tick, learn about the real Madeleine Carroll!"

She looked startled. "You're not going to do anything violent are you? If so, I shall have to call for help."

There was a laugh, and into the room walked an Englishman who didn't wear tweeds or smoke a pipe! "I couldn't help hearing what you said. I think I had better sit in and protect you from my wife. You see, she knows perfectly well what you mean—she's twigging you, pulling your leg—aren't you, darling?"

Madeleine looked very bland. "I'm sure I don't know what you mean. This gentleman sounded distinctly violent."

The Englishman took her hands in his and said, "You know you're being shy of publicity again, dear, and you know you never come to any good end thereby. You had better talk to him or he will go away and say you have a skin like a Chinese monster—and eat your young!"

Madeleine's face resumed its mock serious look. "Oh, is he an interviewer from the press? Why didn't he say so? Why did he have to sound like a medical student?

"Well," sighed Hollywood's latest import from London who has been alliteratively described as very blonde, very British, and very beautiful. "I suppose I must do a great tragedienne and 'tell all'." She flung her hands over her head in an exaggerated gesture. "But first I want you to meet my husband—Captain Philip Astley. As you can tell from the way he barged into this room his manners are atrocious."

Lovely Madeleine Carroll hopes she's back to stay

YOU CAN put on a marvelous outdoor act this summer without having to crash through with a single swimming cup or even a horseshoe pitching record! All you have to do is to dress the part of an outdoor fan and then just relax in a convenient sunny spot while the more virile souls do the work. Of course, if you like good strenuous play, so much the better. With shop windows running over with the grandest suggestions for every sort of sport, anyone is going to feel like a shut-in, who doesn't go in for at least one action sports outfit this summer.

You can garden in a smock and overalls, play in shorts, ride a bicycle in culottes, scurry about in slacks and haunt the beaches in suits of exceeding brevity or decorative modesty. In fact, you can have the time of your life just letting yourself go a bit native. Don't be afraid to let old Sol take a good burning look at you!

Recently, the new West Side Tennis Club in Hollywood had a swank official opening—all the sports enthusiasts of the cinema crowd turned out and good looking clothes were in abundance. In the grandstand, Virginia Bruce looked especially smart in a pastel light wool dress topped by a plaid sports coat, fox trimmed. Her broad-brimmed straw hat had an amusing fluted ribbon trim around the outer edge of the brim. Her shoes were the classic brown and white combination with broad straps of the brown leather.

BETTY FURNESS, another good looking spectator, wore one of those giddy hats for which she's justly famous. Giddy but practical because it was one of those washable affairs that looks like a Puritan bonnet and is actually only a wide piece of material which snaps at the back of the head. The front can be turned back into a narrow brim and the back shows the hair. For washing it just becomes an oblong and wide piece of material. And so inexpensive that you can have any number to match different dresses. Nearly all the department stores have these and it's a simple trick to buy one and make the extras, using the original as a pattern. If you can't find one in your local store, write in and I will tell you where you can order one by mail.

The rest of Betty's costume, which I almost skipped in my enthusiasm for her hat, consisted of a very smart tailored white dress topped by a bright woolen coat. And her shoes were different, too, being white pumps with broad white bows for trimming—very much like the patent leather pumps we used to wear to dancing class!

Out on the courts, Lili Damita wore tailored white shorts and shirt with white socks and navy blue sneakers (these are much newer than the all-white sneaker). Heather Angel, who played with husband Ralph Forbes, arrived in a long white polo coat over her tennis shorts. A bright scarf was the only touch of color, even her hair was caught back by a narrow white ribbon. Shorts and shirts with socks and sneakers were definitely the feminine choice for active play.

An experience: dîner de luxe at the Pierre. Feuille Norvégienne, perhaps. Then Borsch Polonaise, followed, if your Russian mood continues, by Suprême of Halibut à la Russe. Then Braised Lettuce, String Beans au Gratin. Then a Camel, a crisp salad, a Camel again... and an ice with demi-tasse and—Camels. "Camels are by far the most popular cigarette here," says M. Bonaudi, banquet manager.

The delicate flavor of Camels is a natural complement to fine foods. For it is a matter of scientific proof and common experience that smoking Camels promotes good digestion. Enjoy Camels with meals and between meals—for their mildness and flavor—their comforting "lift"—their aid to digestion. Camels set you right! And no matter how steadily you smoke—Camels never jangle your nerves.

Such enthusiastic demonstrations of affection might have been looked upon with a raised eyebrow in the days of "Poppy," but Rochelle Hudson and Richard Cromwell are getting a huge kick out of it. Stretched Pores SPOIL THE PRETTIEST FACE

CAUSED

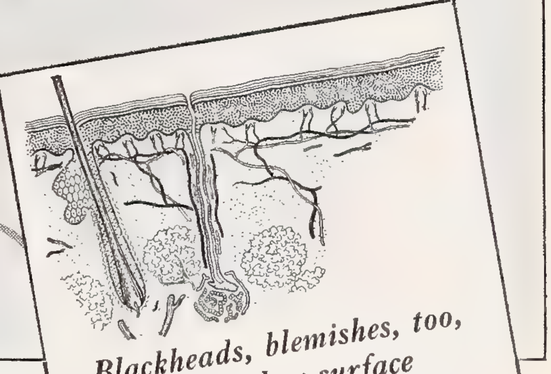
UNDERNEATH

Miss Mary McHale, popular New York society girl, says: "Pond's Cold Cream keeps my skin smooth and fine."



Blackheads, blemishes, too, start below surface

Cross-section showing tiny underskin glands, nerves, blood vessels which make your outer skin what it is—good or bad. When oil glands function poorly, pores clog . . . blackheads, blemishes follow. Read below how to treat them.

See faults go—
with UNDER SKIN Treatment

THE three commonest skin faults usually follow one another!

Once a girl allows blackheads to dot her skin, she's sure to be bothered with blemishes, too. And, blackheads and blemishes sooner or later mean—stretched pores . . . hardest of all to get rid of . . . hardest to bear!

It's easy to understand, once you know how they start.

All three come from clogging just under the pore opening—the result of a faulty underskin.

The little diagram above explains—When the underskin slows up, and glands get out of order, pores get clogged with their own oils. Dirt settles in . . . a blackhead! Unless you remove that blackhead, it develops into a blemish. Meantime, all that clogging keeps stretching and stretching your pores.

Rousing underskin treatment fights them off

You can avoid them all—keep them from spoiling your looks—by the steady use of Pond's rousing underskin treatment.

Mrs. Rodman Wanamaker II of the prominent Philadelphia family, says: "I'll never have blackheads or blemishes—using Pond's Cold Cream. It makes my pores finer. I use it night and morning."

Just day and night—a thorough rousing and cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream . . . and soon your sluggish underskin is functioning freely again. Pores keep clear. Blackheads, blemishes stop coming. Pores actually reduce!

For Pond's Cold Cream contains specially processed oils which go deep into the pores . . . clear them of dirt, make-up, skin secretions. Then you pat in more cream—briskly . . . Rouse that faulty underskin. Feel your skin tingle with new vigor!

Do this daily for quick results

Every night, cleanse with Pond's Cold Cream. As it brings out the dirt, make-up, skin secretions—wipe off. Apply more cream. Pat in hard—to get at that neglected underskin!

Every morning, and during the day, repeat treatment with Pond's Cold Cream. Your skin comes softer every time. Powder goes on beautifully.

Keep up these Pond's patting treatments. As blackheads soften, press them right out. Now blemishes stop coming. And the places where pores showed largest will be finer textured!

You'll find this chart simple to follow and a valuable guide in choosing film entertainment. Instead of giving you the individual ratings of Modern Screen and authoritative newspaper movie critics all over the country, we have struck an average of their ratings. You'll find this average under General Rating, beside each picture. 5★, extraordinary; 4★, very good; 3★, good; 2★, fair; 1★, poor. Asterisk denotes that Modern Screen ratings only are given on films not reviewed by newspapers as we go to press.

Here's the reason Tangee lips won with Mr. Talbot

• Lyle Talbot makes the test between scenes of his newest Warner Brothers Picture "The Law in Her Hands".

● "I may be old-fashioned," said Lyle Talbot, "but I like a girl's lips to have a fresh, dewy look. That's why I don't like paint." And millions of men must feel the same way. For more and more girls now have natural-looking lips . . . Tangee lips.

Tangee is an amazing lipstick that gives your lips color without painting them. It contains a magic color principle that changes on your lips to a warm shade of blush rose. If you prefer more color for evening wear, use Tangee Theatrical. There are two sizes: $1.10 and 39c. Or for a quick trial send 10c and coupon for the 4-Piece Miracle Make-Up Set offered below.

spoiled, he was too good-looking not to be.

"I was most unhappy, giddy, going through that trying time when I didn't know what I wanted and knew I wouldn't like it if it was presented on a gold platter. All girls go through that, I guess, and it's pretty terrible. I looked at Joel and thought no man could be that good-looking and have any depth. Things were so easy for him, he was so popular with women. I thought he was just another of the good-time boys, and told myself, sternly, 'Be careful and don't have your heart broken.' It was so hard to believe that anyone as sweet and considerate as he seemed to be, could actually be that way all the time, even at home, as he is.

"We go through a severely skeptical age, too, with flashes of lightning clarity at the same time, you know. Probably it's one of the provisions of nature to make us examine everything presented during our most formative period, to help us avoid the wrong thing. Well, I couldn't find any foundation for my skepticism—and by that time I was too in love to care."

Frances sailed off on a sea of blissful reflection.

"You know I was almost militantly independent (now honestly, can you imagine that?) long enough to find out how empty it is. I guess that's why I now cling to my family so hard. Also, when one has a bit of the solitary nature, a family seems more of a miracle.

"Whatever faculty I have for happiness has been developed through Joel. You cannot think how Joel can bring out qualities you never suspected you had. I think he is the most appreciative human being I have ever known in my life. He is always so genuinely grateful for what he has.

"For instance, he loves to ride. When I first knew him, he went riding on a rented horse and had a marvelous time—he was delighted to be able to pay the hire. When he owned his very first horse, he went to an auction and bought one nobody else wanted. A year later, everybody wanted it. I actually think he gave pride to the horse, he enjoyed and appreciated the animal so much. He does the same thing with land—he makes the most of everything he has by enjoying it so deeply. Joel is not casual with anybody or anything which has his interest and allegiance.

"Most people can't get enough cars and horses, power, money and fame. If only they could learn to enjoy and make the most of what they have, the way Joel does. I suppose, in a way, he is sort of an 'applesaucer,' he likes to make everybody feel good." Frances smiled as if applesaucing agreed with her.

I ASKED about her picture work—how Joel felt about it.

"Joel never has asked me to give it up, unless I want to. He knows I wouldn't be completely happy without it. You see, I am not at all a social person who likes bridge and parties. Oh, I did, once, but they merely filled a gap in life. I guess I just outgrew them. Frankly, I go to things now mainly to be obliging." Frances looked around kind of scared, as if she hoped the wrong persons hadn't heard that. "But there's no use pretending. I am not a mingler. Oh, I have friends, love them, and want to see them often. But working in pictures is like being at a party all day long. It is a peculiar work in that it is so social and makes so many social demands. But, my goodness, you can't go to a party all the time, and that is exactly what it amounts to if you keep right on after returning from the studio. The need for that sort of recreation has been filed before I get home.

"Every woman has an overflow of emotion, something for which she needs an outlet, and she can't express all of it at home or she would wear out her family.

"I—well, I have a desire to act; there is something I want to and must express, something I have to release, somehow. And mercy, wouldn't it be awful if I put on performances for my husband all the time?

"Some women can express themselves in clothes, in club work, organizations of various kinds, in business and in entertaining, outside of their family life. If they keep it balanced, it seems to me a very good thing; it should make their families more serene, because it helps to overcome a tendency to be too possessive. I am inclined to be rather possessive—pity poor Joel if I didn't have an acting safety valve!

"Joel is right—he's always so right, without rubbing it in—not asking me to give it up." Frances smiled shyly. "He's really so much more than just a nice boy. But I don't imagine people think of him so much any more just as a nice boy, do you? He has such grown-up determination never to do anything petty that you simply can't stand being petty yourself.

"Oh I don't mean we haven't had our difficulties, our small jealousies, possessiveness—but never anything really important. Joel has a faculty, one which I think is quite rare in a man, the gift for bringing back illusions and making everything new again. He never refers to an unpleasantness, once it is over.

"If anything ever came between Joel and me, it would be my fault."

Young Joley entered into the picture at this point and carried on quite a conversation, although he neglected to let us in on what he was talking about. His mother will undoubtedly resent that; she stoutly maintains a perfect comprehension of every word he says, if you can call it a word. At any rate, we got around to the subject of glamor. Frances sat back looking like a very young boarding-school girl trying to look like Frances Dee trying to look glamorous.

I asked, "Joley, how do you feel about it? Do you think your mother has glamor?"

Joley surveyed her with due solemnity. Frances struck a pose. We waited. But we will never know what astute and sagacious wisdom his year-and-eight-months was about to provide, because just at that moment, Frances happened to reach her hand between the davenport cushions and brought out, to her complete astonishment—a pair of rubber baby pants!

Well, it ruined the act. The glamorous movie queen languishes in her parlor, waving her eyelashes and telling all to the avid press—and with a graceful gesture of her alabaster hand, she produces—baby pants.

Ah, Frances, you rare and utterly delightful woman. It's okay with thousands and thousands of us that you leave the phony glamor to the built-up glitter girls, and give us one genuine enchantment: the tenderness and the happiness that looks out of your eyes

Romantic Grace Moore is practical, too

● Glamorous screen costumes get safe Lux care at Columbia Studios. This one (right) was designed by Kalloch for Miss Moore to wear in "The King Steps Out."

She adores Luxables —insists on Lux care

GRACE MOORE loves luxury in clothes—that's the grand opera in her! Yet she won't run the slightest risk of having her lovely things spoiled with careless washing.

Linen suits, trim sports clothes, Luxable silks and rayons, frothy cottons, so ravishing for summer, are easy to keep superbly fresh her Lux way!

"Lovely colors and fragile fabrics come out of Lux gloriously new-looking, time after time," she declares.

Luxing is different from ordinary washing—protects you from cake-soap rubbing, soaps containing harmful alkali that may fade color, weaken threads. Lux has no harmful alkali. Safe in water, safe in Lux!

Specified in the big Hollywood studios... "We use Lux to restore the freshness of all kinds of things, from elaborate period costumes to slim-fitting modern clothes," says William Bridgehouse, wardrobe supervisor at Columbia. "The camera can't find the slightest imperfection!"

CLEAN YOUR SKIN AS DOCTORS DO

USE A LIQUID

● Take a tip from your physician. Did you ever see a doctor use anything except a liquid, to clean the skin? Then why not follow his lead! Use a liquid yourself—use DRESKIN, Campana's anti-alkali cleanser and freshener. Dreskin is your protection against blackheads and dry, "faded" skin—because this new-type cleanser NEUTRALIZES ALKALI, the skin-drying element that is present in practically all water and in solutions of soap and water. Dreskin does the kind of pore-deep cleansing that removes all trace of stale make-up and dried gland secretions—letting your skin breathe naturally, as it must do, to be healthy. Jack Looks Out for Oakie possible. That's why when they got to Balboa for an all-day stop, one of the musicians told Oakie that the boat wouldn't leave until midnight—which was a lie if ever there was one, 'cause everybody knew that the boat sailed at eight. Still Oakie accepted the advice in good faith, and when sailing time came he was still out doing the town. The musician heaved a sigh of relief.

But the Captain could not sail without all his passengers. So Balboa was combed and Oakie was found and the mastering of ceremonies continued, far, far on into the Pacific.

Still his undying exuberance is the thing that has made him famous. Not only to all the world, but he's about the best known person in the movie colony. Garbo and Dietrich may never have met, ditto Hepburn and Colman, but everybody knows Oakie. And while everybody pretends that Oakie gets under their skin, in their hair, and under their feet, nobody would really have it otherwise. Not long ago when there was some talk of Oakie buying a house in Toluca Lake—the popular star-colony out Burbank way—his pals ganged together, visited a sign painter and before long all the roads in that section bore the brilliant warning, "Keep Poison Oakie out of Toluca Lake." But it was just a gag, and nobody knew it better than Oakie.

He used to be Hollywood's Delightful Date until he met Venita Varden just about eight months ago, and he's been her delightful date ever since. Right from the beginning he told everyone that this girl was different. And on Sunday, March 22, they were married.

Venita, unlike most of Oakie's girls in the past—Peggy Hopkins Joyce, Toby Wing, all eleven of the "Murder at the Vanities" chorus, Mary Brian, and countless others—is best described as quiet, demure and domestic. She was born in Georgia, and educated at Sweet Briar College and also at Washington Seminary. She wanted to be a decorator, but became a model and a show girl instead. She's been around the world three times. In Paris she modeled for the famous Patou. In New York she was the original Russell Patterson Girl, and she was also in several of the "Follies." It was while she was working in one of them that she first saw Oakie. Harry Richman on the stage spotted him in the audience and in typical Richman fashion stopped the show to say "Hello." One glance at that homely, good-natured mug and Venita had a feeling she was falling. But she didn't meet him then. Not until she was brought to Hollywood eight months ago to be further glorified in "The Great Ziegfeld."

But even Venita, with Oakie practically in the palm of her hand, has found him difficult to cope with at times.

There was the time recently when he said to her, "Now, Pidgeon, I have a great treat in store for you. I'm going to introduce you to High Society, get you in with the right people, on account of how you and I really should surround ourselves with class. You're the type, and I'm going to do right by you. So fix yourself up pretty Saturday night, and I'll be seeing you at eight."

Venita took him at his word. She bought a new dress, a new hat, and the latest shade of nail polish, and dilly-dallied at her dressing table for three whole hours. "Gee, will you knock 'em dead," said Oakie on beholding her.

Venita expected to meet a title and Oakie didn't disappoint her. They went to a party at Man Mountain Dean's! Venita was the only girl there and the rest of the guests were all wrestlers!

But when Oakie told me about it, he wanted me also to understand that very often he does go out in Real Society—as often, he says, as he can stand it. "But there was that red and white party at Countess di Frasso's that wasn't half bad," he informed me. "They had a good gag there. They had microphones under all the chairs. Of course, they didn't make a record of anything I said, 'cause I was tipped off, but you should have heard some of the stuff that was picked up! Boy, was it hot!" (Funny thing, that Oakie was tipped off! Well, you put two and three together yourself!)

What Oakie says kiddingly is the truth, if you can judge by the clamoring, among stars and prop boys alike, that goes on when there's a chance to work in an Oakie picture. There was actually a lot of bribing and begging, especially among the crew workers recently when Oakie made "Florida Special." Why? Because working is always fun when Oakie's around. He strolls on the set in the morning, fingers an imaginary mustache and striking a John Barrymore pose says in a deep, rumbling voice, "Tell me, my friends, what is the play? And what is my part?"

Of course, Oakie is an awful scene stealer, but he's such a grand guy that his fellow stars don't seem to mind it very much. There was only one whom Oakie remembers who wouldn't let him get away with it, and that was Victor McLaglen.

"It was while we were making 'Murder at the Vanities,'" Oakie recalled. "At the end of one important scene we both had to go out the same door. Well, as anyone knows the last actor out of the scene usually gets the scene, because after he's left alone in front of the camera he can do most anything he likes on his exit—make faces, give 'em this, give 'em that—you know what I mean. Well, in the rehearsals, I always fenagled it so Vic had to go out of the door first, and for a while I didn't think he was noticing how I was pushing him a little. But then came the take, and that big brute gave me such a push that I went right through a brick wall, through the sound proofing and all, and landed right on the street.

"Not that I use any tricks that shouldn't be used—be sure to get me straight! At least not when I'm working with someone who doesn't try them on me. But an old-timer like Vic knows tricks, too, don't forget. He's a smart guy and okay."

And Oakie does look out for Oakie all right! Like the comic who gets in your hair, he believes it pays to advertise, too! On the door of his dressing-room, there is a large photograph of the large Oakie head—in color, mind you. And since Oakie's dressing-room is first on the left after you pass the studio entrance, nobody entering or leaving the lot has ever been able to avoid it. Nor have persons with itching fingers and handy pencils seldom been able to resist it! Once when I saw it not long ago the Oakie mug was adorned with Valentino sideburns. But that was soon replaced with a fresh reproduction of the original. Again the Oakie eyes peered out from under a row of Jean Parker bangs. But nothing discourages him. The banged Oakie too was whisked away and replaced by the pure Oakie visage. More recently when I visited him in his dressing-room, he was busy erasing Harold Lloyd spectacles.

"Of course, it's worth the trouble," he told me in answer to my query. "'Cause you know what? Why the other night at a party I met Governor Lehman of New York. He'd been through the studio the day before and I asked him what sets he liked best. And you know what he said? He said, 'I don't remember any sets. There's only one thing I remember . . . can't seem to get it off my mind . . . the picture on your dressing-room door.' And what did I say? Well, I didn't want to sound too conceited, so I said, 'Funny thing, horror pictures always affect me like that, too.'"

"Gee," he said. "The blight in my life shows a tendency to self-portraits, too."

"Don't let it worry you honey," said Oakie. "All comics do! If Oakie doesn't look out for Oakie, then who else will?"

I thought I saw what he meant.

If the comic in your life didn't look out for himself—would you?

Tumbling to the Top

He then made "Hit of the Show," which was a big success, and his motion picture career was launched. His popularity has increased steadily and last year, for the third time, he was voted one of the ten biggest money-makers on the screen. That's not bad when you consider that some of your favorites are way down the line in box office appeal. Garbo, for instance, was forty-fourth last year.

But, according to the comedian, getting to the top is not nearly as difficult as staying there once you have arrived. A majority of ranking stars will agree with him that their worries on the way up were nothing compared to the responsibilities that come with fame.

It cannot be denied that there are many advantages. A star who can attract money to the box office can just about write his own ticket. In Joe's case, he has a salary that satisfies him and also everything he could think of written into his contract. Many things were put in for a laugh, but one paragraph stipulates that his manager may come into the studio to see him at any time. As it is well-known that his manager, Mike Levee, isn't on speaking terms with his employers, there was an obvious reason for that clause.

There are the advantages of a salary that permits you to live like a king; to own a string of race horses, if your tastes run that way; to sponsor athletics whenever they need a helping hand; to give liberally to charity; to do, in fact, almost anything you would like to do.

But where there is a large salary there are always taxes and regardless of the compensations of stardom there is always the worry for fear the new picture won't be a little better than the last one. "Just as good" pictures don't keep a star on top.

Joe E. Brown's recipe for keeping his place is to keep his fans laughing. "As long as I can keep on making them laugh, I'll be happy," he says. "People go to the theatre to escape problems and cares, not to weigh themselves down with new ones. They want to be amused and if I can do that, it's all I want."

Joe doesn't take himself too seriously. He doesn't think that life wouldn't go right on if he stopped making pictures tomorrow, although many of his admirers

THE liver should pour out two pounds of liquid bile onto the food you swallow every day. If this bile is not flowing freely, your food doesn't digest. It just decays. Gas bloats up your stomach. You get constipated. Your whole system is poisoned and you feel sour, sunk and the world looks punk.

A mere movement doesn't get at the cause. It takes those good old Carter's Little Liver Pills to get these two pounds of bile flowing freely and make you feel "up and up". disagree on that point. But he does believe that a comedian has a definite mission in life.

"It's serious business," he says, "working from nine to five trying to think of ways to amuse people."

Strictly speaking, Joe is a serious person. Occasionally he surprises the company, as he did one day when he made his appearance on the set walking on his hands. Again one day when he decided life was a little dull, he livened things up a bit by holding a lighted match under the canvas chair in which the director was sitting.

"Oh, we have lots of fun," he quips. "We took eighteen days to make a six-day bicycle race."

THE country bumpkin, which he usually plays in some form or other, was designed primarily to appeal to children, knowing, as Joe does, that if he makes Johnnie laugh, Johnnie's mother and father will laugh, too. He feels a great responsibility toward children.

"I've never had any dirt in one of my pictures," he says, "and I never will. A comedian who relies on dirt to get laughs isn't worthy of the name."

Apparently audiences agree with him, and especially mothers who, aware of his reputation for making clean pictures, send their children to the theatre without a worry when he is advertised as the attraction.

I happened on the set when he was making a song-and-dance number for "Sons O' Guns," and listened shamelessly when I overheard an argument.

"But, Joe, it would be funny," said Bobby Connolly, the dance director.

"Well, not funny enough," protested Joe.

Back and forth went the argument. Judging by the feeling displayed on both sides, I thought it could concern nothing less important than whether or not they should continue with the picture. Finally Joe gave in. "All right," he said, "but get me those mentholated ones." And I learned that the whole disagreement had been because Bobby wanted Joe to do a funny bit of business with a cigarette. He never smokes or drinks in a picture because he doesn't think it is a good example for young people.

It was with many misgivings that he decided to depart from his usual type of picture and make "Bright Lights" some months ago. In this picture he had a serious romance in addition to his usual comedy antics, and he was doubtful if his youthful admirers would accept him as a romantic figure. He knew that the greatest sin a star can commit is to become dull or old-fashioned; he knew he must keep his pictures up-to-date and he decided to take a chance.

He attended the preview of the picture fearfully. He sneaked into the theatre after the lights were out and sat in an obscure corner. When the time came for him to kiss his sweetheart (Ann Dvorak, remember?), he strongly considered crawling under the seat he was so sure he would hear some youngster yell, "Raspberries!"

Nothing like that happened. The children liked it; his other fans liked it and it was a hit on Broadway, where Joe E. Brown pictures had not been considered big money-makers. It marked another milestone in his career.

He's never the life of the party. In fact, he seldom attends parties, finding his greatest pleasure in his home and family.

"The only thing I have to sell is humor," he explains when asked to be funny at every public appearance. "I have to save it for my pictures."

But he never refuses to appear for a worthy charity, especially if that charity is for children.

"Aw, I try out my humor on them," he explains sheepishly. "If they laugh at my gags I know they'll do for a picture."

MOST of his public appearances are attending sports events, which he loves. He exercises constantly and instead of resting between pictures, plays baseball for recreation. He never has to diet, being slightly on the thin side, and his favorite drink is an ice-cream soda "with plenty of whipped cream."

From a window in his beautiful Beverly Hills home he can look over a huge lawn which contains flowers, tennis courts for the boys, slides and swings for the younger children.

"I get more kick out of all this than the kids do," he said thoughtfully, as the memory of his half-starved childhood flashed through his mind. "You can't fully appreciate having everything you want unless you've gone through long periods of not having anything you want."

In the house, where everything is designed for the comfort and happiness of every member of the family, he points with pride to a small soda fountain. He is its steadiest patron.

He reads everything—newspapers, fiction, biographies—but says his favorite book is the Bible. He is known as a man who always keeps his promises. Two years ago he took his wife to the Orient because he had promised her he would take her there on a honeymoon at the time of their marriage twenty years ago.

"A guy can't be a piker about his wedding trip forever," he quipped.

Friendly Divorces Are the Bunk

person who failed me. I refuse to go through with this ironic pretense for the sake of appearances. Whose appearances, for heaven's sake? I've put him out of my life, and I want him to stay put!' And the same applies for the men."

Bette pushed her hat off her forehead and warmed to her subject.

"Fine talk, fine theories!" we declared, fanning the flame. "But would you carry through, in a similiar spot?"

"Would I! Look—I never had a divorce and I never intend to get one, with any luck and the wind on our side. Barring an act of God or the public enemy, Ham is my husband for life. That was our intention when we married, and it remains so. But if anything happened to us—a long if—I would hate him doubly for having once been fond of him. He would have to let me down terribly, which I cannot imagine him doing, and it would disappoint me so bitterly, I wouldn't even want to hear his name again, as long as I lived.

"A divorce is no disgrace nor is a broken heart. But putting up a lying front to honest emotions, is.

"Why all the smoke screen? What is there to cover up? Two people have appeared in an open court for all the world to see, hear, and know that they wish to be rid of a hateful tie. The reasons advanced are devious and mainly puerile, but easily penetrated. So the public knows, beyond any question of doubt, exactly what they think of each other.

"So then, why the glad greeting when they meet? Whom are they impressing? The publicity is over—they couldn't escape it with the divorce, if they wanted to. I say if. They have taken a stand about each other—why not stick to it? What are they being brave about? The time to be brave was before the divorce—brave enough not to get it.

"Another thing. I do wish somebody would take a week off and define 'mental cruelty' for me. The other day I saw where a woman said it was mental cruelty because her husband called her 'a little squirt!' I thought to myself, 'Baby, you should hear some of the things I've been called. And for good and sufficient reason, too. Then that old jealousy line is one that never fails to get me down. The little woman lisps, 'Judge, he wouldn't even let me dance with other men.' The time for complaint, lady, is when he doesn't give a continental.

IN order to apply for a divorce, it seems only logical that you should have a real reason in the first place. In England, where they take these things a mite more seriously and give them some time and thought, you have to go into the English courts and tell all. It makes absolutely no difference whether you are Duchess, Lord, or bar-maid. You present reason and show proof, and go to it hammer and tongs, while a lot of profound gentlemen in long black robes and curled wigs sit in judgment—and tolerate no nonsense on the subject.

"Probably it makes the English deliberate a while before they get around to it, and so a lot of them never do divorce. The persons who want to be divorced badly enough to go through this ordeal seem to go right on living afterwards even though most of their private linen has been aired. There is a place where gallantry ceases to be gallant, and it strikes me that when a person whom you have taken in sacred matrimony is messing up your life sufficiently to make you wish to cancel your vows, gallantry is as superfluous as a third leg.

"It is definitely sadistic to expect a new wife or husband to accept the old one as a member of the family. At least it is decadent and contrary to the laws of Nature, and an awful strain on somebody, no matter how noble a front they may put up.

"Of course, in a small town like Hollywood, ex's are always running into each other. And no matter how horrible the divorce was, at the time, no doubt they have to adopt some protective measure or coloration or whatever. Nobody wants public scenes or a frantic scrambling of one out of the back door as the other enters the front. They can be civil, if necessary, but this new intimacy is nauseating!

"It is really terrible when there are children. I feel so strongly about divorce because my mother and father were divorced when I was ten; they hated each other then and they still do. If they had striven to keep up a pretty-pretty front for my sister and me, I couldn't have had the least respect for them. My reasoning would be: if you can do that much, then why did you have to go to the extreme length of breaking up our family and getting divorced at all?

"Out here in Hollywood a lot of angles enter, which do not apply to the rest of the world. Two persons with screen careers, married, wish to part. They feel, or are persuaded, that they must 'keep it clean' for the sake of the other person's career. But you find careers beginning to slip just as often after a 'clean' divorce, a frank divorce—or any divorce at all. Especially among those who have been married over five years. People grow to be dependent upon each other in ways they do not realize until they are separated." Bette paused, and we thought of a dozen illustrations to this point, but silently.

"You know, honestly, I used to have the weirdest ideas about marriage. I thought in order to be a good wife you were expected to be dull. That antagonized me, so I tried going to the other extreme. The first two years I was married, Ham was away in the East most of the time. So I dashed about merrily and threw the challenge in their teeth. I, a dull, stodgy, stay-at-home Frau? Never! I thought it was terribly smart to show up some place with four men, to give the gossips a good run for their money.

"Then Ham came out, and one day he remarked in that slow, sensible New England way of his, 'If you ever stop to realize marriage is marriage, you'll be a lot happier.'

"You see, I thought marriage was giving up your rights. Now I know it isn't. It's getting 'em!

"Of course, no woman on earth is so difficult to live with as an actress—or any independent woman. Men have developed almost an entirely new approach to cope with them. Personally, I think the old one is still the best: the one who assumes man is the head of the household and woman is a weak, helpless creature who is better off with her neck under the conquering foot. She is, too, a darn sight.

WE are brought up to be self-sufficient and independent—then we have to do an about-face and let a man run us. And believe me, any woman who doesn't is a fool. No woman with any brains at all allows her man to think he is other than complete master of his household.

"When I get uppity, Ham calls me 'Queen Bess.' That fixes that.

"The other night I overheard Ham and his sister, who is visiting us, in a discussion of marriage and divorce. Ham said, 'Marriage is completely up to a woman. She is never a success at it unless she has lots of give-inny.'

"And after you've put in eight years of give-inny with one man, will you please tell me how you can go into a public court-room admitting you were a failure, or he was a failure—then turn around and go to a theatre opening with him that same night?

"But you can never tell. Maybe I'll turn yellow and do the same thing, should I ever be faced with it." Bette thought it over. "But I don't think so."

She pushed down her hat, pulled on her coat, of some nondescript fur, and started home.

"What, no mink?" said I.

"Nope, no mink," said Bette. "My idea of a failure is a woman whose idea of success is a mink coat—even if she has to buy it for herself. My husband can't afford one."

It gave me added pleasure to state that the best young actress in Hollywood does not own a mink coat, but did win the Academy Award.

Which has nothing to do with the story except to give you a further idea of the one actress in Hollywood who does not play run-sheep-run. The only one who has the courage and confidence of her convictions to come right out and say what none of the pseudo-sophisticates have had the intestinal fortitude to say that she is bored with the absurd "We're Still Friends" pretenders, sees through them with disarming clarity and feels terribly sorry for them.

Unmasking Myrna Loy

sings my favorite song, 'Paris in Spring.'"

Noticing the question in my eyes, she laughed.

"No," she answered, "Paris has no special sentimental meaning for me—and I've never been there in the spring. What I saw of Paris was mostly at night, in late summer. And most of it all in one night, when the late Prince Alexis Mdivani escorted me and some friends to every unusual and bizarre night spot in Montparnasse and Montmartre. They were all places I'd never heard of. He raced us about till dawn, which we watched from the hill of the Sacre Coeur—in that ill-fated, specially-built car that was later to carry him to his death.

Speaking of sensational surprises—I've never had as many as I had that one purple-patched night, except perhaps, at my first bullfight!" This from our little stay-at-home Loy!

IS it a surprise to you, gentle reader, that Myrna goes in for bullfights? So much so that anything which reminds her of them sends her into an ecstasy. The day I lunched with her in her very perky dressing-room (white and chartreuse and blue it is, with brief offsetting tones of magenta in the flowers and in the colored prints on the walls), she was having one of those mild ecstasies over a new bonnet. It was an audacious bit of cerise velvet, like a round bun, with an impetuous orchid velvet pompom on each side—a matador's hat.

"I like it most," she said, surveying herself in the full-length mirror, "because it reminds me of my first bullfight.

"It was in a little hill town near San Sebastian, Spain—and I was very squeamish. I'd read Hemingway and convinced myself that to be a smart cosmopolite, one had to see at least one bullfight. So, armed with ammonia tablets and aspirin, I trailed after the kind friends who were going to give me the thrill of a lifetime.

"They did. And that's what's convinced me that I must be something of a sensationalist—although all those stories I'd read about myself in fan magazines had nearly hypnotized me into believing that I must be a very subdued and shrinking violet. Just interested in my work and my porcelain, my pewter, my books and my music. A quiet home girl!" The brows over those green eyes, with their Oriental slant, lifted ever so slightly.

At that moment our lunch arrived. While she ate a healthy portion of chicken a la king, peas, rye bread toast and coffee, Myrna continued to extol the skin-prickling virtues of the greatest of all sports—a bullfight.

"The spectators must have thought me mentally unbalanced. At each gesture of the matador, each furl of the cloak a little closer to the bull, I let out a blood-curdling shriek and reached for my bottle of ammonia tablets."

"Were there any horses?" I asked tremulously, beginning to feel a little chartreuse around the gills.

"There were," she said, "pitiful, scrawny things. It was when the bull charged at them that I couldn't bear to look. But I discovered something I'd never known before. Critics of bullfights are unjust when they say that the use of horses is meaningless cruelty. The horses are necessary because only a man on horseback, a picador, can strike at the bull in his vital spot, the neck. It's these thrusts with the small pic (or spear) of the picador which weakens the neck of the bull."

"And if he misses?" I gulped a glass of water quickly.

The sensationalist across the table smiled brightly.

"I'll admit it's a gory subject to discuss at lunch but if you've ever seen a real bullfight, you'd understand when I say that it's the most dangerous and romantic of all sports. Even though I nearly passed out of the picture when the first bull charged.

"And those bullfighters!" Her eyes had a distant look. "They're far more glamorous than film stars. When they move it's like a dance. Truly marvelous! I missed my opportunity to meet the current hero, and now I'm sorry I did."

"So the lady has gone back on the romantic prizefighter!" I teased.

SHE laughed a very Loy-ish laugh. "If you're referring to that picture 'The Prizefighter and the Lady' in which I played with Max Baer, I shall have to disillusion you. That particular fascination, attributed to famous prizefighters, has never made me want to do foolish or reckless things. Perhaps, because during the filming of my picture with the great Maxie, he adopted me as a big sister. I was his confidante. He came to me with the tales of all his heartaches and heart throbs. I suppose being a big sister takes the romantic edge off things."

She mused. "Maxie's really an unsophisticated baby at heart. When he drops that armor of cocksureness and naïve boasting, he's as unprotected against life as a . . . as a . . . " she searched for the right word, ". . . as a white rabbit!"

"Max once told me that he hated to fight because he was so mortally afraid of dealing a knockout blow and killing a man. When he was a little boy, he said he used to run away when another boy tried to start a fight with him. They called him a coward, and he let it go at that rather than use his fists. Because he was afraid of his own strength. When he hit, he knew he'd hit so hard that he didn't dare face the consequences.

"And to think that he had to give up so easily in that fight with Joe Louis! I wanted to shut off the radio when the report started coming over the air. It made my heart ache for him. Yes, I suspect that Maxie does need a 'big sister' or mother to lean on when things begin to get tough!"

To those of you who have been picturing Myrna as cool, remote and not overburdened with sentimental feeling, this last remark of hers might come as something of a surprise. Myrna has a heart after all—and a good-sized one!

Speaking of surprises, one of Myrna's greatest was to discover that she had English fans. Rather violent, too, in their demonstration of affection. As it happened, her first taste of the Old World was in an unbelievable, centuries-old, miniature house, "Thyme Cottage," in Sussex—she was the guest of Sir Guy Bolton. Here she fondly believed she was living incognito, even though her first day brought forth an invitation to tea with an unknown Earl and his Lady who lived in the ancestral castle on the hill, an invitation delivered by the traditional footman in knee breeches. But surely no one among the hundred smocked villagers in that strange little hamlet with its thatched roofs and its doorways, so low that you had to stoop almost double to enter the house, would recognize a screen star!

Then one fine summer morning a battalion of reporters and an army of fans descended like a swarm of hungry locusts on the idyllic peace of the Sussex Downs. They nearly tore down the tiny cottage to get at "Miss Loy."

"I always had thought that English people were very reserved; never showed any demonstration of emotion about anything," said Myrna. "Then to have them following me everywhere on those funny bicycles, hanging on to the sides of my car in the thickest traffic (they actually followed me back to London)! I was terrified every moment that they would be knocked off and killed! It seemed so strange—this adulation of theirs—because no one ever recognizes me in America."

Which is true. This girl with the sleek figure, the slant green eyes and her expression of aristocratic almost-disdain manages to get about unmolested by her ardent American fans and without benefit of dark glasses. Also, she manages her private life about as cleverly and discreetly as any ordinary citizen. Which is one reason why she's perpetually amused by the opinions people harbor about her.

The following story is a typical example. Not so long ago Myrna attended a Hollywood cocktail party, and was somewhat confused and disturbed to find two strange men hovering near her, wherever she moved in her host's drawing-room.

"I wondered whether I was being shadowed, and for what reason," she said, relating the incident. "I noticed that they observed me very closely, especially every time the cocktails were passed. Naturally, I grew more nervous every moment.

"Suddenly, one of the men addressed me in a tone of deep disappointment: 'What a frost you've turned out to be, Miss Loy! Why, everybody's been telling us that you were really like the "Thin Man's" wife! But the "Thin Man's" wife knew how to drink. We've been watching you all afternoon now, and you've had only two cocktails. Why you're just an amateur!'"

How that Myrna Loy goes around fooling people.

Picnics Are Fun!

Salad for you, if you would like to have it.)

"No picnic worthy of the name would be complete without hard-boiled eggs, either," continued petite Miss Parker. "But I've always thought plain hard-cooked eggs a bit dull, especially if you forget to bring the salt! And the usual halved and stuffed eggs are so hard to pack, don't you think?"

"Indeed I do," I replied. "I can remember, when I was a kid, wrapping countless dozens of stuffed eggs in waxed paper but I can't recall a single one ever getting to our destination in its original condition!"

"I think I have a grand solution for this," Jean assured me brightly and then went on to outline her idea while I copied down her suggestions with speed and pleasure. You'll find a careful and easy-to-follow description of her method as well as her filling for making Savory Stuffed Eggs in this month's recipe leaflet. And you can get one of these leaflets, of course, just by sending in for it. It's as free as the air you'll breathe on your very next excursion to the country.

There are two other recipes in the Jean Parker leaflet that you will also want to have. These give you directions for making Special Pound Cake and Pack-Well Cookies. No picnic is complete without at least one sweet, you know, and Jean thinks this particular cake and these chewy, butterscotch-flavored cooky-squares are ideal for such occasions.

"I heartily disapprove of fancy pastries or sticky, runny frostings for picnics, they just don't stand heat or packing," she declared emphatically. "But you really should have something with you to satisfy the old sweet-tooth that we all possess, especially on picnics! Fruits and crackers are a big help in that direction, but the picnic hostess who supplies a real home-made sweet is going to find that her catering reputation has risen to the skies!"

Well, gals, here's your chance to prove the truth of Jean Parker's statement by planning to have the same foods she suggests on your very next picnic. Just send in the coupon (pasting it on a penny postal will do the trick), and I promise you some swell recipes by return mail! Even if you are not the picnic type . . . if you hate the great outdoors . . . loathe the woods . . . detest the sand and echo the thoughts about the ocean expressed in Fred Astaire's song, "The Atlantic isn't romantic and the Pacific isn't terrific," nevertheless here's your chance to learn about some easy summer dishes. Why not get some fun out of eating (even if it is hot!) by trying out something new? Why not add novelty to the dinner hour by serving your meal "picnic style"—with a paper cloth, paper napkins, paper plates and even paper cups and forks?

An especially nice feature about the Hostess Recipes this month is that all the foods can be prepared well in advance. Your Jean Parker supper would include Ham Loaf with Combination Potato Salad and Savory Stuffed Eggs, followed by Special Pound Cake or Pack-Well Cookies, or both! Add a beverage, make plain or fancy sandwiches, and I guarantee that such a meal would be a picnic wherever it was eaten!

And now there's just room enough left to give you honest-to-goodness outdoor folks some picnic pointers and packing suggestions of my own.

There seems to be a growing interest in having a hot food on a day's outing of late. This has been brought about, no doubt, by the many state camping sites with their facilities for camp cooking. Thus, having once discovered how good a sizzling piece of bacon or charcoal-broiled steak tastes on such occasions, many people now tote along a frying pan and even one of the new camp stoves which are sold in chain stores for less-than-you-would-think. When it comes to supplies for actual cooking, here is where you will find that canned goods provide the most easily transported treats. The list of possibilities would include cooking oil (which does not scorch as easily over an open fire), corned beef hash, canned fish chowders, canned soups, spaghetti, baked beans and chili concarne, to name only a few. Even the baby can go on a picnic these days and be assured of a balanced, digestible meal because you can take along cans of specially prepared strained vegetables and fruits. With milk (which will require very careful, sanitary handling) and a box of zwiebach, baby can make quite a day of it, too, without upsetting his little tummy with unaccustomed foods.

Here are a few suggestions that will surely help in transporting your meal to your destination in fine condition and in eating it with a certain degree of comfort. First check your supplies carefully. Be sure you have the prepared mustard, lump sugar and container of salt and pepper combined. (Easy on the pepper, however, some people don't like it!) Have plenty of paper plates, cups, napkins, forks and spoons. Don't make the mistake of planning on only one of each for each person. It won't begin to be enough! Be sure you have a can opener and an anchor bottle opener. Be equally certain that you have a good, sharp knife. Take along at least one long-handled fork if you are doing any camp cooking. The old "forked stick" idea may be rustic but it isn't nearly as practical. Take along fruits that have a protecting outer skin, such as oranges and bananas. They peel easily and don't require washing.

ADD vegetable parchment to your picnic packing equipment. By using this splendid insoluble paper you can take along a whole head of lettuce or a really moist, mixed salad with plenty of dressing on it, with no fear of having it leak all over the rest of the things. It's splendid for wrapping butter and also makes for a lot lighter picnic basket if you use it for pickles and olives instead of leaving them in their original glass containers. Take along an extra sheet of parchment paper to use as a tablecloth, too. Then when you are through with it as a cloth you can moisten it and use it to wipe off cutlery, bottles and even sticky hands! Ideal also for wrapping wet bathing suits. So you see parchment paper is a picnic "must."

There just doesn't seem to be the space, here, to go into the fascinating subject of sandwiches except to suggest that you look at the picture at the beginning of this article because it illustrates the three types of sandwiches which you should know about. The first is the hearty type of sandwich which does not have the crust removed and which goes in for meats and other sturdy fillings between generously thick slices of bread. The second is the thinner, daintier sandwich which is more likely to appeal to the womenfolk on the picnic. (The children will think it's "sissy"!) It is advisable to make these with bread that you slice yourself instead of buying the ready sliced loaves. The third type of sandwich is the fancy variety which deserves the attention only of stay-at-home picnickers. Admittedly, "pinwheels," "cornucopias," "loaf" and "ribbon" sandwiches make an appetizing display, but don't try to pack them.

With these suggestions and Jean Parker's recipes you ought to be able to go in for "bigger and better picnics" this summer. And remember, picnics or no picnics, you'll enjoy the Combination Potato Salad, Savory Stuffed Eggs, Picnic Ham Loaf, Special Pound Cake and Pack-Well Cookies that the following coupon will bring you, post haste, and absolutely free!

Alas, She's the Type!

said that Anita didn't actually say, "Oh, gosh!" What she did say wasn't very bad, but right along in the spirit of her studio, we're gonna keep on making her out to be a little golden princess. You know, it sort of gets to be a habit.

"I know the theatre. Lots about it. You see, I've worked for fourteen years—ever since I've been five," remarked little Miss L., "which has been a heck of a long time. I played in the Broadway production of 'Peter Ibbetson' as my first theatrical venture, with John Barrymore taking the title role. He must have been magnificent in it, but I was scared as the devil of his booming voice. You see, I was Mimsey-as-a-child and I can imagine Mr. Barrymore could have done very well without Mimsey-as-a-child. Perhaps he wasn't wrong either, although to be fair, the critics favorably mentioned itsy-bitsy Mimsey."

Miss Louise evidently regards some of her childhood performances with slight dismay. You see, she's long on candor and short on praise of herself. She rated almost any role for which she tried out in those very youthful days of her career, for she had the face of an angel and a disposition to go with it. Even as a young student at the Professional Children's School near Broadway, Anita was always at the head of the class in lessons and deportment, which was a bit discouraging to young Tom Brown who sat a couple of seats behind her and was never able to "catch up."

Later in life Mr. Brown attempted to catch up sentimentally, but Miss Louise still proved to be as elusive as were her excellent marks in the not so long ago, which has this same Tom pretty disconsolate at this writing. In fact the story goes, that one reason Anita's mother took her to Europe recently was to get her away from quite another pursuing male, who was said to be "not the type for an ingenue," nor for that matter, sophisticate either. However, if Anita was blue about the prospective long separation, she didn't show it. And she didn't shy at the marriage questions either.

I WANT to be married," she said quite frankly. "Of course, I'm not on the lookout especially, but if someone comes along who is right; well, I wouldn't hesitate a moment. He's merely got to be honest and square and ambitious. That's not asking much, is it? No big star, no banker, no anyone who is 'in the money.' That stuff doesn't make you happy.

"Mother and I just have a little house, a little car and a little dog named Wee Thistle, who, by the way, can play Juliet.

"Yep, we say, Thistle you're an actress.

And Thistle runs up the stairs, pokes her head through the bannister, sticks her paws out and barks very softly. That's the balcony scene, in case you're slow at grasping things. But, to get back to men, I can be happy on very little worldly goods for I've often had to do it. I don't have much fear of the future.

"As a matter of fact, I have only one fear," continued Anita, "and that is when anyone puts his hands on my neck. When I was a kid, I got caught in a revolving door and if I hadn't been wearing a thick, muskrat collar, I'd have been strangled. Even today, I can't put a dress on over my head. Always have to step into it and pull it up.

"So you can imagine poor Claude Rains' chagrin when he pretended to choke me during a scene in 'Anthony Adverse' and I let out a war whoop that could be heard all over the studio, and then fell trembling into a real St. Vitus Dance routine. Gosh, the poor man almost died. But, after the shakes left, I explained, and I hope he feels that there is a limit to 'realism in art' now."

Anita is not superstitious, but she admits she owns a good luck charm. It is a hat ornament made from the tuft of a gemser.

"And," she added hastily, "in case you don't know what a gemser is, it's a member of the reindeer family—say third or fourth cousin or sumpin'—living in the Alps. I wore the ornament on a hat when I landed a job I didn't expect to get, and since then I have a very special feeling for it.

INCIDENTALLY, I don't worry about getting the roles I set my heart on as much as I used to. I guess I've turned philosopher or something. Wasn't it a smart man who once said, in very flowery language, of course, 'Be careful what you want, you'll get it'? Well, that happened to me twice. I had bent every effort, pulled every string, to land two parts—at different times, of course. Well, I got them. And when the pictures were released, the coveted roles just didn't mean a thing.

"I believe that you should work like mad for what you want and speak up for it—not in the prissy, school-girl manner in which I used to—and then if you don't get it, forget it. It just wasn't to be. No, I'm not trying to be a fatalist—merely to be sensible."

And that's the keynote to the Louise character. Good sense. She's a trouper, too. Having been acting for fourteen years, she's "professional," as Ina Claire would say. In other words, she can take it on the chin—the disappointment and hard knocks, of which her profession boasts more than any other career in the world. For, all that glitters is not glamor. It is apt to be just a big Cooper Hewitt light, which makes a painted backdrop look like real English countryside to the gentleman who has just paid his quarter at the box office to see it.

Anita Louise isn't complaining, for she knows her chance for what Merton of the Movies called "bigger and better things" will eventually come. She's convinced, however, that somebody will suddenly have to drop out of a cast in order to permit opportunity to knock at her door, for she doesn't think that the studio will ever allow anyone who looks like she does, act like she wants to.

9 out of 10 girls should make this "Armhole Odor" Test

Tonight, when you take off your dress, smell the fabric at the armhole—that is the way you smell to others!

THE most scrupulous care cannot protect you, charming as you are, from the daily unpleasantness of perspiration odor if you deodorize only. You can test it quite easily for yourself tonight. When you take off your dress, simply smell the fabric under the arm.

If you have been deodorizing only, the chances are 9 out of 10 that you'll discover a musty, stale "armhole odor" in your dress. That odor is what other people notice when you are near them!

It is easy to explain. Unless you keep your underarm dry, as well as sweet, it is inevitable that some perspiration will collect and dry on the armhole of your dress.

This need happen only once, yet every time you put that dress on, the warmth of your body will bring out the odor of stale perspiration. Fastidiously fresh though you are, that unpleasant "armhole odor" gives the impression of unforgivable carelessness!

Protect yourself this SURE way

Women who seriously value their charm willingly spend the few extra moments required to use Liquid Odorono, because it is sure. With Odorono, your underarm is not only odorless, but absolutely dry. Your dresses will never collect those little drops of moisture which can undo all the other measures you take for flawless loveliness.

Doctors say Odorono is entirely safe. With Odorono, the usual underarm perspiration is merely diverted, and comes out on less confined areas of the body, where it can evaporate freely.

Saves your expensive gowns

Odorono ends forever those shocking perspiration stains which can fade and ruin a lovely frock or coat lining, in just one wearing. And of course, there is no grease to make your clothes messy.

You can get Odorono in two strengths—Regular and Instant. You need use Regular Odorono (Ruby colored) only twice a week. Instant Odorono (Colorless) is for especially sensitive skin or quick emergency use—to be used daily or every other day. At all toilet-goods counters.

Let Odorono keep your underarm dry, your clothes as sweet and fresh as you are—and you will be truly exquisite. Send today for samples of two Odoronos and leaflet on complete underarm dryness offered below.

It is hard to believe that FEMININE HYGIENE can be so dainty, easy and GREASELESS

BUT IT IS TRUE ● Zonitors, snowy-white antiseptic, greaseless, are not only easier to use than ordinary preparations but are completely removable with water. For that reason alone thousands of women now prefer them to messy, greasy suppositories. Soothing—harmless to tissue. Entirely ready for use, requiring no mixing or clumsy apparatus. Odorless—and ideal for deodorizing. You'll find them superior for this purpose, too!

● More and more women are ending the nuisance of greasy suppositories, thanks to the exclusive new greaseless Zonitors for modern feminine hygiene.

There is positively nothing else like Zonitors for daintiness, easy application and easy removal, yet they maintain the long, effective antiseptic contact physicians recommend.

Zonitors make use of the world famous Zonite antiseptic principle favored in medical circles because of its antiseptic power and freedom from "burn" danger to delicate tissues.

some other very good active sports fashions for you which represent different phases of the sports picture as worn by your Hollywood favorites. These are illustrated on pages 56 to 58. Look at them closely, for they are the sort of sports clothes you will want to wear and will be able to find in your own shops—variations of these, of course.

STILL on the tennis theme, there's Claire Trevor's version of the popular tennis shorts costume. Hers is red and white polka dotted cotton, made very much like a child's play suit and in one piece. The blouse has a white yoke extending down each brief sleeve like a stripe. Tucks just below the bust give a high-waisted suggestion and a round monogram is a smart detail. The shorts are box pleated to give plenty of room for active play. White and red buckskin for her shoes and white socks.

Anita Louise gives you a less strenuous view of the shorts and shirt situation! In fact, she's the picture of summer ease, posed in her garden with a soda clutched in one hand. Her shorts are without fullness and are made of pale blue sharkskin—a gaily printed linen blouse forms the topper.

Madge Evans likes slacks or pajamas. She wears a very simple, man-tailored pair of slacks in a waffle weave knit and a trim white shirt. This particular slacks costume, Madge told me, is made by the same well-known firm that turns out her swim suits. They come in all sorts of colors.

Maureen O'Sullivan likes her beach clothes to look both feminine and colorful. That's why she likes a beach dress best of all—and you can't blame her when the effect of the one she is pictured wearing is so swell. Starched navy blue organdy, specially processed to be waterproof, is made with a voluminous skirt. A bright red zipper with a sea horse for its ornament is matched in color by a wide patent leather belt. There's nothing but a brim and braided band to the daffy red straw beach hat, giving the sun a good whack at Maureen's dark pate. That hobo bandana bag is a trick all of you can copy with any good bandana 'kerchief you have handy. All you do is to knot the top and sling it over your arm or a walking stick with all your beach gadgets packed inside. Under Maureen's dress is a skin-tight, one-piece navy satin suit. And red and white linen with blue kid for the beach shoes. Slick beach ensemble, isn't it?

You, who like a bathing outfit that combines both the practical with the decorative, must look at June Lang's attractive printed tie silk affair. It is made in three pieces, yellow with a bright red figure. The top is a very modest "bra" with halter neck—jersey lined matching shorts combine with this for active swimming. But for sunning, the trick beach skirt, which wraps around and ties, makes it a complete ensemble. This skirt is often worn as a cape, too, and is perfect for anyone who doesn't care to tan.

June also is one of the many Hollywood culotte fans. These new divided skirt costumes are running the shorts and slacks a close race for general sports popularity. Since cycling has become such a rage all over the country, the culotte has taken a big spurt in smart acceptance and is being shown in the stores in all fabrics, from cottons to the thin jersey which makes this navy blue one of June's. Culottes are seen both in one-piece and two-piece versions. June's is two-piece with the top a simple polo shirt. The sash and scarf of white wool embroidered in navy dots gives a nice accent. Be sure to notice her sandals, which are made of white ribbed pique with navy lacings and cork soles.

Bette Davis wears a smart bathing costume in "The Golden Arrow." The suit looks like a short dress and is made of a smart dark background print. The neckline is deep and square. Over this goes a print wrap lined in white toweling. For a cap Betty ties a bandana of the matching print over a rubber diving cap.

HOWEVER, you, who take your swimming and diving seriously, will not trifle with the dressmaker style of suits. You will want a workman-like knitted suit designed for strenuous water activities. The nationally advertised swim suits are just what you want and they offer you an amazing variety of unusual styles, weaves and colors. I have selected several this month that are the pet styles of some of Hollywood's best swimmers.

Rosalind Keith's trim suit on page 58 is a perfect Jekyl and Hyde arrangement. It can be worn with the square neck and laced-up "bra" bodice, as photographed, or the bodice may be unlaced to give a deep V neckline. Still another dodge is to unfasten the contrasting crocheted straps at back and make a halter neck effect. Tricky, what? The concealed brassiere construction is simply slick, because it gives you the perfect sort of figure control without any extra garments beneath. This suit has a smart, closely woven texture and comes in stunning colors.

A clever version of the "bra" and shorts type of suit is the novelty knit worn by a young Hollywood extra. The brassiere top has an extension at front which fastens to the tightly fitted short pants. A halter strap is made of contrasting cord held by star buttons and the shorts are belted with the same cord. This is a grand style for the girl with a slender, youthful figure.

For the girl or woman who needs a slightly less figure revealing style, Betty Furness' suit is the answer. It has a brief skirt over the under trunks, but gives the appearance of a one-piece. The gay check design is very new and the straps tying in bows above the brassiere bodice are nice details. All these suits have the deep sun-tan back design. Notice Betty's bathing shoes—they're a fishnet and cork combination with Ghillie lacings.

Carol Hughes wears a good looking and snug fitting dusty pink and brown suit. Like Betty, she likes a short skirt style and the uplift brassiere top is given a slight accent with tucks. The square neckline is stressed smartly by the color contrast of the straps and lacing. You'll notice that her beach shoes are the same as Betty's—these are great favorites with all the stars.

All these suits are featured in your shops and stores all over the country and in many more designs besides. Knitted suits have achieved the tops in excellent design this season, because they not only give you the newest styles and textures but they are made to set each type of figure off to the best advantage.

When I come across a perfectly swell gadget that simplifies dressing, I have to pass it on to you. My latest discovery is a pair of metal shoulder strap holders. Why some smart person didn't think of them long ago is more than I can fathom, because they eliminate all that tedious business of sewing fabric straps into every garment you buy.

These holders, of a fine metal, sew into the shoulder seams of your costume and have a cleverly designed loop with a little opening through which you pass your lingerie straps. They look very much like the eye half of a hook and the loop is the width of an average lingerie strap. They're entirely rust-proof, so that you can leave them attached to all your washable summer dresses when they go to the laundry. These tricky gadgets come in nickel, gold or black finish and can be bought in two sizes.

And now for a treat; if you will fill in the coupon below, I will send you a pair of these new metal shoulder strap holders as a gift. Once you have a pair you will go out to your local shop or store and buy them by the dozen.

Those Good Luck Pals

taking a flat together with two other fellows from the old crowd, Josh Logan—now a stage director—and Myron McCormick. Hank was the one who found the flat, a block off Central Park on 63rd Street and surprisingly cheap. Later they discovered why . . .

"When we moved in," Jim explained, "two of us weren't working and the other two averaged about a nickel a day. So we ate home a lot. Hank did the cooking, he's good at it. Mexican rice and meat balls was the famous dish—not much money and it fills you up. I couldn't coax an egg to fry, so it was up to me to do the dishes. Once we gave a 'dinner party.' (We were in the money that night. Had twenty dollars between us.) About thirty ex-Falmouth players gathered around, and Hank and I went and bought out the Five-and-Ten. Afterwards we didn't know what to do with all the dirty plates. Towards the end of our stay, the cooking department dwindled down to a big bowl of milk toast every night. It was easy to make and easy to wash the bowl . . ."

THERE was another big celebration the night both Jim and Hank got parts in "All Good Americans." It was Hank's first featured role on Broadway after eight years of plugging. Jim himself was more or less atmospheric in the part of a banjo player, and with his salary he made a down payment on an accordion. "That," he says in that laconic drawl of his which would keep an undertaker chuckling, "is the kind of banjo player I was."

In the midst of the celebration that night, the accordion going full blast, there was a pounding on the door. "The landlord!" said Hank. But it wasn't. It was a pasty-faced individual with a red smear on his shirt sleeve. He had, he told them, fallen and cut himself. Did they have any iodine? They did. But he refused to let them help fix the arm. Instead he took the bottle and disappeared. Even at that they didn't tumble.

It wasn't until they had lived in the flat seven months that they learned they were in the center of the most notorious gang in New York.

One morning they read that a front-page gunman had been killed on their doorstep an hour before they got home the night before. "Gosh," said Hank, "we'll have to get home earlier!" The boys went into a huddle. It was time, they decided, to move out to the summer stock companies for their health.

In the fall things happened. Not bullets, but billings. Jim opened with Judith Anderson in "Divided by Three" and two weeks later Hank blazed spectacularly across Broadway in "The Farmer Takes a Wife." To occupy their own time between shows they bought the most involved airplane model they could find, with retractable landing gear, machine guns, everything. Often they stayed up until dawn working on the drat' thing, then they had to step around the pieces to get to bed. It was almost complete when Hank signed a contract to appear opposite Janet Gaynor in the screen version of "The Farmer Takes a Wife" and left for Hollywood.

That was in February. By May M-G-M had annexed Jimmy Stewart. Hank let out a howl of glee and wired, "Don't forget to bring the airplane with you, mug."

Tenderly Jimmy carted the thing (wing spread, three feet) to his family abode in Pennsylvania. He stayed there long enough to make a traveling box for it in the shape of a T and painted it black. Passengers on the west-bound train took one look at it and edged sharply away. Tsk, tsk, these gangsters were getting bolder every day!

In the station at Pasadena Jimmy pushed the box into Hank's arms. "You carry it for a while," he suggested. An hour later they were trying the plane out in the front yard of a majestic Hollywood apartment building. It swooped. It curved. Before they could count four it crashed in a hundred pieces.

"So much for the law of gravity," said Hank gravely and he went in to unpack Jim's ties. He'd been missing that blue one!

As a matter of fact, they're both born aviators. They have that sense of balance and quick timing so essential to cloud hurdling. Hank had already started flying lessons over at the Glendale airport and Jim followed suit. The sky's the limit with a pair like that.

"It was pretty fine, having Hank out here first so he could show me the Hollywood ropes," Jim tells you. "He's done more for me than any other person on earth."

And Fonda says simply, "I wouldn't be able to live out here except for him."

JIM is his balance wheel, a steadying influence in the slightly cock-eyed world of Hollywood. Somehow they've managed to form a humorously sane little circle that's quite apart from the jamboree side of the movies. It's made up mostly of former University Players and the old Falmouth crowd. Almost any Sunday you can discover them at the "ranch" the boys have rented. It's a Holmby Hills estate done in Mexican style with a rambling adobe house, tennis and badminton courts, pingpong tables, twelve cats, two dogs and a monkey cage filled with eight finches. The cats were there when they came—seven had just been born in a flower pot. The two dogs, "Boy," a Scotty, and "Son," a police dog, were the reasons they moved to the "ranch." Son, abetted by Boy, had ruined all the furniture in the apartment. "It was either a case of buying the apartment or moving," observes Jim, "so we moved."

Cassie's dinners are really what keeps them home nights. On Thursday, her day off, Hank gets a waffle supper. "Not," explains young Mr. Stewart, "that I can give him much credit for that. His sister sent him a waffle iron that does everything but speak and he uses a prepared batter!" Sometimes they go to the roller-skating rink afterwards, but more often they go to a movie. They're ardent movie fans. Hank has a 16 mm. color camera and he's writing and directing a picture in which Jim plays all the parts. First you see him as a Mexican bandit, then as the kind-hearted peon; you see his reactions to himself being shot by himself while shaving. Jim Stewart is probably the only man who ever played sixteen parts in a movie and got away with it! But then, Hank calls him a "natural" as an actor.

From the start Fonda has swept on from one success to another. "Way Down East," "I Dream Too Much," "The Trail of the Lonesome Pine." It seemed kind of snorty that as good an actor as Jim should go on playing minor roles. Then Hank saw a chance to do something about it.

IN the Vendome one day, while he was lunching with his manager, Leland Hayward, he saw a slim, very attractive girl come in. The girl who had once been his wife, whom he had worshipped in the way only men of the Fonda type can. Jim had been his mainstay during the stagnant weeks following the announcement of their divorce three years previously. Well, here was where he could do something for Jim. He sauntered over to her table. "Hello, Sullavan." Margaret Sullavan looked up, smiled. "Hello, Hank! Too bad that contract of yours couldn't be rearranged so we could play together in this next picture. The studio's looking all over for someone."

"That's what I wanted to see you about," said Hank. And he "sold" Jim for the role that made him famous in "Next Time We Love."

Afterwards Hank did play opposite Sullavan, as he calls her, in "The Moon's Our Home." Now they're saying the romance is on again. Margaret is divorced from her second husband, William Wyler, and it isn't an unusual sight to see her at the "ranch" playing tennis and staying on for waffles. Hank seems happier now than at any time since he's been in pictures.

"Changed? Yes, of course he's changed since he came here," Jim Stewart drawled slowly. "He's more mature. Has more responsibility, yet he's more relaxed. He was sort of a kid when he arrived. You wouldn't call him that now. He's grown, but not in the Hollywood way. Hank is just as natural as ever!"

And over at the Walter Wanger studio where we cornered Hank, he grinned widely. "People have to be pretty normal to get along together as long as Jim and I have. Maybe we keep each other kind of down-to-earth."

Maybe they do. . . .

From Gangster to Model Citizen

in Connecticut and they write her the most peculiar letters marked 'personal' and 'private' about me. They ask her if I am as tough in real life as I am on the screen. Am I brutal with her and all that sort of thing."

"And are you?" I wanted to know.

Chester waxed eloquent.

"I'm so far lacking in brutality, if you must know the truth, I would side-step if I saw a cockroach skidding under my feet."

I had to concede that this was the quintessence of kindness. "I've often wondered how I happened to play gangster and crook roles in the first place," he went on, "for it's the farthest thing from my real self. I haven't the slightest streak of adventure in my make-up. Sometimes, I think I should have been a bank clerk or something quite secure. I never take chances on anything, whether it be financial, physical or moral. I never gamble on the stock market, so I never lose. Never go in for hazardous adventures or hobbies, so I don't get hurt. I don't get high blood pressure every time a beautiful girl comes along, so Sue and I manage to be happy together. No. It is the safe and sane that appeals to me."

"Do you mean you have never in your life gone through a 'Diamond Dick' outlaw-worshipping stage? Never imagined yourself chasing a flock of Indians or sinking a river-boat full of pirates?"

The thing was incredible, but Chester shook his head at my question.

NEVER in my life. As long as I'm telling the truth, I'll go all the way and confess that I don't care for anything that is the least bit hazardous. I don't like to play polo because you can never depend on what a horse is going to do. I don't care for aviation because planes are just as uncertain as horses. I am not crazy about the sea. I don't like to hunt. Name any kind of dangerous or hazardous sport and you can say I'm against it."

"It doesn't make sense," I murmured. "If you don't like anything resembling danger, you must have been on the spot pretending to be tough, then. What was the hardest thing you had to do in gangster pictures?"

"I'll tell you," he leaned forward and partially closed his eyes in approved "menace" style. "It was learning how to fire a gun without closing my eyes. I hate the sound of gun-fire and every time one of the darned things went off in my hands, I just naturally jumped and shut both eyes. I finally mastered the trick, but it was a real job."

I told myself that there must be a reason for his phobia. And then, without trying, I found it.

When he was about fourteen years old, his chum Fred Martin was given a shotgun for a birthday present and the two boys went on several enjoyable outings together. Then, quite suddenly, tragedy struck them. Even now, Chester doesn't quite understand how. They were rowing up a little stream in a canoe together with the gun in the bottom of the boat. Suddenly, there was a report, sharp but not very loud, and water began filling the canoe.

"Oh, I've shot through the boat," Fred exclaimed. Then bewildered, "No. I've shot myself!" And he had. In moving his foot, he had discharged the gun and a bullet had struck a nerve in his foot, paralyzing it.

Chester succeeded in getting him out on the bank and went for help to a nearby farmhouse. It was hours before they finally reached home and had the wound dressed properly. The accident occurred during "dog days" and although the injury was not very deep, blood-poisoning resulted. The boy's leg was amputated in an effort to save his life, but the operation was not successful. He died a few days later and, from that day, Chester has had a natural horror of firearms.

After he told me, haltingly, about the accident, I could understand. Then, he told me about his experience with horses and planes.

"I started to learn horseback riding three years ago," he reminisced. "Bob Montgomery gave me a polo pony when he sold his string of ponies. I enjoyed my morning rides after that for several weeks. Then, one morning, I was riding along the Beverly Hills bridle path when a noisy ice-cream wagon came along. The kind that are found only in California. It gave a loud ring-a-ling and the horse must have thought it was the chukker. Anyway, it did absolutely everything except what I wanted it to do. Finally, it landed me up on some strange millionaire's doorstep, after tearing chunks out of the lawn, for which I, of course, agreed to pay. At last, I climbed back on and gave him his head and told him to go any place he wished to go, or do what he wanted to do. After he got polo out of his mind, he ambled back home with me, and I decided I would never go horseback riding again.

"Last summer, when we were making 'Three Godfathers,' I had a lot of riding to do in the picture and I made up my mind I would do it myself, because I don't like the idea of using a double for things like that. After a few early morning rides across the desert, I found I was beginning to enjoy it. In no time, I learned how to ride properly, and I found there was a lot of difference between horses and polo ponies. I'm not an expert horseman, by any means, but I have learned how to ride pretty good.

"Bob Montgomery used to get a kick out of my aversion to horses. He says he feels like he is missing something now, when he sees me riding comfortably along. To tell the truth, while I'm not exactly afraid of horses any more, if I never rode again it wouldn't hurt me too much."

CHESTER told me then about his plane phobia.

"I went up in a plane, one sunny afternoon," he told me, "and I enjoyed every minute of my first flight. I felt as if a new world were opening before me. I told Sue all about my pleasant reactions when I got home and insisted that she would love to fly, too. I arranged to take the family out to the airport for a short flight the following Sunday afternoon. We were given a capable and experienced pilot and we spent an enjoyable hour in the air. All of us were properly thrilled. However, when we landed, something went wrong. The plane all but tipped over. The pilot was white-faced when he helped us out and said:

"'I can't understand. This has never happened before.'

"I understood plainly one thing. That was, that I had no right to jeopardize my family or the rights of my family for any experience, however pleasant. I have the sense of restriction that any normal family man has. I love my wife and I adore my youngsters and I do not intend to do anything that will hurt them in any way. So I have sworn off flying or allowing my family to fly."

I pondered this. I remembered when I had gone up in a plane ride with George Brent. I hadn't wanted to, either, but since George had been kind enough to ask me, I went. I told Chester about it, and that I had expected to be frightened out of my wits and although I really enjoyed the flight, I was so weak and sick that I almost fainted when we got up a mile high.

"That was a dumb thing to do," Chester assured me when I told him about it. "Why on earth did you go up in the first place, when you were sick?"

"Because I wanted to merit George's good opinion," I explained. "I was afraid if I told him I was sick, he would think I was afraid to go up."

With the freedom of friendship, Chester scolded me then.

"Now, that's what I call plain cowardice. You were afraid George might think you were afraid, so you took a chance on becoming unconscious and perhaps jeopardizing both your life and George's. I would have told him the truth. For heaven's sake, don't ever be afraid to do what you think is right."

Suddenly, a real truth dawned upon me, and I saw what he meant. A man can be the bravest sort of fellow and never lift a finger in physical combat.

Chester Morris has the highest type of courage. He will stand or fall for what he thinks is right. He risked a fall several years ago, when the man who held his contract gave him his choice of making a series of bad pictures for a nice sum of money "or else." Chester told him quietly that, as far as he was concerned, it would be "or else." And so, because he had the right to do so and wanted to break Chester's will, the fellow kept him off the screen for over a year. For other people that would have been the end of the world, but Chester's fans remained loyal to him.

Actors like to work with Chester because he is good luck for them. It is becoming one of Hollywood's best legends. I don't think it is entirely a matter of luck, but rather that he likes to help beginners get a good start.

He helped Robert Taylor, at his own expense, in "Society Doctor," because he liked Robert and believed he had personality and ability and needed only a chance to prove it. When he accepted the story, the studio offered to cut the dialogue and scenes in which Robert appeared, but Chester would not hear of it. I doubt if Robert himself has heard of the generous gesture, for Chester has a way of minimizing the kind things he does for others.

His own luck in pictures has not been the best in the world, for he has been handed any number of poor roles. However, regardless of the story, he always manages to turn in a good performance. He liked his role in "Three Godfathers" and he is excited about his new T-man picture, "Counterfeit."

"I'm glad producers have quit casting me in gangster roles," he told me in parting. "Crime has never appealed to me. It always has seemed such a dumb thing for anybody to be at odds with organized society. Nobody can get away with it for long. I hope I'll get some more roles like this one."

He probably will, for directors have a way of remembering good performances and casting actors in similar roles. I hope he does, anyway. I like Chester as an upholder of the law and a model citizen for a change.

He's Married Again

because while the cinema starlets were making publicity stills she was creating Beverly Hills hats, chapeaux that Lilyan Tashman would like to have worn.

No sooner had the newspaper photographers snapped him sprinting down the gangplank and the customs inspectors okayed his declaration, which included four new suits and dozens of Bond Street shirts, than he was rushing off to put his signature on the little paper that says you mean matrimonial business and in case California is your legal address, it's sort of hard on the husband financially if it doesn't work out right.

The newly merged Edmund Lowes were feted so fast and furiously in the environs of Park and Fifth Avenues that Eddie got no chance at all to see his bride, until he conceived the brilliant idea of a Detroit stopover en route to Los Angeles. In the meantime, while he was still in the throes of that sensation, "I have to buy the bride a present on four wheels" and super-salesmen of the leading motor car companies were parked in front of his hotel door, we had orange juice and a pear salad.

I said to him, "Eddie, you told me not so terribly long ago that you'd never marry again. What changed your mind?"

Mr. Lowe replied, "Love."

I continued the probing with a question that would have puzzled anybody, except George Bernard Shaw.

EDDIE, what is love?" and that's where the rapid-fire question and answer business began. Mr. Lowe, in the process of our spilling phrases and sentences, got to repeating Greek suffixes he had learned in his Jesuit college, which isn't so far afield as you would imagine. Because it would appear that as long back as the parsing of his first Latin verb, Edmund Lowe, the actor-that-was-to-be, learned self-reliance, found out just what he wanted from life and was grooming himself in the "accept no unsatisfactory substitutes" manner.

Lilyan Tashman and her marriage with him represented the fullest years in his professional and social life. While he was rising to stardom she set a background standard for him—a social calendar that was perfectly satisfactory and yet made no unfair demands on his working schedule. It wasn't always completely peaceful and yet it was more important than any phlegmatic tranquility would be now.

That's why he fell in love with Rita Kaufman and the younger beauties lost out. The new bride represented the kind of life which had become a habit. Subconsciously, he was seeking the marital partner who would continue the Tashman type of existence and, to his way of thinking, Rita Kaufman would fit into his well-ordered scheme in a manner that would cause no disruption in those domestic and social habits that the years had made.

Eventually, Mr. Lowe got around to telling me that love, after your adolescence, is still important to a successful marriage. But, also, that when you've grown up, mentally and professionally, learned what life is about in the hardest way, you adopt a certain philosophy that extends to the marital relationship. Rita Kaufman represented those things he had learned to want out of a well-filled life of varying cycles.

The most beautiful compliment that Edmund Lowe could have paid a person like Miss Kaufman was to ask her to step into the role that had been held for such a long run by Lilyan Tashman.

When Edmund Lowe first married Miss Tashman, he was in the formative stage of his screen career. She set him so steadfastly on the path that marked the final goal of all his earthly endeavors, it was inconceivable to him that he could take another permanent partner who wouldn't see the same "finish," who wouldn't recognize all the road signs and traffic lights en route.

While we thrashed out all this, Mr. Lowe, in a uniquely confiding mood, told me what was really at the back of his mind when he started telephoning Rita from London.

HE said, "Love of course is absolutely essential to any happy marriage. But love, at my age, is predicted on a number of things—companionship, mutual interests, a certain integrity about recognizing each other's personal rights."

I broke in, "Eddie, I think it's swell; you've found what you sought. So many people thought you would fall for one of those terribly young things in Hollywood, because certainly within this past year the line to your heart formed on the right, and in double column."

He answered, "Don't be silly. The world is filled with youthful beauty, and it's a grand asset when you have it, but it's not enough. A man my age meets somebody young and lovely and the appeal is purely physical. You get your fill of that, but you know it won't last. Then along comes somebody like Rita. She's attractive, adult, a grand companion and she's loyal. We have so may interests in common. What more can you ask?"

But I wasn't finished yet. Before Mr. Lowe went to England there had been reports that he and Rita Kaufman were that way about each other. She was out in Hollywood on a purely business mission but mingled with the stars. She was smart, sophisticated and a success after her own fashion. She was a lot like Lilyan Tashman. But compared to some of the budding, blue-linen-shorts brigade of the Hollywood junior school, she was a counterpart of the Tashman tradition.

I said, a little hesitantly to Mr. Lowe while he was nibbling on his last lettuce leaf, "In a way, your bride is quite a tribute to Lilyan. Clothes are important to her, a career after its fashion seems important to her, but from what I gathered you're the one.

And Eddie said, "You're right. I didn't realize it," which is a diplomatic answer in any language.

Then with my inquisitive mind I had to ask him, "Did you intend to marry her when you left for London?"

QUICK as a flash he said "no." Then going on, "Of course, I had seen a lot of her on the Coast. She was lovely, well-groomed and a good companion. I enjoyed being with her. But I didn't know it was really love until there was an ocean between us. It's funny a separation like that will either finish things so when you meet the other person later you say hello quite casually and wonder what it ever was that attracted you in the first place. Or else you endure the first few days far away in tranquillity, you meet other people and you wonder what's wrong with you. The realization may come to you in the middle of a walk down a side street, or it wakes you before dawn, or you're talking to a lot of beautiful women and suddenly you ask yourself, Why aren't they like her? You can't wait to get back because you know there's something to share besides glamor and spotlights and parties. She becomes the person you'd like to talk to when things go wrong with your work or you're tired, and you know she'd understand. That's what Rita seemed like to me, when I decided she was the one."

Thereupon it was my turn and I managed a weak interruption, "Aren't you lucky she felt the same way?"

Eddie mumbled, "Heavens, the bride will be sore. I'm half an hour late and you can't keep a bride waiting that long."

So Edmund Lowe rushed off to choose a town car for the bride, and this summer they're living in the beach house that Lilyan Tashman decorated for the last year of her Hollywood triumph. It's all red and white—real crimson and sparkling, pristine white. Mr. Lowe sold the house on Runyon Drive which he and Lilyan had occupied for so long as a town residence, but he kept the silver, and linens and statues he had bought her and now he's purchased a piece of property in Brentwood where he will build the residence Mrs. Lowe wants to have, and somehow it seems as if Lilyan Tashman would be satisfied by the choice her husband made this time.

I'm Doing This for the Kiddies

be fun—you'll make it fun, if you're smart. Do this for example:

Stand erect. Feet about a foot apart. Toes slightly turned in. Raise arms high above the head. Stretch for all you're worth. Stiffen the knees. Now bend the body forward and down. Don't let those knees bend! Keep going forward and down until you are touching the floor between your heels with the backs of your hands. Raise the body to the first position and repeat, at least twenty times. Neither of you may be able to go down as far at first as you should, but keep trying. Make your child do the exercise properly and praise her when she does. Don't be afraid to stretch and pull. It will make your own middle flat and firm and keep your child from having a fat tummy later.

And you can also do this: Stand your child facing the wall. Tell her to get up on her tip-toes (shoes off) and reach as high up the wall with the palms of her hands as she can. Be sure she's standing as close to the wall as possible. Now tell her to stretch, stretch—as if she were trying to reach something too high for her. You hold her wrists, keeping her in position. The trick is for her to try to put her heels down on the floor by stretching her body down—the back, hips and legs feeling the pull—without moving the position of the hands. It can't quite be done at first, perhaps, but the point is to stretch the muscles and make them flexible. Ten times a day. Good for growth and helps make the body supple and graceful. Incidentally, get your hubby or boy friend to do the same thing for you. You'll be surprised how it will flatten out those ugly bumps in practically no time at all.

How many times have I told you to dance—for slimness and pep and a figure that will prevent "papa" from getting that absent-minded look in his eyes? Dance with your child—or your children. The more the merrier. Get papa up out of that comfortable chair, too, it'll do him good. Make it a quiet evening at home for the whole family! A good snappy foxtrot is all you need. You and the kids kick off your shoes and do a one-and-two, hop, one-and-two, hop, around the room. I hope that after all my devil-raising these last months your own figure is lovely and that you can do this dancing business with grace and spring and not look like a—well, use your own judgment. If you can't, it's about time you got busy. Remember, baby, that children adore a mother who is young looking and as they grow older it makes them so happy when ma is slim and chic. If you'd like to have my routine of exercises for posture and body balance, let me know.

Generally speaking, the food I prescribe for you is good for the kids, too. Generally speaking, also, it's milk and fresh vegetables and fresh fruit and fruit juices, lean meats—broiled, not fried—broiled fish and chicken, simple desserts, like custards and puddings made with plenty of milk and eggs and once in a while home-made cake—that's the food for growing youngsters. Beware of pastries, heavy starches, high seasonings—children don't care for the last as a rule, so that's okay. Ice-cream once in a while. Candy in great moderation and preferably after meals, when it will serve its purpose as a pleasant topping-off and not fill up an empty tum to the exclusion of important foods. I think it's a swell idea to tell your children that their allowances are for the movies and special things they've set their hearts on, rather than for candy and ice-cream. Let those two delicacies be occasional additions to the family diet. In that way, they'll be taken more as a matter of course and their allure will vanish.

Here are some hints for school lunches, which are extremely important, and which do get a woman down at times. You can pack them the night before if you'll wrap each thing in waxed paper. Make sandwiches of whole wheat bread, buttered thinly. Fillings can be made of lean roast beef or lamb or sliced chicken. Cream cheese with a little jelly is very tasty. Plain lettuce sandwich—lots of lettuce should go into the young diet, anyway. Chopped celery and watercress, mixed with a little pimento cheese instead of butter. Pack a dessert for the children rather than letting them buy their desserts—you know darn well they'll make a beeline for the sodas and gooey candy. You can pack baked apples, cup custards and rice pudding in molds or waxed cardboard containers. You can also give them raw apples, cherries, oranges—any kind of fresh fruit and, of course, let them eat as much as they want of fruit at all times. You can give them plain sponge cake, angel food cake, two or three graham crackers or plain cookies. Milk, if they cannot purchase it at school, can be carried in a cardboard container or small thermos bottle. At recess in the morning, growing children should have a glass of milk. At afternoon recess, orange juice.

NOW I've met up with many little girls lately who don't want to eat. Loss of appetite seems to be a current disease in young women from, say, the baby stage up. Mostly with city children. Sometimes it's because they're nibbling candy and all kinds of truck between meals and sometimes it isn't. They just don't seem to have an appetite for anything. And mothers worry and fret and struggle, trying to "force the food down." Well, my darlings, the shrewd opinion among many good doctors is that this starts way back when the baby catches onto the idea of getting more attention by playing with its food. And mama coaxes and pleads and it's, "Come, come, angel, eat your cereal!" and "Isn't this spinach delicious, d-e-a-r!" What to do? At the first evidence of a child toying with its food, take it away. Do it in a matter of fact manner. Say nothing. Don't persist after a reasonable attempt. Don't scold. And the next mealtime, give the child it's regular portion of food again. If the playful nonsense recommences, take the food away once more. Your child isn't going to starve if it skips a couple of meals. The chances are that young Miss Persnicketty, after one or two eatless meals, will be plenty hungry and there will be no foolishness.

You must, of course, use common sense about it. You'll be able to tell if it's plain cussedness or if something really is the matter with your child.

The other great diet problem with young children is that they want to eat the wrong things. And I know a lot of you grown up darlings who do the same thing—which is worse, because you ought to know better. If your child has been brought up from babyhood under the supervision of a doctor, I'm pretty certain that you won't have this worry on your hands. But if your problem is already up around your eyes, that doesn't help you much, does it? Explain if you can the rewards of eating the right things. Eat properly yourself (or you'll hear from me about it!) and set a good example. Tell your child that a poor complexion, poor teeth, fat whosises and all the rest of it come from eating too many sweets and dolled up dishes. With a young child, that may not work. She may sulk and say, "I don't care—I want candy!" as the little so-and-sos are apt to do. Perhaps a small bribe or present will do the trick, though it's better if you don't have to appeal to the gold-digging instincts. With an older girl, tell her that some movie star she admires eats properly and has to take regular exercise to keep her face and figure lovely. And that's the gospel truth, or Miss Movie Star will find herself with a forty-room bungalow and no contract.

For that matter, look at the cute Hollywood youngsters. Shirley Temple may have been born with a natural gift for dancing, but plenty of care and proper bringing up have made her the healthy little thing that she is. Those legs are sturdy, as well as clever with the tap steps. Lots of milk, which contains calcium, which builds good bones, has been consumed by Miss Temple. Incidentally, there seems to be a craze for taking tap lessons among the younger generation. By all means, let them take tap lessons, if you have to go without something to pay for same. Swell exercise. Good fun. And maybe there's talent in your family—who knows? Talent in the family pays almost as well as oil in the backyard.

The satiny Temple skin and the sparkling Temple eyes owe a vote of thanks to the generous quantities of proper food, as outlined above by your not-so-humble servant. Those Hollywood youngsters are brought up right. There's Jane Withers, who is so much more attractive than she looks in pictures. A nice, intelligent young girl, trained for a theatrical career from earliest childhood. And if you think that the phrase "trained for a theatrical career" means only fencing, French and folderols, you're crazy. It means plenty of sleep—eight hours, anyway—and when a late "engagement" keeps little sweetie up till all hours, she stays in bed the next morning. There's Virginia Weidler, Sybil Jason, Edith Fellows, Cora Sue Collins—all healthy as well as cute and clever.

IF you feel tempted to sit down in a 1936 model gloom and mutter, "All very well to talk about Temple, Withers and the rest. If my little Joey were dragging down $1500 a week, I might be able to be a model mother and have a model child." Well, darlings, believe me, it isn't the hand-embroidered French dresses, the expensive toys and all the other money-bought delights that make Shirley, Jane, Sybil and Cora Sue the fine young women they are. It's sunshine, fresh air, good food, sleep and proper exercise.

There's lots more to be said, but much of it I'll have to leave unsaid because I have no more time now, nor have I the whole magazine, though I do believe I could fill it. However, you know you can always write me your problems and ask questions. But just so you won't think I'm stingy this month, I'll jot down some quick notes for you.

Bad skin during the trying 'teens: A certain broken-out condition is inevitable during the adjustment age. Don't neglect it, but don't let your child get into too much of a twitch about it, and that goes for you, too. And for goodness sake, don't let little Mary Jane pop her pimples or squeeze blackheads or hickeys. Too many women still carry the scars of that pernicious habit. Don't let your child feel a sense of inferiority about any physical defect. Praise her good points and fight the bad ones with tact and understanding. Keep her well regulated internally and see that she keeps her skin immaculately clean. Whether you use mild soap and luke warm water or a good cleansing cream, be sure it's the best. She's worth it! And how would you like to have a swell diet for the complexion? I have a honey! It'll do wonders for you. Just send a stamped, self-addressed envelope with your request and I'll send it to you.

Unmanageable, stringy hair: Also a manifestation which crops out during the "in between age." Teach your child to shampoo her own hair, at home. Some good oil should be applied first, massaged into the scalp and left on for an hour or so, then a good shampoo, followed by a half dozen rinsings. No mechanical driers —hair should dry naturally. You can frisk it with your hands or a rough turkish towel. If the hair is hopelessly straight and won't take a finger or comb wave, I'm not against a slight permanent. Preferably, just the ends, leaving the top straight. If it is glossy and clean, straight hair is just as nice as curly hair.

Finger nail biting: Let your child, no matter how young, have a manicure. Do a very young child's nails yourself and teach an older girl to do her nails herself. Let the older child have a little polish, just like mama, but colorless or natural, please. The pride your child will take in good-looking finger nails will do more to stop the unpleasant habit of biting her nails than all the scoldings in the world.

FALSE modesty: This nonsense crops up in little girls almost invariably. They won't so much as take off a dress with mama in the room. It's the bunk and you must nip it in the bud. Be matter of fact about it. It's good for everyone to be a nudist in the home, once in a while (of course if your figure is lovely, it's a big help), and furthermore, false modesty may build up serious psychological troubles if not squelched at the beginning. Don't make a fuss about it, but get the idea out of your child's head quickly.

The make-up problem: When to let your daughter begin to use a little make-up is largely a matter of individual decision. Maybe she'll take the decision right out of your hands. Anyway, I hate, on the one hand, to see young girls all daubed up, but on the other hand, I see no reason why a high-school girl shouldn't be allowed a little powder and the merest touch of rouge, if she's unnaturally pale.

You mothers can and must be an inspiring example to your growing daughters. I insist on it! How's that for you? I want you all to take inventory of yourselves right now. Send the coupon below for your copy of my Special Consultation Chart (it's free, you know, when accompanied by a self-addressed stamped envelope), and find out where you need remodeling. Taking It Big or else! Swanky decorations. People fighting to get in. Everybody talking about Lombard's Mayfair even if Norma Shearer, the old meanie, did show up in a flaming red dress.

Came the opening of the Bamboo Room at the Hollywood Brown Derby. And Carole entertaining this time, smartly, elegantly, only our best people plus a sprinkling of Vanderbilts and Whitneys here for the races.

Now, the small, trim, smart Hollywood Boulevard house where Carole has lived these past few years, is no longer big enough for her. Carole has gone and gotten herself—like the rest of the movie belles—a big house out toward the ocean, where she can do more entertaining. I think the signs are unmistakable—Carole has gone social in a big way, and amusing as it is to watch, it's kinda too bad to see her, of all people, roped into this mad, whirling maelstrom of Hollywood society that goes nowhere and gets nowhere but just rips the stuffing out of the pocketbook.

JOAN Crawford has gone Intellectual with a capital I. Yessum. She's the young woman, I beg your pardon, she is the elegant Mrs. Tone who was recently hostess with her husband at a quietly sumptuous tea for the musical celebrity of America, Leopold Stokowski. She not only entertained for Mr. S., but she sold her Hollywood pals, many of whom wouldn't know a piccolo from a bassoon, on the idea of plunking out five-fifty per seat, because it was the thing to hear the maestro of Philadelphia and his boys thunder through Bach and Wagner!

Now don't mistake me. I think taking it big in an intellectual way is a fine and interesting new phase in Joan Crawford's career, and the more movie people she can get to hear good music, the more power to her. Sure, she'll get a lot out of her association with such an artistic soul as Stokowski, but I still think it is a little amusing when you remember it was the hotcha, hey-hey girl who almost wore out the polished floor of the Cocoanut Grove annexing dance cups, who is turning into this sophisticated patroness of the arts.

Of course, Joan hasn't succeeded in shooting quite as much culture into the veins of her friends as she has absorbed herself. I think it was Sally Blane at a merry cocktail party at the Stu Erwins' on the Sunday afternoon of Joan's tea for the famed Stokowski, who gathered herself together finally and said, "We must go. We promised Joan to go to her party today. It's for some musician—I never heard of him before. Somebody named Stokalin or something."

There's the taking it big case of Ginger Rogers, who has always loved her plumes and her sequins and her feathers and her ruffles on her dresses, who pretty nearly always has managed, when she dressed herself up, to achieve one good jarring note that would send a fashion editor into hysteria!

Ginger, since they up and paired her with the debonair, well-groomed Fred Astaire, the male fashion plate of the screen, is taking herself big as a clothes horse. Yes, our Ginger. Some of the best and most far-echoing battles of her studio during the past year have been staged when Ginger and Bernie Newman, who after all is paid to dress the stars correctly, go into conference over her clothes. Ginger tries to tell Bernie what she should wear. And she's a pretty determined, stubborn little redhead when she makes up her mind. A couple of times Bernie has capitulated to Ginger's ideas and my, my, the sequins and the trains she has gotten away with!

Recently, she came back from New York with a couple of dozen boxes full of frocks, hats, etc., which she had picked out herself for her pictures. She gave specific orders that no one, particularly Mr. Newman, was to see them. Well, pushing his way around the wardrobe on the hunt for some old pieces of fur, Bernie came across these boxes and before the wardrobe woman could say Jack Robinson or "Don't," he had 'em open.

The next time Ginger came into Bernie's office, he greeted her with, "Where did you get those hats?" A fatal remark to any woman at any time, and the battle was on! Oh, well, it goes on all the time and I suppose will until Ginger recovers from thinking of herself as a Best Dressed Woman.

I TELL you the taking it big virus gets 'em all. There's the case of Ann Harding, generally considered an intelligent, poised woman with a swell sense of humor.

On the final day of her contract with her studio, Ann had a date in the gallery at one o'clock to shoot "still" pictures. Three hours later, at four o'clock, she arrived with her secretary and Walter Abel, her leading man, with whom she was to pose. They all had been having luncheon at Lucy's. Well, they went to work. The cameras clicked and Ann started to talk about what she thought of producers and picture studios in general. The more Ann talked the madder she got and the more emphatic her tongue became in lashing out at the production methods in Hollywood and how she had been simply ruined by stupidity. Ruined?

Now I ask you, where would Miss Harding be today if it were not for these same astute, shrewd producers? Why, she'd probably be back working in little theatre productions or mebbe she'd be married to some nice army captain and living on his pay. At any rate, she wouldn't own a beautiful home in the Hollywood Hills and she wouldn't be traipsing off to England.

Of course, one of my favorite stories about a male actor taking himself seriously is the one I heard on Georgie Raft—Georgie of the slick hair and patent leather shoes, who is making more money in Hollywood by pushing his nose in front of a camera than he ever could anywhere else.

He'd been having a lot of trouble with the studio over his parts, because he was distressed about them. You remember on one occasion he poked a supervisor in the nose, and he just plain walked out of the Carole Lombard picture.

A writer went to him and said, "Now, what is this all about, George? Why are you so upset all the time? What's the real trouble? Don't you like the parts they give you?"

Raft looked pensive and stared into space. "Well," he said, "you see it's this way. I've always wanted to wear a uniform in a picture and they won't let me!"

SPEAKING of our male heart throbs who are not immune from the taking it big germ, there's Fred Astaire, who simply goes into spasms any time any one suggests writing anything about him for the public prints. Now all stars live in a gold fish bowl—they can't help it—it is a part of the price they pay for being famous on the screen. The more famous they get the more details people want to know about 'em.

Mr. Astaire is a charming, conventional man with nothing in his private life that couldn't be submitted to close scrutiny, but he not only has a fixation against seeing writers, but once he even tried to stop the presses of a magazine printing a life story about him.

We've got a lot of other well developed cases in the town. There's Margaret Sullavan with her exhibitionistic complex, and Jean Arthur who goes temperamental on occasion, and Hepburn who takes herself seriously as a recluse!

Margaret's case is pretty nearly chronic. She can't be cured of snooting photographers and playing the temperamental little girl. They did cure her of making faces at the still cameraman and spoiling her sittings at the studio. After a half dozen expensive sittings had been ruined because Margaret didn't want to play that day, they developed and printed some of those pouty faces and "tongue stuck out" poses, and, what is more, released them to the magazines and newspapers. Margaret was pretty mad when she saw them, but what could she do? The studio had beaten her at her own game.

Nothing much can be done about Hepburn, either. The answer to her freakish ways and taking herself big as a recluse is that she is an old space-grabber. She figures she gets more publicity by acting eccentric than any other way.

I don't know whether this anecdote about Robert Montgomery proves he takes himself big as a wit or whether it just shows he's still an adolescent, but here it is. You judge for yourself. Bob wanted a telephone to match the license number on his trick automobile. He asked the telephone company and was informed the number was already assigned to another party. This didn't stop Mr. Montgomery. He proceeded to harass and annoy the owners of this particular number with such tricks as calling up in the middle of the night and saying, "Is this the Fire Department?" or 'phoning early in the morning, 6:30 a.m. or so, as he left for the studio, and asking for Susie or Bill or Jack or Sam. The poor telephone subscriber who was the object of this campaign finally broke down and demanded his 'phone be changed. Whereupon Bob got the coveted numerals.

Oh, I was going to tell you about Jean Arthur. Well, it seems that Jean got so mad at her director, Eddie Sutherland, that she tore her dress right up the back and threw it on the floor. She put on such a tantrum that the hairdresser shouted at her to be careful of her wig, whereupon Jeannie took the wig off and smashed it onto the floor. However, I guess you'd just call that acting up.

Things like this are going on right now in our dear Hollywood. Good, lusty exhibitions of temperament and showing off and taking it big. Mebbe those fine old days when Pola Negri as the Foreign Queen of Hollywood threw dinner parties on black velvet tablecloths with a purple orchid beside each gold plate are gone—mebbe they are, but the taking it big germ is still in Hollywood's blood. And there's an epidemic right now. Grandma, where's that sulphur and molasses?

HAPPY RELIEF FROM PAINFUL BACKACHE
Caused by Tired Kidneys

Many of those gnawing, nagging, painful backaches people blame on colds or strains are often caused by tired kidneys — and may be relieved when treated in the right way.

The kidneys are one of Nature's chief ways of taking acids and wastes out of the blood. A healthy person should pass about 3 pints a day and so get rid of more than 3 pounds of waste matter.

If the 15 miles of kidney tubes and filters don't work well, this waste stays in the body and may become poisonous. It may start nagging backaches, leg pains, loss of pep and energy, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes, headaches and dizziness. Don't let it lay you up.

Ask your druggist for Doan's Pills — used successfully by millions for over 40 years. They give happy relief and will help to flush out the 15 miles of kidney tubes. Get Doan's Pills.

marvelously in love—only a slow crack-up of dreams. The bond of affection that's meant so terribly much is, unaccountably, another painful memory. Tender words have been as fruitless as yesterday's glowing notices.

Now Isabel is catching on in Hollywood once more. But she doesn't dare rejoice yet. She can't forget how she's been somehow stopped before.

"I've been on the brink of amounting to something in pictures so often," she says, "that I'm afraid to talk about tomorrow. I've prayed, over and over, that this'll be the time I can hold on!"

She's so frequently undergone this waiting for a genuine welcome that you can discern an undercurrent of desperation in the tone of her voice. For the ambitious, age is always a bugaboo; for an actress it is a special hobgoblin. Now that Isabel has reached her mid-twenties, she glimpses thirty on the horizon. She feels that if she hasn't made a go of Hollywood by then, it'll be too late.

She isn't the kind who is sorry for herself. Her greeting is as gay as ever. I see her at the popular cafes and parties, attempting to be the jolly self she inherently is.

But this constant bucking up against an incomprehensible destiny has left a mark on her inner self. Her ninety-eight pounds seem to have had to move ninety-eight thousand pounds for every inning. She will never lower her colors, appear anything but chipper. But I can tell you, confidentially, that she's bewildered, dazed by the succession of hurts that have been heaped upon her.

WE sat in the crowded Vendome not long ago. Isabel had on a smart navy blue suit, and wore a perky straw hat that must have convinced the tourists present that she was on the crest of the wave. I guess the fox furs did give a finishing touch. The strangers were awed at Fame, close up.

I wish they had been listening to the game spirit behind that "front."

"I wanted foxes for years!" Isabel vowed to me. "But I never could afford them. Then I earned some unexpected money and I resolved to do a nice deed for Daddy and also to buy these!"

A year ago, after her splendid contribution to "A Tale of Two Cities," Isabel believed she was licked in California. She left, and only a peculiar circumstance brought her back.

Yet in the beginning there were nothing but promising omens. She has no brothers or sisters, so her parents lavished their devotion upon her. Her father was the son of wealthy people in the East and had had every educational advantage. He'd studied medicine at an excellent university and established records with his brilliant research. Her mother's heritage was that of Southern gentility. And in the small town of Shoshoni, Wyoming, where the couple settled, the Jewells were highly respected.

"I had all the benefits one could have," she affirms. "Loving guidance, comforts—ponies as a child, a car when I was old enough." She was sent to an Episcopal school in Minnesota, and graduated at fifteen, president of the senior class. Wellesley was next on her program, but she had an ill spell and it was decided the winters in Kentucky would be milder. She entered a college for women there.

In the middle of her sophomore year, when she was seventeen, Isabel's desire for the stage overwhelmed her.

"I was tired of getting A's in Latin," she grins, remembering. "I'd had a hunch that I should adore acting. A collegiate try-out induced me to jump from amateur to professional shows. I'd been vaguely discontented and I realized why. So I ran away to Chicago and a stock company!"

"My parents assisted me financially and morally. The background they'd provided me with was such a help in the theatre. When I was fifteen I'd read all the 'musts' on anyone's literature list. I was mentally acquainted with every sort of individual before I met him or her in reality."

Being definitely advanced and fortified for the vagaries of the world didn't, however, save Isabel from the series of disappointments that went hand in hand with the steps upward. Three seasons in stock and she tackled Broadway. When she bade goodbye to the Mid-West she swore to be thoroughly independent henceforth. It's what you accomplish on your own that counts, in her estimation of values.

There was such a lean streak, after she landed in New York, that her major debut was precisely in the nick o' time. She substituted for an understudy who wasn't quite up to carrying off the feminine lead in "Up Pops the Devil." Isabel had an hour's rehearsal and went on to render so capable a portrayal that she was retained instead of the regular star. If that isn't making the most of a break, what is?

She got to Hollywood in the spring of 1932. "Blessed Event" was transferred to films and she was brought along from the original cast to duplicate a supporting, but important emotional role. The way she vitalized it drew raves. But Isabel didn't draw any offers for eleven months!

THE between-engagements blues she'd experienced in New York were mild compared to what she's had to face in Hollywood. Eventually she did wangle another exceptional dramatic picture assignment, and was duly praised. When nothing resulted she campaigned for a comedy part at the local El Capitan Theatre. "Counsellor-At-Law" was subsequently screened and Isabel was again drafted to copy her stage characterization. But now she was classified as a wisecracker in the studios' listing.

M-G-M appreciated her ability and Isabel had her fingers crossed earnestly when she was awarded a contract. Prospects were grand until the Mexican escapade of Lee Tracy's, exaggerated by the newspapers, seemed to kill most of the budding enthusiasm for promoting her to stardom. She was in love with Lee, and she loyally stuck to him when he was in trouble. Then in the ensuing year her romance with him went on the rocks. So did her career.

Meanwhile, blindness had robbed her father of his sight. Isabel had sent for her parents and in their adversity had become their chief prop. She spent all she could scrape together in the endeavor to restore the precious vision. There was a brief flare of hope—only that.

Many a fan assumes that once you have a name you're set. Isabel's case is evidence that a reputation literally can be of no consequence. Everyone agreed she was worthy of particular consideration. Still nobody in Hollywood offered her any.

Heartsick, personally and professionally, she did the only thing she could. She hung on, because she'd heard they were producing "A Tale of Two Cities." She asked for a test as the little seamstress whose gallantry highlighted the tragedy at the guillotine. They laughed and dismissed her as not the type.

"For three and a half months I kept pestering for attention. They tested a number of actresses and I suppose they ultimately tried me to shut me up!" Isabel wasn't conscious of the fashionable, curious circle around us. The babble of the restaurant went unheeded. "I got the role on the provision that I stand by ninety days after I was through, for possible retakes. Well, when I was done with my bit I was ready to quit Hollywood. That was just last summer, mind you. I had $400 and another week's salary due. I planned for the folks to return to Shoshoni, where they could live more inexpensively in our home there. I took the train for New York to forget this business and get back on the stage.

"In three weeks I lined up several plays. But I learned I couldn't accept any of them on account of perhaps having to return to Metro for added shots. No one would schedule opening with me when I might have to fly here." So Isabel was stymied still again.

"But if I hadn't had to come West for re-takes I wouldn't have been on tap when 'Ceiling Zero' was being cast. And the release of these two movies is what pushed me into the swim all over again!"

SHE approached "Lost Horizon" with humble thanks. "This is the first time I've had a tip-top part out here to begin with. I've always had to make a dozen or so lines blossom into a fairly decent-sized role before."

I'd been wanting to put a question to Isabel, and this was the moment. "Do you imagine you'd have been happier if you'd never become an actress?"

"I couldn't have been anything else," she answered simply, unhesitatingly. "I don't know why. But if I couldn't act I'd hardly care to live!"

Naturally it is this burning zest for her vocation that has caused her to excel at it. It's a thrilling calling to her and she relishes the demands it makes on her intelligence. "If I'm a hundred I'll not have learned all the fine points," she states ecstatically.

"Until today I've never had a sense of anything but uncertainty about my future in Hollywood. Now—well, I fear even breathing what my hunch is!" She knocked on the table. And it was wood. A sparkle supplanted the mute sadness I'd detected in her blue eyes when we'd sat down.

What if she has been terrifically in love on three different occasions, and has suffered the pangs only one who's loved in vain can understand? There's not much consolation in the adage that while there's life there's hope. But there is a generous measure of solace in work that's pleasant. You can attempt to be so busy that you'll not feel so alone.

As we emerged into the sunshine of Sunset Boulevard the admiring throng that waits for movie celebrities rushed en masse to demand Isabel Jewell's autograph. I managed to whisper in her ear, "I've a hunch you're through building up to awful let-downs!" She wrote with her right hand and crossed the fingers of her left. She glanced up abruptly and smiled.

1 Rich, red blood necessary to carry proper nourishment to build up every part of the body, is especially promoted by the easily absorbed iron in this new discovery.

2 A healthy digestion which gets ALL the good out of the food you eat, requires an adequate supply of Vitamin B. This new discovery supplies this precious element.

3 Normal, regular elimination to remove poisonous waste and thereby promote health and growth, requires adequate Vitamin B. This is the third important purpose.

SCIENCE PROVES IT'S UNNECESSARY FOR THOUSANDS TO BE SKINNY

Posed by professional models

Gains of 10 to 25 pounds in a few weeks, reported

DON'T think you're "born" to be skinny and friendless. Thousands of men and women with this new, easy treatment have gained pounds of solid, normally attractive flesh — in just a few weeks!

Not only has this new 3-way discovery quickly brought normally good-looking pounds, but also naturally clear skin, freedom from miserable indigestion and constipation, new pep and popularity.

Scientists recently discovered that thousands of people are thin and rundown for the single reason that they do not get enough digestion-strengthening Vitamin B and blood-enriching iron in their daily food. Now the richest known source of body-building Vitamin B is cultured ale yeast. By a new process the finest imported cultured ale yeast is now concentrated 7 times, making it 7 times more powerful. Then it is combined with 3 kinds of iron in pleasant little tablets known as Ironized Yeast tablets.

If you, too, need these vital elements to build you up, get these new triple-acting Ironized Yeast tablets from your druggist today. Then day after day as you take them, watch flat chest develop and skinny limbs round to natural attractiveness. Constipation and indigestion from the same cause vanish, skin clears to normal beauty — you're an entirely new person.

Money-back guarantee

No matter how skinny and rundown you may be, try these new Ironized Yeast tablets just a short time, and note the marvelous change. See if they don't build you up in just a few weeks, as they have thousands of others. If not delighted with the results of the very first package, your money back instantly.

Special FREE offer!

To start you building up your health right away, we make this absolutely FREE offer. Purchase a package of Ironized Yeast tablets at once, cut out seal on box and mail it to us with a clipping of this paragraph. We will send you a fascinating new book on health, "New Facts About Your Body." Remember, results with the very first package — or your money refunded. Sold by all good druggists. British Importation shook hands. "I sometimes don't know how she sticks it. It must be love—that's all. Will you have a sherry, cocktail, highball?"

I took a sherry and so did Madeleine. "Tell them I like wine, but, of course, not to excess. I don't want anyone to get the idea my back hair falls loose, my eyes grow fishy, and I beat my husband in my cups—although, I really should," she added, looking fondly at him.

"You see there's reason in my madness. I'm not new to Hollywood. My last visit didn't turn out as well as I'd hoped. In 1934, while I was swimming in the cream over in England, I was sent over here of an exchange by Fox with GB."

"Whom were you exchanged for?"

Her eyes grew mischievous as she said with mock self-admiration, "Oh, for Dietrich, Garbo, Crawford, and a few Gables and Powells thrown in."

SHE went on. "The truth is that Hollywood brought me in on a tidal wave of publicity. The press screamed. The heavens shook—and I—I flopped.

"It wasn't anybody's fault. It was just a case of too much publicity and too little story. They tried to make a second "Cavalcade" and there couldn't be two. The "World Moves On," with Franchot Tone, was the picture. This time I'm taking no chances. I'll settle for no publicity and a lot of story."

"I believe she has what she wants," put in the good Captain. "I saw her first picture, 'The Case Against Mrs. Ames,' and, to put it frankly, I thought Madeleine was marvelous in it and 'Chinese Gold' will be another success."

"Now it's my turn to protect you from him," put in Madeleine. "He's prejudiced, so how can one tell?"

The Captain grew a little warm. "Don't believe her. I rarely go to the cinemas. I'm terribly hard to please. Walter Wanger, who imported her, has given her a contract for ten pictures more—thereby fixing it so that I will never see my dear wife again in all probability."

"Astley's affairs are calling him back to London—he's a real estate broker," explained Madeleine. "Never mind, darling, there's always the cable, the long distance telephone. And soon there will be the California-London clipper, and you can come out for week-ends."

The Captain looked glum. "A kiss by cable isn't quite the real thing, is it?"

Madeleine curled her shapely legs beneath her. "I shall begin at the beginning. I was born very dully on a dull day in a dull suburb of Birmingham, England.

"My father was the eldest of a family of ten Irish kids. He hated the farm where he lived and so worked his way up to the Professorship of Philology at Birmingham University.

"When he was twenty-six someone told him it was time to get married. So the dear old thing dashed over to Germany to get a fräulein who would help him with his German. The thought of love never reared its beautiful head. Being unsuccessful in Germany, my father next tried France, where he met a priest who knew a Miss de Rosière—she lived in a chateau without any furniture. Fresh from a convent, my poor mother knew little of the facts of life, beyond the hard fact that her family was too poor to provide her with the necessary dot or dowry. I always wonder what her thoughts were the day she peeped through the keyhole at my father while the marriage arrangements were being made. Much as I love him, I must confess he is no Clark Gable.

"Strangely enough, the marriage turned out very well and out of this non-dream world uniting of the French and the Irish sprang the English rose!"

AND Madeleine sat back demurely, suppressing the fun that was behind her twinkly eyes by looking modestly down at the carpet.

"The rose," went on Madeleine, "at this period was a short, humorless, pipestem leg and arm creature lost in her books. Her father entertained sanguine hopes that she would in due time become a professor like himself. And so she entered Birmingham University, wearing tortoise shell glasses, and ready to take so many degrees as to end up a living thermometer." Suddenly she turned to Captain Astley. "Astley, darling, have I told you about Christopher Mann?

"No? Then prepare yourself. Christopher Mann was my calf love. We went to school together. One day they were casting a play at the University and Christopher advised me to try out for it. He said I ought to be an actress.

"So, carrying a flower, I walked into a bleak room filled with critical faces. It was also a bleak day, and the fantastic poetry I had to recite sounded even bleaker to my nervous ears. To this day I don't know why I was chosen for the lead.

"We played a week at the local Birmingham Repertory Theatre—English college plays are cast from professionals and college amateurs both—and afterward the head of the Repertory offered me a contract. I was willing, but father wasn't. So out I went into the world and became—a school marm.

"I tutored the six children of a second-hand clothing dealer in Birmingham, then when it got me I went down the Sussex coast and taught real school. When I had saved twenty pounds I went to London.

"Meanwhile, Christopher Mann had given up college and entered the London theatre business, solely to devote his life to me.

"I think Christopher must have run up and down Fleet Street (that's London's newspaper row) screaming the name of Madeleine Carroll until everyone thought him a madman. To this day I still meet press men who remember it. Today, Christopher is my personal manager abroad, very successful, and our calf-love has gone the way of all such things.

"In spite of Christopher's efforts, London was not waiting for me with open arms. So I went through the usual hardships—living on thruppence worth of fish and chips a day—that sort of thing that is lots of fun to remember. I finally got a start as a maid in a touring company in a play called 'The Lash.' I had three lines to speak and got fifteen dollars a week for speaking them. And so I lived in all the cheap boarding houses of England for a period, meanwhile modelling hats and wearing out shoe leather when the run ended. I couldn't write home for money, as my name wasn't mentioned at home.

"One day I dropped into a film studio, quite by inspiration, and asked for crowd work. You may well imagine my amazement when I got a screen test, and the leading part in 'The Guns of Loos.' The producer explained that I was the ideal English type. (As you know, I'm only English because I was born there!)

"'The Guns of Loos' put me over—"

"And then," put in the Captain, "my break came, and her hard luck began. She slipped out of sight one day and came up on the shores of Lake Como, married to —me!"

"You see Astley and I had been oversold to each other by a matchmaking witch, prominent in London society. So naturally we avoided each other. Then one day we met, liked each other, decided not to stop doing so, slipped off to Lake Como and did it. We were married with great secrecy, but an old Milanese photographer got a snap of us looking like something the cat had dragged in, and the picture came out in all the papers.

"After I returned to England (after the American experiment)," said Madeleine. "I was very lucky. I had two successful pictures, 'I Was a Spy,' and 'The Thirty-Nine Steps.' But I still wanted to come back to Hollywood.

Hollywood is a woman's Paradise. Not, of course, that I'm giving up England forever, but they'll have to struggle along without me for awhile.

"For after all," went on Madeleine, "in time Hollywood and London studios will be indistinguishable, except for the fog. My chief complaint against England is that they were typing me in too dignified roles—thrusting a queenliness on me that I didn't deserve or desire."

"You weren't too dignified in those 'Thirty-Nine Steps,'" I said.

"Thanks," smiled Madeleine. "It's true I wasn't, but they were trading on my reputation for dignity to get the effect they got. Alfred Hitchcock, one of the greatest directors in the world, in my opinion, knew that I was shy and a bit unhappy about the dignity business so he decided to play a practical joke on me. Do you remember the handcuff scene?

"Well, the first day of the picture, before I ever had met the leading man, Robert Donat, Hitchcock had his brain wave. Although the handcuff scene didn't come until the middle of the picture, he decided to shoot it first. It happened that I had hurried to the studio that morning without breakfast, thinking I would snatch a snack sometime betwen scenes.

"The first thing that Hitchcock did, knowing that Donat and I were perfect strangers, was to handcuff us to each other and pretend to lose the key. By ten o'clock I was a wreck. I wanted to get the handcuffs off, go and freshen up a bit, but I didn't feel like lugging this mere acquaintance along, charming as he was. I appealed to Hitchcock, he sent us to props. Props hadn't the key. The brute never found the key until one o'clock. He admitted later that he wanted to get a lot of discomfort into the scene, and he certainly did."

I rose to go. "But you haven't told me your idiosyncrasies, you know—your favorite color, and whether you rub your salad bowl with garlic."

She answered promptly. "The rainbow contains my favorite colors. Furthermore it may interest your women readers to know that my hair was once mouse-colored but is now ashblond. I like to read religious books. I absorb other people's accents like a chameleon. I like to slip away from London with Astley to live on bark and berries in a little primitive stone house in Sussex. I pursue the single course plan of dieting to keep my weight down to fighting Irish," she rattled on breathlessly. "I am mad about politics. Vionnet makes all of my clothes and I hate to give up my old ones. I play tennis. I don't smoke. I ride in an old sweater, I once delivered a lecture on peace. And now you tell me—do I tick?"

"Miss Carroll," I said, "you tick."

has a breath of scandal touched her.

"I always liked the boys," she laughed with a mischievous twinkle in her eyes. "During those first two years in Hollywood I had several crushes. But they were all on the side. Irving was the only one who really ever counted."

WHEN Norma's first motion picture tests, due to bad lighting, brought out defects in her eyes and the extremely short skirts, then in vogue, revealed the fact that her legs were not straight, the average girl would have given up in despair. Although it took weeks of endless effort, the spirit of Shearer found a way of overcoming the seemingly impossible. As Norma herself said, "I literally made myself over—built an entirely new personality."

With each picture Miss Shearer makes she seems to perform that miracle. For weeks before she started work on "Romeo and Juliet" she was seen about Hollywood with her usually sleek hair curled and grown to shoulder length, such as Juliet wore. Her evening gowns were long and full and flowing. Like a cocoon turning into a butterfly Norma was subtly taking on the characteristics of Juliet.

And that indomitable spirit of Shearer again asserted itself when, for three months previous to the start of the picture, Norma devoted from two to three hours a day working on the intricate 15th century dance which takes place in the exquisite ball room scene where Juliet first meets Romeo.

Dormant muscles that for years had been disciplined to relax so they would soften the slender curves of Norma's piable body and further enhance the romantic parts her roles demanded, had to be brought back into play and put under perfect control.

Said Agnes de Mille, who not only spent months of research work in perfecting this dance sequence, but who also personally supervised Norma's instruction, "It was sheer force of will and determination that enabled Miss Shearer to control unused muscles and master the routine. A truly remarkable feat for an untrained dancer."

And, I might add, almost a superhuman feat for the mother of an infant.

Back at the time of the birth of her son, all Hollywood began asking, "Will Norma settle down to the role of Mrs. Irving Thalberg?" That question was soon answered when, eight months later, Miss Shearer was back at the studio making a picture saying, "A career makes a woman more interesting and inspiring to her husband."

All through her years before the camera the Shearer spirit has never quailed when she felt she was fitted to play a desired role. Her secret rehearsals for "The Trial of Mary Dugan," her first talking picture, in spite of the fact that Mr. Thalberg felt she was not suited to that type of role, is an example. Again when she overcame opposition in making "The Divorcee" and "The Barretts of Wimpole Street," her success proved that she again was right.

Just when Hollywood had decided that a career meant more to the ambitious Miss Shearer than anything else in the world, with action swift and direct she swept all that she had fought for aside, in order to go to Europe with her husband whose health had been undermined by a severe attack of influenza.

Here was another side of Shearer. Her love and devotion for Irving Thalberg meant more than anything else in the world.

When Norma returned to the screen a year later—a long time for any star to absent herself from pictures—she set a precedent by taking up her career where she had left it, with a warm welcome from her admirers.

Some time before "The Barretts of Wimpole Street" was finished Hollywood knew that "the Thalbergs" were expecting a "blessed event." Again at the height of her career Norma had dared to jeopardize it. "Perhaps this time," Hollywood was saying, "Norma will be through with pictures."

"Why not?" was asked. "She has everything. Everything that women the world over yearn for and dream about. Beauty, fame, money, a successful marriage, a social position, a son and a daughter. She has had her cake and eaten it, too. She won't be foolish enough to go back to the long, gruelling hours before the camera. What more can a career offer her?"

BUT it wasn't long before the papers were announcing that Norma Shearer was preparing for "Romeo and Juliet," the greatest role of her eventful career.

To the multitude it is difficult to understand what it is that draws Norma on and on. Those who have the idea that it is a desire for money are wrong. In spite of the princely income drawn by both Mr. and Mrs. Thalberg, they live simply and without the usual Hollywood ostentation.

"I have never in all of my life been eager to possess things," said Norma to me that day. "Not even money. I have always been superstitious about even owning a home.

"People buy a place, settle back and say, 'This is where I belong. This is where I am going to stay.' Then they find that they do not belong. Sometimes the result is quite terrible. Not until we had a son did Irving and I feel that we should have a home of our own.

"It is not money or possessing things that count with me. It is success."

Success must be the answer. That intense craving that will not let her settle down. That burning desire to go higher and higher in the adventure of life.

That spirit was paramount when she commenced work in "Romeo and Juliet." "This will be one of the most thrilling adventures of my career," she said. "To do something through the new medium of the screen, that the stage has never been able to produce."

Norma could no more settle down to domesticity and pass up the opportunity to play "Juliet" than she could give up the idea of living. And as she has said, pictures have been a part of her life for so long that she cannot imagine life without them.

There will always be another picture, another success to struggle for, another adventure to be lived to lure Norma on. The spirit of Shearer is unquenchable. To what heights it will lead even Norma does not know.

the Eddie Cantor broadcasts for weeks; he croaked his loyal support to Al Jolson, and also to Fred Allen (incidentally, his favorite comic); and he was a mainstay of the "Buck Rogers" serials.

"In one of 'em," he grimaced at the recollection, "I played 'a web-footed dwarf king living under water.' His name was Og. O—g. I was so good they wouldn't let me quit." Jay sighed. "That disillusioned me," he said.

He got into broadcasting by accident, as he has into most things. Although he'd had six years on the stage in Manhattan, there wasn't enough activity to keep him busy all the time. So he tried writing ether skits as a sideline. He ended up playing one of his own characters.

THOSE six years in the theatre had been, in their way, as extraordinary as anything else that happened to Stander. He was cast in flop after flop, until, at the close of the sixth season, he'd counted up to twenty-eight. He didn't really mind, though—as fast as one closed, he'd go into rehearsal with another.

His stage debut was accomplished quite unexpectedly, and almost without conscious volition on his part. Stander had been reporting for the Long Island News when a friend took him backstage at the Provincetown Playhouse. The director, James Light, was rehearsing a Biblical parable called "Him," by e. e. (lower case!) cummings. He needed a Roman centurion who could shoot crap. The friend nodded toward Stander. "There's your man."

Jay walked up, delivered a phony spiel on his "career" as an actor, and added that by training, condition and heredity he was a crapshooter. Not only did he get the job, but by the night of the premiere he was filling five other minor roles in the same piece.

Stander was nineteen then. Besides reporting, he had done almost everything you can think of in the five years just preceding. It began at fourteen, when he first left home. His first job was as an office boy in a shirt factory. Subsequently, he became a taxi driver, a tile-setter's helper, a ditch digger, foreman in a picture-frame shop, a lifeguard, a waiter, and a salesman for, variously, photo-lithographs, automobiles, printing, insurance and newspaper ads. As messenger boy for a bond house, he lost $167,000 worth of securities. He got them back three days later, but not his job.

Stander's passionate interest in world affairs, his decidedly liberal leanings, are probably an outgrowth of his contacts with life in its many metropolitan phases. Some of them were bitter, although he himself has never felt the pinch of want. Born in New York City on January 10, 1908, of German-Russian parentage, he attended the local public schools intermittently. The eldest of three children, he spent a good deal of his youth setting a bad example for a brother, Alvin, and a sister, Frances. He was kicked out of nine institutions of learning. One time he ghost-wrote a book on political economy for a professor who, a conservative himself, appeared serenely unaware of the quite opposite implications of his published work.

Today, at twenty-eight, Jay finds himself one of filmdom's "biggies." But he isn't kidding himself. "Now," he croaks, "they want to make a dramatic actor out of me. Nix on that stuff! You won't catch me carrying any plot on my shoulders. I started as the comedy relief and I'll end up the same way."

Stander has a great many unconventional notions about Hollywood.

Actors are bored, he says, bored because, whether they know it or not, they are the least important cog in the movie machine. He calls them "inanimate objects"—except for those few moments before the cameras!

"ALL they have to have," he barks, "is a physical sense of orientation, like a pilot making a landing—where to stand, so that the camera and lights hit the mark, and how to read lines out loud."

He believes pictures should represent the collective efforts of author, director, technicians and players, rather than the dominance of any individual or group. He is violently opposed to censorship, declaring that a writer faces too many taboos today to turn out anything significant.

"As a result," he snaps, "pictures are all form and no content."

He has read only two scripts through, and never memorizes his lines literally. "I don't believe in it on my own time." He gets an idea of the character he's to play, and then talks it over with the director and the other performers. Says it's more spontaneous that way.

A phrase-coiner at the drop of a hat, Stander says Hollywood's celluloid "insulates everybody against reality." Its movies are "contributions to cosmic ennui." A bachelor, he "approves" of women. "I think they're here to stay." Seriously, his romantic interest at present lies quite outside his profession. He's never, he insists, been in love with an actress. But then all women intrigue him, more or less—all except "careerists."

His other personal tastes run to sweet cocktails and loud colors in clothes. He has a healthy animal hunger for food, particularly tartar sandwiches. He likes to sneak away for a night on Central Avenue, Los Angeles' Harlem, and is fascinated by all types, black as well as white. He cares nothing for outdoor sports, but likes cards and pool. He is a great reader of economics and world affairs, and can't stand to hear a ticking clock.

Under contract to Columbia, he has a wholesome respect for Frank Capra, his director on "Mr. Deeds." "Capra," he observes, "takes a Cinderella story, a romantic escape fairy tale, and tells it in realistic, hard-boiled terms."

A kind of Cinderella man in his own right, half-cynic, half-idealist, Stander sprawls between pictures on his hill overlooking Hollywood, croaking delighted defiance and pausing, now and again, to pull out a bright new quarter and flash it in the sun.

But that, nowadays, happens less and less often.

He's one of the biggies.

kidnapping case. Rumors spread, and soon a mob, whipped into a frenzy, attacks and burns down the jail. Their supposed victim gets out alive and arranges, through his brothers, to have the mob leaders tried for murder. After a jury returns a verdict of guilty for twenty-two of them, Tracy, smitten by his conscience, walks into the courtroom and proves his identity. Spencer Tracy, with most of the camera's attention, is always compelling, and there are good performances in lesser roles by Frank Albertson, Bruce Cabot and Walter Abel.

★★★ The King Steps Out
(Columbia)

Grace Moore makes another celluloid comeback in this picture. Miss Moore sings beautifully, as usual, but acts and looks considerably better than usual. The story is a gay and giddy one of a princess who tries to save her sister from marrying a man she doesn't love, even if he is the king and Franchot Tone besides. The princess, Grace Moore, scorns all the court red tape and loves the simple life. Her father, Walter Connolly, also scorns the court goings-on and loves the simple life, but with plenty of beer. They set out to persaude the king that he doesn't want to marry into their family. But King Tone mistakes the helpful princess for a dressmaker and promptly falls in love with her, shocking the court and practically killing his mother, the redoubtable Elizabeth Risdon. By that time the other princess decides the king is pretty nice, too, and has poor Gracie thrown into prison. Everything, as you may have suspected, turns out happily ever after. Walter Connolly almost walks off with the honors with his performance and Elizabeth Risdon is excellent. Franchot Tone in gold braid and ringlets looks a bit silly but don't let that keep you away.

Preview Postscript

Miss Grace Moore was no doubt more upset than ever when this picture was previewed. After complaining to every newspaper in the country that she was through with Hollywood since singing three days straight to a cow, the milking scene was cut out . . . Mr. Von Sternberg has a decided antipathy to color on any set. Whenever possible he eliminates it, as in the garden scenes for this picture. Those posies were all from the studio floral shop, hand-fashioned of cotton and silk fabrics and painted with aluminum paint. All the interior scenes were painted with white enamel . . . For once the extra with extra poundage got a break. On this picture only the ones definitely on the buxom side were considered, since this particular period in history was not partial to grapefruit.

★★★ The Case Against Mrs. Ames (Walter Wanger)

An intelligent murder mystery seems to be a rare commodity these days, which is one reason why "The Case Against Mrs. Ames" is a welcome addition to this month's bill of fare. Expertly written and played to the hilt by a cast headed by Madeleine Carroll and George Brent, it is by far the best of the last few months' crop of mystery films. The story concerns the efforts of Madeleine Carroll, as Mrs. Ames, to clear her name of a murder charge. When she's acquitted the prosecuting attorney, George Brent, sets out to prove that the gal is guilty. Instead, he falls in love, and, convinced she is innocent, helps her find the real murderer. The picture moves rapidly all the way and builds up to an exciting and perfectly logical climax, also something rare for the mystery numbers. Madeleine

Carroll, in the lead, is one of the most beautiful gals ever to face a camera, and George Brent does a swell job with the best acting opportunity he's had in some time. In the supporting cast, Alan Mowbray, Arthur Treacher, Beulah Bondi and Eddie Brophy are outstanding.

Preview Postscript

Madeleine Carroll has one of the most unique hobbies in Hollywood. She loves to talk about the "flops" she's taken in her career. What's more, she advises any young actress to beware of overnight success. . . . Richard Carle's been wanting to retire for the past fifty years. Fifty years ago when he started acting, Richard Carle was looking forward to the day when he had enough money in the bank to purchase an easy chair, felt slippers and a ranch. He's had the money in the bank more than once, but just when he would plan a shopping trip some producer would dangle a contract in his face. Over a quarter of a century was spent starring in Broadway roles and now Mr. C's in constant demand for films . . . Scotty Beckett wants to retire soon from this acting racket, too. The six-year-old who has been in more than forty pictures in the last year has an ambition to be a "juicer"—one of those gents who scramble about at dizzy heights above the sets and manipulate giant Klieg lights.

★★ Nobody's Fool

(Universal)

It's Edward Everett Horton in the title role, and that's 'nuff said for any Horton addict. The story is just about as silly as anything could be imagined and therefore admirably suited to Edward Everett's charms. With a heart of gold and a head of cement, as Glenda Farrell, his gal friend, lovingly describes him. Mr. Horton is the instigator of a remarkable plan to tear down New York City and build up a city of happy homes for happy mothers and fathers. His naïveté is meat for a gang of realty crooks, headed by Frank Conroy and ably assisted by Glenda Farrell. They have a plan underfoot whereby they hope to beat Cesar Romero, a rival racketeer, out of some property. One look at Eddie and they decide he's just the man to spring the news on Romero and his gang and take the beating. One of Eddie's outstanding qualities is his willingness to oblige and make everybody happy. Through a series of uncanny blunders he succeeds in making everybody happy, the district attorney and the two gangs of crooks fast friends, the property in question a site for a model tenement, and himself the proud possessor of Glenda's hand in marriage. Fun for everybody!

Preview Postscript

Edward Everett Horton celebrated a birthday while this picture was in production and a gala surprise party was given him in Glenda Farrell's bungalow on the lot. Instead of the birthday cake, though, the cast presented him with a basket of champagne which was almost as nice a sentiment, anyway. On waking up the morning of his birthday, Edward Everett was surprised when he looked out the window. All over the lawn on his Encino estate were scattered bright red flower-pots, in each of which was growing a white geranium. It developed that this was the gift of Arthur Treacher. Mr. Horton had them planted along a walk and from now on it's to be called "Treacher Walk" . . . Florence Roberts is known as Horton's unofficial mother. Since they worked together in stock in Philadelphia many years ago a fast friendship has grown up between the two. You'll never see a Horton picture without Miss Roberts tucked away in it some place . . . Horton is known in Hollywood as the most helpful guy in town. He has been known to encourage more newcomers with advice and money than anyone around these parts. Henry Hunter, an extra on this picture and a newcomer to the movie lot, was suddenly startled to find his hand firmly gripped the first day on the set, and hear a cordial welcome from Mr. Horton, followed by an even more cordial invitation to lunch.

★★ Jailbreak (Warners)

At least there is a new angle to this familiar yarn about what goes on behind the gray prison walls. The picture opens with a bunch of the boys whooping it up in San Quentin. The atmosphere is anything but pleasant between the deadly rivalries, intrigues, etc., soon evident among the inmates, to say nothing of the way they all go around making faces at each other. Then come the killings and on the heels of them Barton MacLane, detective. But, of course, he is still scratching his head over the wrong clews when the daredevil reporter, Craig Reynolds, wangles his way into the penitentiary and solves the mystery to his own satisfaction if not the audience's. We have a profound respect for the Reynolds profile and only wish we could feel the same way about his histrionic assets. Prison walls can't keep a girl out of a Warner picture, so here we have June Travis as a former secretary to one of the present corpses. Miss Travis' role requires her to stand around with a look of horror all over her pretty face and she does this very well. George E. Stone, Eddie Acuff, and Addison Richards are part of the grim scenery and perform adequately.

Preview Postscript

George E. Stone became so fond of his prison uniform that he bargained with the studio wardrobe department and bought it. Now he terrorizes the neighbors by mowing the lawn of his Beverly Hills home in full convict regalia . . . Fifteen old-time prizefighters were hired to give an authentic touch to the hard-boiled prison scenery. Gentler folk you've never met than these two-hundred-pounders, decorated with mashed-in noses and cauliflower ears. Their only failing was still being slightly punch-drunk. Whenever a bell rang, pandemonium broke loose, and actors and crew not in the pugilistic class ran for cover until the fifteen fought it out among themselves . . . Dick Purcell and Craig Reynolds didn't lack instructors in that fight scene, but it took three days to film. The first day the boys were afraid of hurting each other, and the results looked just like it. The second day Dick knocked Craig cold and the third day Craig reciprocated. And it all takes just thirty seconds on the screen. . . . Next to Vince Barnett, Craig Reynolds holds the title of Hollywood's most impractical practical jokester. His favorite victim on this set was June Travis. Unfortunately, Craig discovered that June is terribly susceptible to tickling. To such a degree that just the word whispered in her presence can send her off into gales of giggles. It is considered a miracle by those in the cast that June even managed to get one shot in this picture with a straight face.

★ Palm Springs (Paramount)

"Palm Springs" is the month's low in musical pictures. It has, however, a couple of assets, so let's record them before we chant the dirge. Assets: Two excellent songs ("I Don't Want To Make History" and "The Hills of Wyoming") and Frances Langford to sing them. Liabilities: An impossible story, amateurish direction, and a mistake in choosing a leading man. Smith Ballew, the orchestra leader, has the role. He plays an honest cowboy, and he plays him like the hero of the senior class play. The story points out the evils of the rich, and explains sanctimoniously that a girl will be much happier in a shack with the world's dullest cowhand than she possibly could be in a penthouse with a millionaire. The whole thing adds up to an unfortunate vehicle for Frances Langford. The little gal with the big voice can go places if someone will give her a halfway intelligent picture. Ernest Cossart, Sir Guy Standing, E. E. Clive, David Niven and Spring Byington head the supporting cast.

Preview Postscript

Although a typically American story with the California desert as background, British-born actors predominate in the cast. Sir Guy Standing, Ernest Cossart, David Niven and E. E. Clive all hail from the British Isles. With the exception of Niven, all won stage fame in their native country before coming to this country. David Niven turned actor after coming to Hollywood on a pleasure jaunt. Now he's going to stay just as long as Merle Oberon does. Many visitors on the set commented on the remarkable likeness between Frances Langford and one of the "bit" players. At last it was revealed that he was Frances' brother, Jimmy Langford. Employed in a New York theatrical booking office, young Langford decided to vacation in Hollywood this year and, after procuring three extra roles in no time at all, decided to stay and see what happens. He's just 25 years old and figures there's time to work up. . . . An isolated location site on the desert near Palmdale, Calif., a two hours' ride from Hollywood, was the setting for this picture. The principals in the picture and cast and crew made the round trip from Hollywood each day, while a watchman was left to guard over the studio-constructed ranch buildings and "props" set up in the desert. This watchman was the victim of a bizarre hold-up which has set authorities agog. While making his rounds one night the watchman suddenly felt a gun poked in his ribs. A few minutes later a truck came bumping over the road. While one robber kept the watchman covered, two others loaded everything movable on the truck. When the troupe showed up on the set the following morning only a skeleton set remained, so artisans and more watchmen were rushed from Hollywood.

★★ Three Wise Guys

(M-G-M)

Of course, you know that two such attractive people as Betty Furness and Robert Young will live happily ever after, but M-G-M certainly makes things tough for them for a while. Betty is the "front" for a couple of meanies, Bruce Cabot and Raymond Walburn, in a profitable skin-game. She agrees with her partners to give Robert Young the works on learning of the gentleman's annual income. Being only a woman, after all, Betty falls in love with Robert. And to prove that it's not Robert's bank account of which she is enamored, she sticks to him even when he's disinherited, out of work, in jail, and so on ad infinitum, even to giving birth to a babe on Christmas Eve in a barn. The story is weak enough to wobble, but Miss Furness and Mr. Young manage to make their characterizations so light-hearted and likable that it completely saves the day and the picture. Raymond Walburn's urbanity is enjoyable as the brains of the crooks, while Bruce Cabot is satisfactorily menacing in his determined efforts to ruin Betty's life. The picture ends in a grand finale of lilies and bluebirds when Bruce saves Robert Young from the penitentiary by returning some money which he had stolen.

Preview Postscript

Beautiful Palm Springs was the location site for one of the most important sequences of this film. The cast was overjoyed, since the sound of "location" is enough to make any Hollywood actor or actress ill, as most locations are in uncomfortable, dreary spots far from civilization. Those swimmers you see in the picture are actually Olympic champions who were staying in the desert and practising daily in the El Mirador Hotel plunge. . . . Bruce Cabot is gradually earning the enviable title of meanest meanie in celluloid. He's always doted on playing the rough numbers, but for years the studio thought the Cabot face was too sweet a one for those roles. Just when Bruce was on his way out of Hollywood the studio gave him a chance to do what he wanted.

★★ The Last Outlaw

(RKO-Radio)

Say what you will about "horse oprys" they can be depended upon for a good plot with some sure-fire thrills thrown in for good measure, which is more than the average drawing-room drammer can guarantee. A good cast provides another excuse for seeing this picture if your low-brow tastes need justification. Harry Carey, Henry B. Walthall and Hoot Gibson are sincere and likable in their roles, furnishing plenty of excitement with their attack upon a band of desperadoes who are hiding out in the hills. Carey has returned to the home town after 25 years in prison and has found everything changed with the exception of his old friend, Henry B. Walthall, the town sheriff. Margaret Callahan is Carey's daughter, but unaware of it, since Carey doesn't want her to know he is an ex-convict. Hoot Gibson is the slightly aged cowboy who is enamored of Margaret. A bank hold-up brings everything to a neat climax, since the bandits escape taking Margaret with them as protection against too much gun play. In the heroic rescue she finds that Carey is her father and that Hoot is the man she is going to marry. No, it won't increase your blood pressure, but the picture will provide an evening's good, wholesome fun, if you think you can take it.

Preview Postscript

There was a grand reunion staged on Set 12 at RKO Studios the day this picture went into production. It was the first get-together that Henry B. Walthall, Harry Carey, Hoot Gibson and Director Christy Cabanne had enjoyed for years. Back in 1912, when movies were seen and not heard, Christy directed these three gents in a real thriller, "West of the Wild Rockies." The gala atmosphere prevailed throughout the picture's production, and when the company returned from a ten-day location trip near Bakersfield a unanimous vote was cast to the effect that never had there been such a jolly cast and crew.

★ Love Begins at 20

(Warners)

If you like the Hugh Herbert brand of comedy, you won't be disappointed in this tale of an American family and its trials and tribulations. Most of the latter, of course, are due to papa, a mild little man whose one talent is washing dishes. Nothing seems to wring the heart so much as one of those scared-rabbit twitches of the Herbert nose, and Hugh gets plenty of them between housework and listening to his domineering spouse, Dorothy Vaughan. But suddenly over the dishpan all Hugh's pent-up emotions burst forth. The result is riot, no less. Between getting fired, knocking out his boss, getting mixed up with bank bandits and landing in jail, then coming home bloody but uncowed, Hugh has himself a time. Patricia Ellis is good to look at as his daughter and reels off some brand new wisecracks. Warren Hull is satisfactory as the nice young man who has honorable intentions toward the heroine, and Dorothy Vaughan is convincingly bossy. But it's a Hugh Herbert picture pure and simple.

The company had a hectic time chasing from Warners' San Fernando studio to their Sunset studio, for the interior of the main character's home was built on the latter lot, while the exterior was on the larger valley lot. Every set at Warners' larger studio was being utilized and in order to complete the picture in the scheduled three weeks it was necessary to chase around in this fashion. . . . Hugh Herbert spent all his spare time on the lot drawing plans for the elaborate new swimming pool which he is going to have constructed on his San Fernando ranch, "El Rancho Herberto." The pool is to be lined with plate glass mirrors so his guests can see how silly they look when taking flat dives. The ranch is Herbert's pride and joy, and at present he is raising a special grade of goats. Each year the Herberts specialize in a different crop—of grain and livestock.

★ Early to Bed (Paramount)

The marital adventures of Mary Boland and Charlie Ruggles seem to go on forever. In their latest comedy of domestic affairs they manage to struggle through another series of farce comedy situations which will probably amuse most audiences, although they never reach the heights of hilarity they achieved in such memorable little numbers as "Mama Loves Papa" and other earlier efforts. This time Charlie, a timid little clerk in a glass eye concern, asserts himself long enough to propose to Mary Boland, to whom he's been engaged for twenty years. Their honeymoon is spent trying to land a big order from a vacationing glass eye tycoon, George Barbier. The fact that Charlie is a sleep walker accounts for a number of old-time Mack Sennett gags, some of which are funny and some of which could have been left with Mr. Sennett. Ruggles and Boland are as good as their material allows them to be, George Barbier and Robert McWade are excellent as a pair of big business men, and Gail Patrick is wasted on a minor role.

Preview Postscript

Charlie Ruggles' long talks with the "prop" department had everyone guessing. But the reason was soon uncovered. It seems that they had made him a pair of rubber feet so Charlie could run around in that wet grass without making this his farewell picture. Of liquid rubber, the feet were fashioned on a plaster cast of the Ruggles foot, allowing room for a pair of socks underneath, and you'd never know from nothing. . . . Lucien Littlefield has been threatening for some eight years to express himself on paper instead of celluloid. And he's made good the threat at last, by collaborating on this story's scenario with Chandler Sprague. . . . This marks Mary Boland's first picture since her return from the New York show, "Jubilee." If she has her way, Miss B. will stay right here, too, thank you. Says the stage bored her and she'd much prefer a series of quickies in Hollywood to the most successful play on Broadway.

★★ Trouble for Two (M-G-M)

Based on Robert Louis Stevenson's "The Suicide Club," Bob Montgomery and Rosalind Russell are presented in a mythical kingdom setting. Bob and Rosalind are both handsome in their curls, and the picture is entertaining at times, but one leaves it convinced that M-G-M will have to take steps if Mr. M.'s popularity is to be maintained. The simplest step, of course, would be to provide him with a good picture. In this one he's a prince who hops to Paris to get out of marrying a princess of a neighboring kingdom. He doesn't know, at the time, that she's Rosalind Russell. In Paris, looking for excitement, he joins The Suicide Club, a gay little organization which kills one of its members at each meeting. In Paris he also learns that the princess he's been ducking is the same gal he's been chasing all over town. So two mythical kingdoms are happily united in marriage. Montgomery and Russell are both competent, but their work is overshadowed by better portrayals from Frank Morgan, E. E. Clive and Louis Hayward.

Preview Postscript

Robert Montgomery not only gained that moustache in the last few months but some fifteen additional pounds to boot. No one is more puzzled than Mr. M. about the latter, since those swanky costumes he wears forced him to stand up for some two months straight while on the set. Satin breeches are very nice to look at but very bad to sit in, so "standing chairs" used by the "Ziegfeld" gals were brought in to recline on. Frank Morgan, however, came out of the picture some five pounds less hefty. Says it was the strain of keeping an eye on Montgomery while they played backgammon—which was every minute that the two were not in front of the cameras. They played standing up, on a table raised a couple feet from the ground. . . . Miss Russell spent every spare moment on the set scribbling away on reams of paper, or gnawing countless pencil stubs with a far-gone expression in her dark orbs. It developed that she is writing her life story in scenario form. She's had two offers to date for the MSS. when the last soul-searching sentence is completed.

★ Bunker Bean (RKO-Radio)

Mildly amusing is this latest picturization of Bunker Bean's adventures and misadventures. What high spots there are have been achieved in spite of the story by an excellent cast, notably Owen Davis, Jr., Robert McWade, Louise Latimer, and Jessie Ralph. One or two scenes nearly brought down the house, particularly a grape-rolling sequence, but we couldn't quite believe in some of the hilarity. For instance that a young man smart enough to add six columns of figures in his head would fall for a fake mummy imported overnight from Egypt. The victim of a terrific inferiority complex, our hero goes to a seeress and finds that in a previous reincarnation he was Napoleon. Straightway he begins modelling his wife on Bonaparte tactics, progressing far enough to spank the boss's daughter. But Napoleon evidently didn't know too much about women so Bunker again visits the seeress and begs to be someone else. He ends up with twenty thousand dollars in the bank and the boss's daughter on his lap, if you care.

WRINKLES?
BLACKHEADS
ENLARGED PORES

"I USED TO HAVE THEM TOO, UNTIL I TRIED THIS SIMPLE HOME TREATMENT"

"I used to have a terrible complexion. Not only did I have wrinkles, but my skin was covered with blackheads and enlarged pores. Everything I tried seemed to do no good . . . then on a friend's advice I used Hollywood Mask. In just a few days my skin began to show miraculous signs of improvement. In a week every blackhead and enlarged pore disappeared. What a transformation! My skin was clear, soft and smooth. Hollywood Mask sinks down in the pores and removes deep-seated dirt which soap and water can never touch. Every woman who takes proper care of her skin can obtain a fresh, clear, lovely complexion of which she may be proud."

body but Louise Latimer. Owen Davis, Jr., wasn't accustomed to spanking blonde young ladies, so the scene took practically a whole day to perfect to the director's satisfaction. . . . Owen Davis, Jr., boarded a plane for three-weeks' vacation in the East on completion of his role in this film. He rushed to Skowhegan, Maine, where he will appear for opening week in Owen Davis, Sr's., play, "Icebound." While in New York he belonged to a club of six young men who met each week for lunch. The member who had received the best "break," theatrically speaking, that week treated. There were many weeks when all six bought their own lunches. The other five were Henry Fonda, Ross Alexander, James Stewart, Brian Donlevy and Elisha Cooke, Jr.

★★ Bullets or Ballots

(First National)

It's a cops-and-robbers affair, with Eddie Robinson, as New York's toughest detective, playing gangster to fool the racketeers and break up the town's biggest crime syndicate. The Robinson role is no doubt patterned after the career of Johnny Broderick, hard-fisted Manhattan detective, who always regarded a poke in the nose more effective than a subpoena. At any rate, Eddie has most of the mob-men tipping their fedoras to him, so when he's publicly fired from the police department the boys are only too glad to hire his services for their own needs. Little reck they with the law, as the saying goes, for the whole thing is a ruse on the part of the coppers, and Eddie uses his new position to help clamp the lid on the city's vice rings. If you like gangster pictures full of monosyllabic mugs and guarded references to "the big bosses," you will undoubtedly enjoy the familiar routines of Mr. Robinson and his supporting cast, which includes Humphrey Bogart, Joan Blondell, Barton MacLane, and Frank McHugh.

Preview Postscript

The stuntman gang is no secret to movie fans—that gang of boys and men who risk their necks to save the star for the fade-out embrace. But few of them know the pug-ugly gang. The pug-uglies are a fraternity of thespians whose faces are so out of kilter that they look mean enough to push an alligator in the face. Most of the brothers are ex-prizefighters or circus performers and a football player or two, who have either fallen on their heads at various times or been smacked in the face with a baseball bat. They're just plain ugly. But those bashed noses, scarred cheeks, cauliflower ears and punch-drunk eyes are beautiful for gangster films, and what's more, mean real money to their owners. There are about twenty-five working on this film who were seen in "G-Men," "Little Caesar" and "Public Enemy." . . . A pistol expert was summoned to First National for this picture. Real bullets had to be shot at Barton MacLane, Humphrey Bogart and Edward G. Robinson in order to show the wood splintering above their heads for one scene. The three gentlemen were fussy and insisted on a professional.

★ The Golden Arrow

(Warners)

There should be a law against Bette Davis lending her talents to anything less than Grade A Certified stories. We're not fussy enough to expect an "Of Human Bondage" too often, but "The Golden Arrow" definitely got us down. Looking at Bette is never time wasted and George Brent's profile is still far from depressing, but neither fact can compensate for the plot. It has to do with another of these richest girls in the world, whose life is cluttered up with yachts and polo ponies and foreign princes. Your heart will be wrung with the pity of it all. So is George Brent's, to such an extent that he tells the poor little rich Bette that he will give up the honorable profession of reporting in order to marry her and protect her from her princes. For the rest of the picture your sympathies are supposed to be with poor Mr. Brent, restless in the lap of luxury. The fade-out was really refreshing, though. In place of embraces, Mr. Brent and Miss Davis exchange black eyes.

Preview Postscript

Bill Guthrie is the man at Warners whose job it is to find locations, no matter how impossible, at a moment's notice. Luck was with him for once when he was told to locate a yacht that would be scrumptious enough to belong to the richest girl in the world, nee Bette Davis, in this opus. The E. L. Cord yacht, "Virginia," was in Long Beach harbor and Bill obtained permission to use it. It only costs $1250 per day to keep this "rowboat" afloat. . . . One of the most impressive sets ever to go up on the studio lot was the night club set. The room was 120 by 145 feet, hexagonal in shape. The walls were panelled for huge murals in blue and silver and 40-foot drapes of white crepe velvet extended across arches. The orchestra platform and furnishings of the dining-room were in chromium and ivory. . . . Eugene Pallette has appeared in more than 967 pictures and could have been in a lot more, but won't sign a contract with any studio but Warners. The reason being that they understand about ducks. And ducks are the main thing in Mr. Pallette's life. He never works a minute during the duck-shooting season and never works any week-end during fishing season. He's been in the movies ever since silent days and, next to ducks, thinks they're the finest institution in the world.

★★ The Princess Comes Across (Paramount)

The shipboard romance of a concertina player and a Brooklyn gal masquerading as a Swedish princes is the story here, and with Carole Lombard doing a swell impersonation of Garbo one might well expect a pleasant and amusing comedy. Unfortunately, before the boat is many miles at sea, the whole thing turns into a murder mystery of little more than mild interest. Carole, it seems, is a chorus girl stranded in Europe, far from her beloved Brooklyn. With Alison Skipworth, a Flatbush friend, she conceives the princess idea, lands a Hollywood film contract and sets sail for America. Aboard also is Fred MacMurray, band leader and confessed concertina manipulator. He falls in love with the royal lady from Brooklyn, but their romance is impeded by the presence of several surly and suspicious characters, one of whom seems to have something on almost the entire passenger list. When the murder mystery takes over the picture, the fine Lombard comedy is tossed into the background. However, the film may be worth seeing for the Lombard moments and for her amazing resemblance, in some scenes, to The Great One. Siegfried Rumann and Porter Hall are excellent in supporting roles.

Preview Postscript

On a Lombard set you will always find the gifts flying high, wide and handsome. First of all, every day Carole orders cases of coca cola delivered on the set for everyone to consume; then on the slightest provocation she bestows gifts on one and all, from the prop boys up, and on the picture's completion another deluge comes. . . . Sets for this picture were scarce but elaborate, depicting, for the most part, the interior of a luxury liner. These were all built on the studio lot and most of the exteriors were shot at San Pedro, except for one or two of the boat on a stormy sea. The "stormy sea" is a 20-foot-square pond on the lot on which a miniature ship is launched. While a wind machine blows up wild waves, an assistant stands at either side of the pond rocking the boat back and forth while the camera gets a perfect shot of a great ship battling the elements.

★★★ Fatal Lady (Paramount)

Mary Ellis is lovely as the "Fatal Lady"—the ill-starred singer who is involved in one mysterious murder after another, being forced to abandon her grand opera career and join a travelling South American company at one time and at another having to accept a job as entertainer in a Paris night-club. This picture should establish her as a competent and delightful screen personality. Though her voice is as fine as ever, Miss Ellis' acting has gained immeasurably in sincerity and assurance since her last film venture. Except for one overture, the music has been composed exclusively for this picture. In the well chosen supporting cast are Walter Pidgeon, Alan Mowbray, Ruth Donnelly, Norman Foster and Guy Bates Post. Whether you are an opera addict, a mystery fan, or just a stickler for good entertainment, you will find this picture worth your while.

Walter Wanger happened into the Grand Opera House, Los Angeles' first theatre, just before it was to be pulled down. He was so fascinated by the ginger-bread decorations, plush curtains and sentiment of the building which has reverberated to applause for Edwin Booth, Lillian Russell, Richard Mansfield, and scores of other stars of bygone days that he prevailed upon the city to delay razing the building until he could get a sequence written with this setting. Studio artisans redecorated the interior of the house for its final blaze of glory. Hollywood actors and 1000 Latin-type extras sat in the boxes and orchestra section once occupied by the upper crust of Old Los Angeles and witnessed a performance by Mary Ellis and a "grand opera company" of more extras, while batteries of cameras and microphones, strung along the galleries and stage, recorded the action. The ancient structure had never been so brilliantly illuminated . . .

★★★★★ The Green Pastures

(Warners)

Majestic in its simplicity, "The Green Pastures" brings to the screen Marc Connelly's delightful drama of Heaven as seen through the eyes of God-fearing colored folk, and makes it one of the finest photoplays ever to come out of Hollywood. There isn't a movie name in the entire cast of Negro performers, but there is a compelling sincerity in their acting which helps materially to make "The Green Pastures" the beautiful screen drama that it is. De Lawd is an humble man who rules Heaven with a gentle hand, and one grieves with him for the sins of his "chillun" down on earth, whom he can't seem to control. "Heaven" is a delightful place with fluffy cotton clouds, where fish fries and "ten-cent seegars" are the order of the day. You'll see the Angel Gabriel, who never quite gets a chance to blow his horn; Noah, who has a spirited argument with De Lawd on the wisdom of taking two kegs of whiskey aboard the ark; and Moses, who delivers the Israelites to the Promised Land. It's folk-lore magnificently told, with Rex Ingram, as De Lawd, and all God's "chillun" giving superb performances.

Marc Connelly, author of this Pulitzer Prize winning play which ran continuously on stages all over the country for five years, has been working on the screen adaptation since last September and just finished the day before shooting on the picture began, in February. Having all that room provided by movie sets was joy to Mr. Connelly. For he has been accustomed to seeing the biggest scene, the fish-fry in Heaven, played in a space 44 feet wide and 26 feet deep in the Mansfield Theatre in New York and often the stages on the road were considerably smaller. But on Stage 8 at Warner's studio they were provided with an area 325 feet wide and 275 feet deep, just a little short of two acres. Hundreds of angels could be used in place of a mere handful, while the whole scene gives an illusion of unlimited space and beauty . . . "Heaven" was just a series of two-foot high hillocks overgrown with linen grass, miniature live-oak trees with crepe-paper moss swaying in the breezes from an electric fan. Painted backdrops of canvas provide the vast stretch of Louisiana bayou country.

Now that their divorce is on the way and they can be friends again, Arline Judge and Wesley Ruggles spent a pleasant evening dining at the Trocadero. It's funny how clubby people can be the minute they are no longer legally required to be civil to one another. Perhaps that's why the friendly divorces outnumber the friendly marriages in Hollywood. Anyway, Arline was in such a good mood that she purchased five dollars worth of cigarettes and cigars and gave them all right back to the cigarette girl.

Luise Rainer got herself arrested again for speeding a few weeks ago, and that gives her the undisputed Hollywood championship. This time her studio called her in on the carpet and gave the young lady a heart-to-heart talk about things. Maybe Luise was chasing the guy.

Re George Brent it is interesting to note that when the sombre Swedish lady returned to Hollywood he was not on hand to meet her. A gallant band of admirers, photographers, and the press awaited her at the Pasadena station, but she fooled them by getting off the train at San Bernardino. Another Garbo surprise is that she's being nice to everyone these days. "I don't mind being photographed," she told a cameraman, "but all the photographers think I do, so they hide and jump out at me from behind buildings." So Garbo is melting, although up to the present writing no one calls her Toots.

Love Among the Younger Set: A few weeks ago Richard Cromwell completed his swimming pool and invited a number of his young friends to the grand opening. The night was lovely and the moon was up, or something, so Dick decided it was a fine time to propose to Gracie Durkin. He dashed into the house to comb his hair and rehearse his lines, and came out to find his loved one holding hands with Bill Henry, who also thought it was a lovely night.

When Leslie Howard finished his work in "Romeo and Juliet," he and his family were all set for a dash to New York and a trip abroad. Bags were all packed, and in case the studio phoned the maid was instructed to announce that the Howards had left. At the last minute the phone rang. It was Norma Shearer, said the maid, and she wanted to say goodbye to Mrs. Howard. Mrs. H., making an exception for Norma, picked up the phone and was greeted by the voice of Irving Thalberg. "Tell your husband to get right over to the studio," said Irving. "We have some retakes."

Without doubt one of the finest pictures Hollywood has ever made, "The Green Pastures" will appeal to audiences everywhere for its beautiful simplicity and for the grand acting of Rex Ingram as De Lawd. During the making of the picture, De Lawd had his troubles. Being something of a ladies' man in private life, De Lawd found his salary attached every week to mend the broken heart of some gal who interrupted her weeping long enough to hire a lawyer. As he announces in the picture, "Bein' God ain't exactly a bed of roses."

The best thing in "The Princess Comes Across" is Carole Lombard's amazing resemblance to Garbo in several scenes. Carole plays a bogus Swedish princess in the picture, and she must have been doing a bit of rehearsing in a Hollywood department store, for someone spied her and yelled "Garbo!" Immediately Carole was the center of a group of enthusiastic women who tugged and pulled at her until she shrieked, "Pulleaze! I'm only Jane Peters." Jane Peters is Carole's real name, and she isn't Garbo at all, but she knows how it feels.

This seems to be a month of thrilling swimming pool rescues. This time Jeanette MacDonald is the heroine of the story, and the victim dragged from the briny was Stormy Weather, her pet Skye terrier. Stormy swam too long and too hard in the MacDonald pool when he discovered he was too exhausted to pull himself out. A few yelps brought Jeanette, who jumped in, clad in her lounging pajamas, and pulled him out. And here's something for which you can hardly forgive Jeanette. Know why she calls her dog Stormy Weather? Because he's such a dark Skye!

Saw Gene Raymond on the set of "The Bride Walks Out" on one of the hottest days of the year, bundled up in an overcoat and scarf. He wasn't cold—he was posing for a plaque. Plaques, by the way, are the latest Hollywood fad. Instead of sitting for a portrait, you sit for a plaque. Hundreds of copies can be made, and some stars are sending them out to their fans. Don't expect them from everyone, though. Each one weighs two pounds, and one almost has to be Garbo to stand the mailing fees.

Richard Arlen, who has just returned from making a picture in England, was surprised to learn that over there every star has, besides his stand-in, a double. Mr. A. insisted he didn't need a double, since his role required no cliff-hanging, but the powers that be impressed on him the fact that a star without a double is frowned upon. So Dick checked through his English fan mail, and hired a young man for the job. The guy had nothing to do, but he saved Dick his social standing.

More Hollywood doings! Top row, left: a right jolly, British-looking outing is this foursome at a recent Cricket Club match. David Niven, with cricket leg guards and bat, chats with Merle Oberon. Mr. and Mrs. Patrick Knowles beside the lunch basket. Below, Al Jolson, Ruby Keeler and George Brent (with moustache) at the Warner Brothers annual banquet. Top row, right, Fredric March and lovely Jean Muir talk things over at a recent party at the Victor Hugo. And the same evening, Scotty gets a rare snap—Jean Arthur with her husband.

When Peter Lorre returned from his trip abroad he rushed home to greet his household, which consists of two black cats and a dog. The cats tendered him a fine welcome, but the dog, who had completely forgotten him, regarded his master with considerable suspicion. As a result, the dog now belongs to a friend, and the two black cats have the Lorre home to themselves.

Social Note: Warren Hull, of this city, was host recently at a stag shower in honor of Donald Woods. Mr. Woods is an expectant father. The guest of honor was presented with many delightful gifts, a few of which he could bring home to the little woman. The rest were more or less unprintable.

When Luise Rainer had to do a crying scene in her current picture she worked herself up to such a pitch that the weeping went on even after the scene was completed. On the way to her dressing room, still crying, she ran into Joan Crawford. "What's the matter?" asked Joan. "I can't help it," sobbed Luise. "I cry for the picture, and I am still sad." A few moments later Luise answered a knock on her dressing room door to find a messenger with orchids from Joan. Touching?

Talked to Bing Crosby on the "Rhythm on the Range" set between shots. Bing, in boots and a ten-gallon hat, took time out to tell us that this is the first time the movies have put a crooner on horseback. "It took a lot of courage," he explained, "but we finally found a horse that didn't mind."

■ ■ ■

"Rhythm on the Range" is no ordinary western, according to Bing. It's an epic. We asked him to prove it and he pointed to a prize bull standing majestically on the set, giving us the left profile. "See that bull?" he asked. We said we did. He directed our gaze to another bovine gentleman a few feet away. "See that other bull?" We said we saw him, too. "First bull's stand-in," said Bing.

★★★ The Road to Glory (20th Century-Fox)

"Road to Glory" is a war picture. Some audiences will call it an indictment of war, and others will regard it as a glorification of it. Whatever it is, it's good drama and at times it's highly exciting, which should be enough to recommend it to most picture-goers. In the cast are Warner Baxter, Fredric March, Lionel Barrymore and June Lang. March's young lieutenant is the best thing he's done in some time, and Baxter's portrayal of a hard-boiled captain is excellent, but some sort of honors should go to Miss Lang. Playing a nurse, she manages to go through the entire picture and most of the war without ever having to don a nurse's uniform and without ever mussing her make-up. While other nurses perform their duties in proper attire, Miss Lang wanders about in a tightly fitting low-necked dress and a long bob which must have proved highly disconcerting to the lame and the halt. If this inconsistency doesn't worry you, you'll find "Road to Glory" first-rate drama. In a supporting role, Gregory Ratoff does well with a comedy assignment.

Preview Postscript

June Lang's more than stepping up the success ladder out at 20th Century-Fox. Born June Vlasek, she went to school in Minneapolis and drifted out to California with her family to finish high school in Hollywood. Extra work appealed to her more from the pin-money angle than the career, but, catching the eye of studio biggies, she suddenly found herself heading starward. This, of course, didn't happen in one fell blow, since June knows what it is to be a stock girl out of work at times, too. However, June held up production on this one for a while. In an emotional scene in which she was supposed to face Warner Baxter, made up in grime and blood, June took one look at Warner's too realistic make-up and fainted quietly away.

★★★ The Poor Little Rich Girl (20th Century-Fox)

Don't let adolescent pimples keep YOU from being admired

UNSIGHTLY skin blemishes are a big trial to many young people during the years that follow the beginning of adolescence—from about 13 to 25, or even longer.

Important glands develop at this time, and final growth takes place. Disturbances occur throughout the entire system. The skin, especially, gets very sensitive. Waste poisons in the blood irritate this sensitive skin, and it breaks out in pimples.

But even severe cases of adolescent pimples can be corrected. Fleischmann's fresh Yeast clears these skin irritants out of the blood. Then, the pimples disappear.

Eat 3 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast regularly each day, before meals. Eat it plain, or dissolved in a little water until your skin is entirely clear. Start today.

picture, and that, of course, completes the review as far as the Temple fans are concerned. The rest of us can take a table for two and continue the discussion. Practically nothing but the title of the familiar story remains, for the studio has brought everything up to date, thereby providing plenty of excuse for Shirley's songs, dances and repartee. And the star comes through better than usual. The daughter of a soap magnate, she is feared kidnaped, but turns up on a rival soap magnate's radio program. Alice Faye gets a chance to prove why she was signed to a movie contract, while Gloria Stuart and Michael Whalen are likable as the romantic interests. Sara Haden, Jane Darwell, Tyler Brooke and Henry Armetta contribute good performances, while Gordon and Revel outdo themselves on four songs that are headed for hits—"But Definitely" and "You've Gotta Eat Your Spinach" being top tunes.

Preview Postscript

Veteran Temple can now check up to her credit her fourteenth featured role in three years of careering. That nickname of "One Take" Temple was not hastily bestowed; the youngster is so sure of herself that she causes old performers to work harder to maintain her pace. She was made a Texas Rangerette by Governor James Allred of Texas, who tried unsuccessfully last January to "adopt" her for his state. Shirley's portable dressing-room was redecorated. The blue and white room was given a mirrored ceiling, a built-in wall couch covered with blue and pink elephants and a diminutive water heater and wash-bowl. Showing the dressing-room to visitors, Shirley took them first to the wash-bowl. Beneath it were piled many empty soft drink bottles. Shirley was a little chagrined to have the visitors pay more attention to these than the new wash-bowl, but explained with an elegant wave of her hand, "It's so difficult to keep the empties cleared out."

★★★ Poppy (Paramount)

For admirers of the great comic talents of W. C. Fields, "Poppy" is welcome entertainment. When Fields is on the screen one forgets that the gags he's been handed may be old, for every gag is a new one when he gives it his touch. His role as a carnival barker gives him ample opportunity to parade his special gifts and to prove once more that he is as fine a comedian as exists on the screen today. The story turns out to be a mild little affair built as a background for Fields, and it manages to keep out of the great man's way as much as possible, although once in a while it bobs up in an apologetic manner and holds up the proceedings. When it stays in the background you see Fields hawking a phoney cure-all at the carnival, Fields playing croquet and Fields posing as a man of means. Rochelle Hudson and Richard Cromwell play the romantic leads, but their assignments are of the routine, or standard, variety. "Poppy" is strictly for the lovers of Fields.

Preview Postscript

This play fits W. C. Fields to a T, because it provided him, long ago, with his motto, "Never give a sucker an even break" and his reference to the "old army game." "Poppy" was his first picture in the silent days, though it was known as "Sally of the Sawdust." Fields announced on his return to the studio, "Assuredly I am back. Back from the very portals of the grave. Oh, ye of little faith, did you think I would desert you? Remember, a Fields never flinches in the face of fire! I have made a final conquest of my sacro-iliac." . . . Almost an entire circus, including animals, performers and full equipment, were on hand for use during production. One sequence called for the appearance of an elephant, two leopards, an eagle, two pythons, a steam calliope, a merry-go-round, fifty circus performers and a hundred extras. Several thousand yards of canvas completed the effect. Several hours were spent before the scene was arranged, checking the stage for any possible holes which might shield a mouse or a rat. Circus men had warned of the danger that would follow if a rat appeared near the elephant while players were crowded around.

★★★ Earthworm Tractors (First National)

Joe E. Brown turns his attention to the farm machine industry and comes out with a slapstick farce which should have loyal followers of Brown rolling in the aisles. Joe E. portrays Alexander Botts, the tractor salesman famed in story if not in song, and his steam-roller brand of salesmanship manages to sell almost enough tractors to pay for the expensive scenery he demolishes. When Joe E. is spurned by the gal he loves (Carol Hughes) because he has never done anything big, he takes to selling tractors. When he comes back for her she has married Dick Foran, but by that time he's also in love with June Travis, whose father (Guy Kibbee) is his toughest prospect. Papa is deaf, and, besides, he prefers the old-fashioned horse and buggy. So Joe gives him a tractor demonstration that frightens the old boy out of his deafness and wins the big contract, and the little lady, for our hero. It must be recorded that this one is above the average in the Joe E. Brown series.

Modern Screen does not hesitate to recommend any of these three-star pictures for your summer movie menu. (Top) Kay Francis and Ian Hunter in "The White Angel," which depicts the courageous career of Florence Nightingale. (Above, right) Joan Beal and Anne Shirley in a scene from "M'liss." (Right) One of the better Joe E. Brown offerings, "Earthworm Tractors," with Guy Kibbee and June Travis in important roles.

Preview Postscript

Joe E. enjoyed making this more than any picture in a long time, because he's had a yen for machines, but big ones, for years. The only scene that wasn't exactly too much fun was the one where he had to stand with his famous mouth more or less wide open, inhaling the mud from the spinning wheels of the heroine's mud-stuck car. . . . That street scene which shows houses, stores, etc., completely demolished, wasn't really as bad as it looked. The whole set had been built in "break-away," that is, of the lightest types of wood and other materials. Most of the buildings were of balsa and the cement objects of cardboard, all of which took just an overnight job of construction. But the scene had to be shot several times for perfection, which meant that the buildings, etc., had to be put together again each night. The only near-accident happened when the tank driven by Joe E., going blissfully along, hit soft sand too close to the edge of the road. Tank and Joe E. rolled over to a 150-foot drop, but both emerged safe and sane.

★★★ M'liss (RKO-Radio)

Anne Shirley comes through with flying colors as Bret Harte's girl of the mountain country, M'liss. In spite of the weak stories which have been her lot since the successful "Anne of Green Gables," Anne Shirley has never given a performance lacking in sincerity or unmistakable talent. So with a story like this to work on, you can be assured of the picture's excellence. The plot is not one to get excited over, depicting as it does the trials and tribulations of a girl brought up by a drunken (Continued on page 91)

ATLANTA, GA.

For a smooth, clear skin—there's no beauty aid like Camay. It's amazing how quickly Camay works its magic.

Sincerely,

(Signed) Betty Drewry

(Mrs. John C. Drewry)

March 26, 1936

The minute you meet Betty Drewry, you will feel the welcome of her smile, the friendship in her voice. You'll notice, instantly, the clarity and smoothness of her complexion. And you aren't surprised to hear her say, "I've always used Camay."

And you, too, will find that Camay has a mild manner and a gentle touch that brings out the natural beauty of your complexion. Camay's lather is rich and fragrant. Camay's bubbles are beauty bubbles—thousands of them—all busily cleansing deeply but gently. For Camay is milder—definitely, provably milder than other leading beauty soaps.

Try Camay. See for yourself how much it can improve your complexion. Buy half a dozen cakes today. You'll find its price is very low.

The Soap of Beautiful Women

BY MARJORIE DEEN

Eating out-of-doors is Bob Montgomery's favorite stunt. Here he is breakfasting on his veranda.

Bob Montgomery says, "When it's hot, keep cool!"

STAR SUMMER SUGGESTIONS

THEY'RE EATING out-of-doors, these days, in Hollywood. In patios and gardens, beside swimming pools or tennis courts, by the outdoor grills and ovens, under trees, awnings and beach umbrellas or on the spacious verandas of their homes, the stars are enjoying dining and lunching out in the balmy, clear air of another California summer.

And Bob Montgomery, as you can see from the picture on this page, even goes in for breakfasting outside. For, with the table set for breakfast on the porch, right beside the garden of his lovely, yet unpretentious home, Bob feels that his morning coffee and the political headlines in the paper take on special qualities.

And what do you suppose is the most characteristic feature of all these al fresco meals, according to the ever-breezy Bob and his petite and attractive wife, Betty? Simplicity! No Paté de Foie Gras, Caviar Canapés, Lobster Thermidors or Mushrooms sous Cloche, grace the tables of your screen favorites during the hot weather, but such simple fare as you and I would expect to serve in our own more modest homes.

The reasons for this summer simplicity can be traced to several sources, I discovered after some research into the matter. In the first place, the hotter days of summer call for lighter fare, since heavy dishes, rich gravies and exotic foods seem to lack appeal when the thermometer starts its upward climb. Then, too, the women folk —whether stars or wives of stars—find calorie-counting a pleasure rather than a task when slimming and eye-appealing salads make their welcome appearance as main course dishes "in the good old summertime." And the third reason—though not mentioned too frequently or openly—is, I suspect, thoughtfulness for the cook! This thoughtfulness is dictated by expediency as well as consideration, for you'd really hate to have a veritable treasure of a cook walk out on you when, in true Hollywood style, you were expecting twenty or so ardent tennis or swimming enthusiasts for a buffet supper out in the open.

Many's the housewife-cook, however, who never goes on strike for shorter hours and a simplified menu, but continues to bake and boil, steam and stew during

Pyrex

This apricot and pear salad with potato chips, and a generous portion of creamed mushrooms, makes a tempting hot-weather supper dish.

all seasons. And why? Well, because she fears that her family would object to any change in eating habits. Or so she thinks! But this summer she would do well to try some of the suggestions made by the Bob Montgomerys. Then perhaps she'll find, to her joy, that by incorporating these ideas into her daily meal-planning she'll serve meals that are less time-consuming for herself and yet meet with everyone's approval.

WHEN entertaining, in summer, about everyone we know of, out here, goes in for one particular dish for which their parties are famous," Bob started out. "You hear on all sides about the barbecues given by the Warren Williams, the Spanish dishes for which Leo Carrillo—a California native son of Spanish descent—is known. Warner Baxter is proud of the grand chili con carne that he himself knows how to make to perfection; the John Boles family, at their parties, introduce tortillas, enchilladas and other specialties of their native Texas. And so it goes! The entire meal, then, is planned around that one particular dish . . . what the French would term the specialité de la maison.

"With such a procedure in mind the host or hostess announces to the cook in advance, 'Of course we'll have such and such a thing to begin with,'" said Mrs. Montgomery sagely, taking up the conversation at this point. "And with that as a springboard, so to speak," she continued, "they then plunge into the actual task of planning the party refreshments.

TROUBLE... at 22 Winterset Street

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 10, 1936

I swear I'm leaving John for good! I worked like blazes over that dinner party—but now he says my linens didn't look nice — and he's sure the guests noticed.

THURSDAY, JUNE 11, 1936

Can you beat it? Mother says my clothes do have that tattle-tale gray look. It's not my fault, she claims, but my soap doesn't wash perfectly clean. Guess I better take her advice and change to her pet soap.

MONDAY, JUNE 22, 1936

Wh-e-e-e! Fels-Naptha did the trick. That grand golden soap is so packful of naptha it washes spic-and-span and John's as pleased as pie. From this day on, I'm telling the world—

Matrimony tops the list of Hollywood activities this month, plus choice gossip tidbits and laughs

Look what goes on! Above, Lucille Ball with Henry Fonda and Ginger Rogers with Jim Stewart, at the Cocoanut Grove.

Left, who said Ann Sothern and Roger Pryor had pfft? Here they are with George Murphy at the Tennis Club.

Your snooping reporter, disguised as a deserted lamp post, thinks he had the inside tip-off on the recent Loy-Hornblow wedding. It was this way: Myrna and Arthur, a few nights before the big event, drew up in front of the Trocadero, where the attendant, who took their car, greeted Myrna with, "Good evening, Mrs. Hornblower." Myrna was stymied for a moment, but she answered, "Not yet! Not yet!" And so, not to disappoint the attendant again, the pair slipped off to Mexico and had the knot tied. Mr. H's former frau, Juliette Crosby, finally gave up by getting a Reno split in June and Hollywood and the Troc attendant knew wedding bells couldn't help but toll soon.

Bob Taylor now wears a platinum wrist watch with ruby numerals, a gift from Barbara Stanwyck. To most of Hollywood it means that Bob and Barbara have patched up their differences. After all, you don't give platinum wrist watches to guys you can't stand, do you? The only skeptic in town is W. S. Van Dyke, who is directing them in "His Brother's Wife." Van Dyke, in spite of the platinum and rubies, shot the love scenes first.

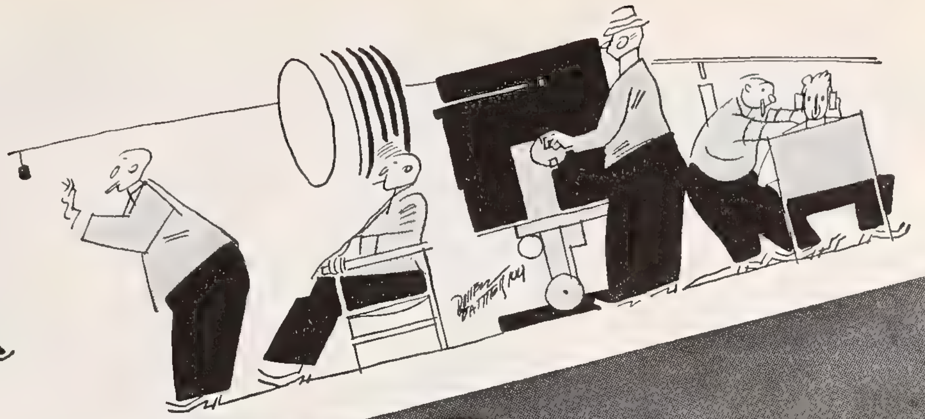
The Lombard-Gable romance goes on and on, and indications are that it may even end up at the altar—always a fine place to end

By Leo Townsend



Irene Hervey and Allan Jones admit that August will find them married.

Seated, Mary Brian, Cary Grant and Wendy Barrie. Standing, Ben Lyon and Ben Bernie.

a romance. Despite all of Clark's pugilistic publicity Carole hasn't worn a black eye since the one which decorated her features in "Love Before Breakfast."

The latest gag present from Lombard to Gable was delivered to a somewhat bewildered Mr. G. at the close of a radio broadcast in which he was appearing in a dramatic skit with Marlene Dietrich. Just as the show ended an attendant brought in a huge floral horseshoe—the kind gangsters used to send their deceased colleagues. The card from Carole read: "Good Lux."

Being elected queen of a fraternity ball almost cost Ginger Rogers a lot of popularity among the local college lads. Ginger was scheduled to appear at the ball, but midnight came and she hadn't arrived. Frantic calls to her home and to all the night clubs got nowhere. Then a bright investigator journied out to Ginger's house and found her chauffeur asleep in the car and the lady herself asleep on the divan. She had taken the phone off the hook for a few minutes' nap. It is a pleasure to report, however, that Ginger rushed to the affair just in time to become Queen of the Ball about ten minutes before the ball fell apart and went home.

After "Queening" it at the ball, Ginger dropped in on the Trocadero to join Henry Fonda, Virginia Bruce, Jimmy Stewart and Wendy Barrie. When Ginger sat down, Wendy got up and left for home, which seems to indicate that Mr. Stewart is something of a ladies' man. Incidentally, the Fonda-Bruce-Stewart-Rogers foursome has been having more fun than anyone in Hollywood.

Busy Fingers Note: Between scenes for "The Gorgeous Hussy," Joan Crawford is crocheting a crib cover for young Miss Gretchen Foster. Gretchen is the daughter of Norman Foster and Sally Blane, and she's named for her favorite aunt, Gretchen Belzer, whose better-known name is Loretta Young. It's a fine crib cover, except that it's blue. Miss Crawford: Blue for guys, pink for dolls.

This is about Bette Davis and her catboat, which she used to have anchored in Santa Monica Harbor. One day Bette found herself in a catboating mood, so she donned her slacks and went down to the bay to find the boat turned upside down and shot full of holes. Bette called her lawyers. She wanted to sue. The lawyers told her a suit would cost her more than a new boat. Besides, they said, it was only a catboat. "A catboat to you, perhaps," replied Bette, "but it's my Queen Mary."

The loneliest guy in town, at the moment, is George Raft. Reason: Virginia Pine is in London, recuperating from an illness. Just to prove he's true to her, George is being seen about the night spots accompanied by his shadow and personal bodyguard, Mack Gray. Known as The Killer, Mack is just about the most harmless chap in Hollywood. Incidentally, he, too, is wearing a long face these days. Lucille Ball, who was once The Killer's own, has deserted him for Helen Broderick's son, Brod Crawford. The Killer sits and sulks, and life goes on.

Cora Sue Collins, Al Jolson and Ruby Keeler Jolson do a trio act for a recent evening broadcast.

Hollywood is snickering over the recent newspaper publicity in re Clark Gable's fistic ability. You probably saw a picture of Clark standing over the prostrate form of Allen Pomeroy, his adversary in "Cain and Mabel." The newspaper stories went on to say that Clark had obtained a boxing license and had issued a challenge to Maxie Baer. The whole thing was quite embarrassing to Mr. G., who frankly admits the story is phoney. He also adds that Mr. Baer would have no trouble knocking his ears off.

Hearts and Flowers (Junior Division): Tom Brown and Toby Wing, veterans of many a publicized romance, have taken to going around with each other. Recently they celebrated their fifth anniversary, which means nothing except that they had just completed five weeks in each other's company without fighting. By the time you read this they probably won't even be speaking, but they can always look back on those five happy weeks when nary a blow was struck.

If you think you've got trouble, listen to the list of calamities which struck "Stage Struck" during the process of its making. First of all, Dick Powell's throat went blotto. Then director Busby Berkeley had to take time off to appear in court. Joan Blondell tripped over a cable on the set and sprained her ankle. The Yacht Club Boys, suspended by wires for a song number, got themselves really stage struck when the wires snapped. The only healthy member of the cast was Marion Davies. All she had to worry about were the reviews of "Hearts Divided."

Ever since their marriage, Claudette Colbert and Dr. Joel Pressman have been plotting a round-the-world trip for themselves. Whenever they get almost set something happens: either Claudette must make a picture or the doctor must tend to a tonsil. Last month, however, they really got under way on what they consider the first leg of their journey. They got as far as Pebble Beach, about 150 miles north of Hollywood.

an almost impossible task, for there are bank accounts opened by Fields in over half of all the cities he's ever visited on his round-the-world vaudeville tours.

More Hearts and Flowers: When Anita Louise stepped off the Super-Chief on her return from England and France we looked around for Ross Alexander, but we looked in vain. The young man waiting at the station was Tom Beck, who seems to have been cast for the romantic lead in Anita's private life. The lovely lady, by the way, swears she didn't buy a single bit of finery in Paris.

Ginger Rogers' "photo diary" sets her back over a thousand dollars a year, but Ginger likes it and the Rogers bankroll can stand it. Right now she has ten scrapbooks filled with candid camera shots of herself on the set, off the set, and practically everywhere. Her secretary handles the camera at the studio and her maid shoots the works at home.

A reporter actually catches up with Kate Hepburn at an airport!

When the Evelyn Venable-Hal Mohr baby was born, Evelyn promised herself she wouldn't make a picture before the child was six months old. Her promise turned to be an exact one, for the baby's first half-birthday Evelyn signed with 20th Century-Fox to appear in "The Holy Lie." So now Dolores visits mama for a brief period every noon, after which mama goes back to work.

That proposed Little Theatre appearance of Joan Crawford and Franchot Tone is off, for the moment at least. Joan and Franchot had planned on two weeks in a summer theatre in the East, but Joan changed her mind. Now it's opera she's interested in. She's even talked to Rosa Ponselle about it. In fact, she's gone farther than that. No longer do you hear "Smoke Rings" and "Melancholy Baby" pouring from the Crawford phonograph on the set. Instead you hear German and Italian arias. Our bet is that "Melancholy Baby" is back within a month.

Scotty snaps the Stuart Erwins dining out at the "Troc." And right festive they look, too.

Ann Sothern is so afraid of the dark that her new home has a bedroom with, by actual count, eight windows and a skylight. She says it's a lot like camping out, but she likes it. She also adds that she's a little tired of people telling her that she lives in a glass house and shouldn't throw stones. The only stones she likes are the Fred Stones, and she certainly wouldn't throw them.

The long-distance marital arrangement of Lupe and Johnny Weissmuller is one of Hollywood's strangest. For the past couple of years Lupe has done most of her work in South America and England, while Johnny stays home in the Hollywood jungles, as per his Tarzan contract. Last month Lupe dropped in from London, had cocktails with Johnny, Bruce Cabot and Adrienne Ames, and hopped back to England two days later. One can almost picture Bruce Cabot saying, "Miss Velez, I want you to meet an old friend of mine—Mr. Weissmuller."

Looks like the shipping lines have taken over the marriage industry in Hollywood. First Fred MacMurray and Lillian Lamont rush to the altar and then to a boat bound for Hawaii for their honeymoon. Then comes Irene Hervey with the announcement to her friends that she and Allan Jones will become Mr. and Mrs. J. aboard the "Lurline," also Hawaii bound, on August 1st. Perhaps it would be a good idea for some of the boats to set up a marriage bureau on a revolving stage. On the return trip you press a button and the thing becomes a divorce court.

Everyone's still congratulating Ruby Keeler on her swell dramatic performance on an air show last month. Ruby really came through with an histrionic demonstration which surprised everyone, including hubby, Al Jolson. Said Al, "If this sort of thing continues, they'll be calling me Al Keeler!"

Madeleine Carroll, making "The General Died at Dawn," lunches with James Montgomery Flagg.

Eddie Cantor's overnight decision to grab a boat to Hawaii involved one of the neatest tricks of the month. Seems when Eddie reached his decision his wife was on her way to a local night spot to arrange to take over the place for their 25th anniversary a few days hence. Eddie phoned the nitery. "Look," said he, "there's a woman around town posing as my wife. She likes to rent places. If she comes in treat her gently, but don't do anything about it." When an indignant Mrs. Cantor arrived home that night, it took a lot of rapid talking to keep her calm. Eddie must have won, for they went to Honolulu.

One of the most amusing of the month's items was the announcement in local newspapers that Gary Cooper's father was about to leave for England incognito. Something like The Forgotten Man going about in a beard to conceal his identity.

Merle Oberon and Marlene Dietrich aren't supposed to be speaking since a slight difference over the leading role in "Garden of Allah." So Roland Young, who always feels badly about such situations, saw them both at a party one night and decided to bring them together. Dragging what he thought was Merle over to Marlene he said, "You girls really ought to be friends. Why don't you kiss and make up?" Dietrich was somewhat bewildered, but Roland insisted, so she kissed the gal. It was Fay Wray, who still thinks Mr. Young is a bit on the balmy side.

Ginger Rogers surprised Myrtle, her colored maid, with a birthday party on the set of "Swing Time" (nee "Never Gonna Dance"), to which the whole cast was invited. Received by Myrtle: one silk dressing-gown. Received by the cast: ice cream.

Oakie interrupts a rehearsal to suggest a gag to director King Vidor. Vidor admits it's a nice gag, and adds that it has always been a nice gag. Criticism doesn't bother Oakie, though. However, it must be noted that the only picture on her dressing-room table is a likeness of Rudy Vallee, her first gentleman friend, and she always has a standing arrangement with her studio to take time off during the Vallee broadcasts.

A dude ranch for dogs, of all things, is Hollywood's latest wrinkle. It's a 15-acre establishment in the mountains, and offers the stars' pooches a healthful altitude—7,800 feet above sea level, which someone has discovered is the ideal altitude for dogs who can afford it. Other advantages are fancy table d'hote meals, supervised recreation, and a chance to meet desirable canines socially. Among the present customers are Richard Dix's blooded setters and Katharine Hepburn's cocker spaniels.

Inez Courtney and Marion Nixon raptly watch Ann Sothern tell a big one, while Roger Pryor and Jack La Rue lean over them at the Trocadero.

THE GENERAL DIED AT DAWN

One glance at the grim-looking "Chi-nee" at the top of this page and the tense expressions on the faces of Madeleine Carroll and Gary Cooper, gives you a slight idea of what thrills are in store for you in "The General Died at Dawn." Gary plays a fighting Irishman who gets embroiled in some hazardous Chinese business with a war lord. And you don't have to be told that Madeleine is the beauteous gal he has to fall for!

Remember what a kick you got out of "Shanghai Express"? Well, this picture is even more so, with all the speed and action plus the punch that only a director like Lewis Milestone could add. He directed "All Quiet on the Western Front," you know. Clifford Odets, the dramatist of the great stage hit "Awake and Sing," is another reason why the story is fascinating, for he makes his Hollywood debut as the scenarist of this picture. And if you look hard, you'll spot John O'Hara, the famous novelist, as an actor. Uh-huh, even writing best sellers is just routine compared with being able to take a crack at acting! Aside from this impressive array, there are those old favorites: Akim Tamiroff, Dudley Digges, William Frawley, J. M. Kerrigan and Porter Hall. Now you know you'll be in the front row, don't you?

Adv't

Clark's favorite date these days is Carole Lombard, whose salty humor is a good match for his devil-may-care moods and impulses.

The Gable mustache had to go for his role with Marion Davies in "Cain and Mabel." Here's a rather damp scenic bit between them.

By

Gladys Hall

HE LIVES HIS IMPULSES

Clark Gable only hesitates when it comes to two important steps. Guess what they are!

I'VE ONLY got about half an hour," said Clark exuberantly, as he hustled me ahead of him into the M-G-M commissary, where he ordered and ate (to the rinds) two gigantic wedges of watermelon, washed down with several tankards of iced tea. "I just decided, half an hour ago, to go fishing in Utah. I packed my bags and dashed over here to talk to you. I was going to Guatemala because I've never been there. But I found I wouldn't have time to make such a long trip so I got out the map and Utah leapt out at me. I'm off tonight—for two weeks or so. I like to live my social life with the fish!"

"So you really do?" I said, meditatively.

"Really do what? Like to socialize with the fish?"

"No, live on your impulses, as Hollywood says. . . ."

"I don't know what they say. It's liable to be almost anything. But if they are saying that I've chucked clocks and calendars, card indexes, engagement books and mottos-for-the-day into the ash-can they're right for once.

"I always have lived on impulse, more or less. But I've always felt guilty about it, too. Thought I was doing what I hadn't oughter! I was brought up, as most American boys are, to believe that a fellow should plan his next step before he puts his foot down on the one he's taking. I had a pang of conscience when I didn't 'look ahead.' No more. It can't be done by planning. Plans don't work out. How can they, when you know yourself that it's at least half as likely that we may not be here at all this time next year as that we will?

"I won't build a wall of rules and regulations around me. They're stifling and ridiculous. I won't assume any more obligations than I have to. I started out to look for a house a few weeks ago. Thought, suddenly, that I'd like a place with grounds. I looked at a lot of them. They looked like one-man jails to me. And so I am staying at the Beverly Wilshire where I can check out—for Utah or anywhere else—in ten minutes.

"So 'they' say I have a new philosophy, huh? Well, I don't give it any such high-sounding tag. But if I have anything of the sort it's this—don't plan! Obey your impulses. Do what seems the best and most appealing at the moment. Don't wait for the next moment to come along so that you can check on yourself. You'll never do anything if you do. Maybe your impulses won't work out successfully but your carefully laid plans may not either—and you will have been through all the mental wear and tear of making 'em.

PEOPLE OFTEN have asked me what I get out of it all—you know, being a movie star, making money, all the perquisites. I don't get out of it what a lot of people would, that's a fact. I'm not luxury-minded. I don't give a hoot for swell houses, swimming pools and entertaining. I don't like big parties. I have no use for a yacht, I prefer a tramp steamer. Camping, fishing and shooting don't cost much of anything when you don't go to swank resorts—and I don't. I have no use for swell clothes. I hate to dress up—I feel like one of those old-fashioned tailors' dummies when I have to put on the soup and fish. I like to wear slacks and sweaters and leather-lined jackets—nothing that must be fitted. My tailor has modeled a dummy according to my measurements and, any fitting that has to be done, is done on it. I call it 'The Sissy.' I like plain food, stew and beans, raw onion sandwiches and hamburgers and," laughed Clark, "watermelon.

"No, there's only one luxury success has brought me. I don't kid myself that I have success, either—I've told you before that it's a lot of apple-sauce for any screen star to make little of what he gets—and that still goes. Anyway, the only luxury success has brought me is that I now can buy the right, most of the time, to do what I want to do, when and where I want to do it.

SHE IS AS original as the spelling of her last name, as unpredictable as the Derby winner, and as stimulating as a side-car at Tony's. Margaret Sullavan.

Nine years ago, when she was a sweet girl graduate at Chatham Institute in Chatham, Virginia, suh, she was the belle of every cotillion. But that didn't prevent her from spending the early part of the evening in the ladies' dressing-room for fear that she'd be a wallflower.

Today her popularity is not confined to cotillions. As one of the First Ladies of the Screen, her name is a household word. However, she never looks at her rushes, attends the previews, or even catches a fourth run of her pictures. She claims she photographs like a Pekingese—and she doesn't like Pekingese.

She gets horribly fussed when she is recognized in public, so she invariably denies her identity. The height of outdoor entertainment is to watch her arguing a group of fans out of the absurd notion that she is Margaret Sullavan.

I'VE OFTEN been mistaken for her," she'll solemnly announce in that husky throbbing voice that is so inescapably hers. The only one she ever convinces is herself!

Like all cries of "Wolf, wolf," however, this predilection for traveling incognito has often proven more embarrassing than she has bargained for.

NEVER A DULL MOMENT

As full of surprises as a grab bag, Margaret Sullavan leads her friends a hectic life

By Radie Harris

For instance, there was the time she got tired hanging around Hollywood waiting for the production to start on "The Good Fairy," so she flew to Chicago, traveling under the pseudonym of Mary Stevens. After idling away six hours in the airport, she decided to fly back, only to discover that she didn't have enough money for the return fare. She took the pilot into her confidence.

"Look," she confessed, "my name isn't really Mary Stevens. I'm Margaret Sullavan. I'm under contract to Universal Studios. Will you please cash a check for me?"

"Have you any means of identification?" asked the none too gullible and unimpressed pilot.

Peggy searched her bag but found nothing to help her out of her dilemma. Suddenly, she thought of a movie magazine. Perhaps her picture might be in "Modern Screen." It was!

Triumphantly, she showed it to the pilot. His glance focussed on a close-up of a beautiful girl, gowned in one of Hollywood's latest creations. Her hair was immaculately waved, her lashes curled to an extravagant length, her mouth was a ruby in a pearl setting. His eyes strayed to the modestly dressed young woman standing beside him—her wind blown locks flying carelessly in the wind, her lashes devoid of any mascaro—her lips with no trace of rouge. He handed her the magazine. "Sorry, Miss," was his only comment.

Little Miss S. when she was the belle of Chatham Institute in Virginia.

Then there was the time that she telephoned Charlie, her Filipino houseboy.

"This is Miss Sullavan," she announced.

"Miss Sullavan, she no home," was Charlie's answer.

"But this is Miss Sullavan speaking. Don't you recognize my voice?"

"Miss Sullavan, she no home."

What's become of the unapproachable Marlene? She's certainly a different gal these days

By Harry Lang

I WAS going to tell you about the new front Marlene Dietrich's put on; how she's turned on an entirely new personality. How the lady of the frigid stare, the icy aloofness and the superior arrogance, had vanished, and how a studio tomboy had suddenly taken the spotlight. How she had become a movie-set clown who flung herself suddenly into caricaturing and devastating imitations of Garbo, Joan Crawford and Mae West, while set hangers-on, extras, lowly grips, looked on and roared in glee. In fact, a gal who shared her time, her fun and her personality with carpenters, Mexican extras, greasy-handed dishwashers. . .!

And I was going to let you see it exactly for what I thought it was—a brand-new publicity gag engineered by the canny gal from Germany.

But I can't do that now.

Oh, I shall tell you in detail about the change that has come over her—the strange humility and softness, the warm friendliness that have truly replaced the previous down-the-nose aloofness for which she was known in Hollywood. But I can't kid her about it, ever, and I feel abashed now, that I thought I could.

Because, you see, just recently it was given me to see, during a few sudden heart-twisting moments, that this new Marlene is not just a publicity gag. That it is, rather, something almost terrifyingly real.

A few of us were in Marlene's dressing-room. It just had been built and furnished, there on the Selznick lot, where she's been making "The Garden of Allah." It was beautiful, that suite. But it wasn't the newness or the loveliness of it that was uppermost in our minds. It was, rather, what we saw there on a little table.

A photograph of Jack Gilbert, dead nearly six months, now. Before it, a tiny taper burning in an amber glass—like the ever-burning candles you see on church altars. That taper has burned steadily before that photograph for that half-year. Marlene has not let its light die.

On the face of Marlene, there was an ineffable sadness. Her eyes were wide open, but she didn't seem to be seeing the things in the room; she seemed to be looking beyond them, past us to something we couldn't see.
